Udayanath Sarangi has successfully struck a new role in his writing of stories and verses for children. Starting his career as a writer of text books such as Odisara Itihas Katha, Bharatara Itihas Katha (1929-1930), he has continued to produce book after book such as Sindbad, Pari Raija, Tuka Musi, Ali Baba (21 poems) which proved very popular with the inquisitive children. In this connection the name of Anantaprasad Panda, Agani Das, Bamdeva Mishra, Krishnachandra Kar, Chakradhar Mohapatra, Chandrasekhar Mishra, Baikoli Jyotish Bisarad, Basudev Mohapatra and Nilakantha Rath may be mentioned. Birakishore Das, who is popularly known as Jatiya Kavi for his patriotic songs, was also a capable writer for children. He successfully edited a monthly magazine Mo Desha (1946). Ramachandra Acharya dealt with puranic characters and he wrote Bhima (1922), Sachitra Markendeya (1929), Sachitra Balmiki (1931) and Tulsidas which are interesting as biographical readers for children. Nilakantha Rath also produced life sketches drawn from the Mahabharata and the Ramayana. Satyananda Mohanty, Dhaneshwar Satpathy, Gourichandra Routh, Gopalchandra Mishra, Bhawan Pati, Ramprasad Singh, Anantacharan Satpathy wrote regularly in children's magazine, which appeared from time to time. Bamdeva Mishra's Aurangazeb, Dayanidhi Mishra's Dhruba, Lingraj Mishra's Guru Govinda Singh and Bala Veer Abhimanyu, Jagabandhu Singh's Washington, Radhacharan Panda's Mahapurusa Peter and Doctor Livingstone, Binod Kanunga's Pilakanka Bapu, Sonaprasad Das's Veer Keshari Shivaji, and Godabarish Mohapatra's Kirti Mala are some of the well written biographies to attract the children's mind. Satyananda Mohanty also wrote interesting stories befitting children's requirements. Sridhar Mahapatra is well known for his popular books written on the themes of the epics.

Kalindicharan Panigrahi, who is a powerful writer of poetry and fiction in Oriya, has also tried his hands successfully in writing for children and he has attained unique success because of his simple and direct language and lucidity of narration. Kunjabihari Das has been a successful writer for children. His several publications both consisting of stories and verses have proved to be very effective so far as the demand of the children is concerned. Manoj Das has made available in Oriya language stories from English. Premalata Das has woven some stories for the children basing them on folk themes. Children's literary series like Jane Thile Raja, Ajanka Kahani, have also been much liked by the children. Bilua Nanar Huka, Mo Khel Kandhee by Gopalchandra Mishra has been received well.

A number of young writers have emerged during the period of last thirty years who have been primarily responsible for shaping the juvenile literature in Oriya and leading it to a new frontier of knowledge, expression, information and learning.

Emphasis is laid on the entertaining qualities of children's literature in Science and Technology. International affairs have also been gradually introduced in children's literature. There are three factors which are responsible for the wider expansion of children's literature and for its sudden popularity; these are (1) the increasing number of printing presses in Orissa, (2) the emergence of a large number of children's magazines in Oriya and (3) the impact of All India Radio's weekly forum for children of Orissa. The children's magazines have inspired many young writers to write for children with new ideas and techniques. Such journals include Prabhata (1909) (editor Reba Ray), Panchamrita (1920) (editor Chintamani Acharya and Agani Das), Janha Mamu (1932) (editor Balakrishna Kar), Mo Desh (1946) (editor Birakishore). Das) and Dagaro (editor Laxmikanta Mohapatra). In fact, the maximum progress and development in children's literature in Oriya has been possible only during the last twenty five years. Shishu Sampada Tuin (1957), Sansara, Mana Pabana (1960), Shishu Lekha (1971) Mo Desha (1973), Bala Binoda, Babul (1975), Kishore, Vishwa Shishu, Bara Maza, Tiki Muniya (1975), Ame Kuna Kuni (1975) are some of the magazines which have faithfully served the cause of the juvenile readers in Orissa. The importance given to child's mind by special programmes conducted by the All India Radio is evident. Daily papers like Prajatantra Samaj, Matribhumi Kalinga had long since contemplated to provide children's corner once a weak (Meena Shishu Raija Kishore Phouja, Udayabhanu) in their papers. Several prizes instituted by government agencies to encourage children's writers have developed the attitude of both writers and readers. The result has been the emergence of a consciousness among the children and the need for a special type of literature for children.

The children's literature in Oriya is now developing clearly on new lines. A new factor in the changing pattern of juvenile literature in Oriya is the child's growing awareness of and involvement with the outer world.

G.M.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Punjabi). As an infant casts its first glance into this world, clasped in a deep embrace around its mother's breasts, the sweet words of ecstasy and joy of the fondling mother are the first introduction to the spoken language (mother-tongue). The overjoyous mother sings sweet lullabies, while feeding the child and cajoling it to fall asleep so that the mother can snatch a few moments of rest after the travails of labour.

The lullabies, the sweet little couplets and snippets of the age-old folk-tales and folk-songs form the backbone of children's literature in all lands and languages. They have been there from times immemorial and revolve round the birds and animals, fairy tales of pretty princesses, charming princes, the benevolent queens and kings, the ferocious giants, the magician Allah Din, the hidden treasures and the imaginary unknown lands, the glittering stars, the bright romantic innumerable moons, the attractive heavens, the merciful God and the horrifying hell and its ugly demons. Children's literature has been dominated by all these elements in every language, Punjabi being no exception.

Sporadic efforts for the production of children's books for different age groups, keeping in view their psychological needs, were made in pre-Independence periods. Just a couple of Punjabi writers indulged in the 'luxury' of writing books for children in the belief that 'Child is the father of man'. Reputed writers and poets too drifted into this field off and on to cater to the thirst for knowledge of their own children or of their readers. Sardar Gurbaksh Singh of Preet Lari, who transformed considerably the writing in Punjabi language and literature, produced a couple of very interesting books for children, Gulabi Ainkan (Pink Glasses) being the most popular.)

Among the childrens' periodicals, Balak edited by S. Lal Singh, dominated the field for a very long time; Bal Sandesh, the monthly magazine edited by Jagdish Singh, blazed a new trail in children's literature in the forties. Bal Sandesh was ably edited thereafter by Navtej Singh and is now being continued by Hirdeypal Singh, with a very moderate circulation.

With the dawn of Independence in 1947 India entered a startling new age of progress. Development of regional languages was guaranteed by the Constitution. Partitioned in two irreconcilable parts, Punjab lost its academic and intellectual nucleus Lahore to Pakistan. With the merging of some of the the Princely States of Patiala, Kapurthala and Nabha, East Punjab acquired some Punjabi-speaking territories.

However, the setting up of the Language Department by the Punjab Government gave a fillip to the development of Punjabi. Production of children's literature is one of the important functions of the Language Department. They produce a variety of books for children periodically.

Several private organisation like the Chief Khalsa Dewan, Guru Gobind Singh Foundation, Guru Nanak Foundation, Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee, Punjabi writers' Co-operative, New Delhi and the Punjab and Sind Bank also have done pioneering work in producing profusely illustrated books for different age groups though their publications relate mainly to the lives and missions of Sikh gurus, saints and heroes. The National Book Trust, established by the Government of India, produces books for children in all the regional languages including a few in Punjabi. Private publishers like Hemkunt Press, Delhi and a few reputed publishers of Amritsar and Jullundur also produce a few books. With the establishment of the Punjab School Education Board in Chandigarh in 1970 production of school text books in all the languages became the responsibility of the Board. With a view to providing supplementary reading material to school students, a monthly magazine in Punjabi Pankhrian was started in 1971, under the editorship of Jagdish Singh, Director of the Board, Pankhrian at once caught the fancy of school children in the remotest villages of Punjab, and is still one of the outstanding children's magazines. Gurdial Singh Phul's vast variety of stories, plays and informative books are unique and bear the hall-mark of his deep understanding.

Individual writers have also contributed their mite to children's literature in Punjabi. With her deep insight into child psychology Jaswant Gill has produced a rich variety of literature for children and for adolescent youth. Tarlochan Singh's contributions regarding the study of the planets, stars, moons, etc., have set new trends. Dhanwant Singh Sital, Lal Singh, S.S. Amol, Shamsher Singh, Jaswant Singh Kailvi, Piara Singh Data, Singh Balli, Harinder Singh, Satnam Pandhi, Avtar Singh Dipak, J.S. Bawa are other notable writers in this domain. S. Sohan Singh's books in verse-Raj Kumar Sumer and Harni Rani are innovations in this field. Smt. Bhagwant's Chiri te Gulela, an old folk-tale, profusely illustrated was another commendable effort. Guru Tegh Bahadur and Nikian Jindan Wada Saker by Jagdish Singh are of outstanding merit. Mrs. Prabhjot Kaur's Mahatma Buddh, Al mal Hoya Thal, Sade Tiohar, etc., won awards from Language Department Patiala. She has written some very popular text books also. S.S. Wanjara Bedi has collected and published Punjabi folk-tales under the titles of Punjabi dian Lok Kahaniyan, Punjabi dian Kahaniyan, Gallan Mudh Kadim Dian.

With an awakening to the realisation that in a rapidly advancing age of the scientific temperament and of the consciousness to attune a child's mind to the highly sophisticated technological age, significant changes have taken place in the substance and material of children's literature in Punjabi too. Except for a brief span of the first couple of years, nay, months of its early life, the child is now exposed to such a vast variety of media, cinema, radio, television, video, etc., which have caught the imagination of children even in remotest villages and transported them into the vast sphere of space flights that the old fairy tales appear to have become completely out of date. Responding to these changed circumstances, the writers and publishers also are bringing out sleek and colourful illustrated children's magazine with exotic subject matters and scientific overtones.

Jag.S.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Rajasthani) Though the writers in the pre-modern period did not adopt the genre, the deficiency was fairly compensated by tales for children available in the folk tradition. Popular folk poems for children have also been published along with these tales, though all those pieces have been recreated or retold rather than being reduced to writing in the original form. Some such collections are:–

1. Hunkaro Do Sa L.K.Chundawata, (12 folk tales), Jaipur, 1957. 2. Akala Sariran Upajai, Vijayadana Detha, (26 folk tales), Borunda, 1961. 3. Tabaran ri vatan, L.K. Chundawata, (10 folk tales), Udaipur, 1961. 4. Hariya Suwatiya–L.N. Ranga, (4 folk tales), Jaipur 1983. 5. Lakhatakiyo–L.N. Birla, translation by Srjana Samartha (10 tales), Lachamanagadha, 1982. 6. Cauholi.

Some of the more popular tales have been taken in more than one anthologies. It is to be noted that these writers have accepted the popular folk tales as a broad base only, while the entire superstructure is their own creation. More such books are : Jhindiyo (Poems) Barahatha, Karanidana (10 poems), Phephana, etc. Two of the poems of this collection––'Tabarano gita' and 'Mharo Desa Chadhai Giganara'—are not of the folk literature variety. These are modern in concept and are intended to infuse the spirit of national consciousness and pride in the children. (2) Bata Men Hunkaro—(ed). B.L. Mali 'Ashanta' (9 tales), Lachamanagadha, (one of these tales, Theli, is a translation from Russain). (3) Sonai ro Mora (ed). B.L. Mali 'Ashanta' (8 tales), Lachamanagadha, 1981 (one of these tales—Telephone—is quite modern in concept, while another one is a translation of the story 'The end of the party'—by Graham Green). (4) Hunkarai Bata Mithi Lagai ed. B.L. Mali Ashanta, (10 tales)—Lachamanagadha. Manohar Sharma and Dinadayal Ojha—two authors of this collection have tried to make a psychological approach to the subjects which are intended to benefit the children. All others are mostly folk themes, except one—'Mithi Roti'—translated from Russian. (5) Lapa Bhara Moti—ed. B.L. Mali Ashanta, (7 tales), Lachamanagadha. Some of the stories–'Anokho Parawara' 'Tabara are Suraga', 'Sani Deva ro chalavo'—are psychoanalytical and appealing to the child-mind. Attempts at composing poems for children have been made in

'Dudha Bharyo Katoro' (A cup full of milk) by 17 different poets. One of the poems—'Chidakali ri Dharana' (Idea of a sparrow) is a translation of an English poem. Some of the poets seem to have a good grasp over the subject. The poetry issue of Jhuna jhaniyo (The rattling toy) the only children's quarterly in the language, contains fifteen poems on different topics by a single author, Sawaisinha Dhamora (Jhunjhaniyo, Vol. 6. No. 21, Jaipur, 1984). The treatment of the subjects is not agreeable to the child psychology. There are stray mature thoughts and passing remarks on the current social and political conditions which cannot pass as children's literature. Taran Chai Rata (The starlit night) is a collection of eleven essays written by B.L. Mali 'Ashanta'. The topics are morning, day, evening, night, moon and stars, sun, children, man, etc. There is no attempt to give any scientific knowledge about these natural phenomana. The essayist has taken the opportunity to go deeper into the abstract fields of thoughts and feelings in order to convey deeper meanings with the help of the imagery. Manohar Sharma's book—Balabadi (children's garden), a collection of seven stories, is also somewhat didactic in nature. Then, there are several abridged adaptations of famous English novels and short stories along with a rendering in Rajasthani of A Treasury of Fables by A.P. Bhatta, written in the Panchatantra style. The famous English work—Alice in Wonderland—has been recreated in an abridged form by B.L. Mali 'Ashanta' under the title Mayanagari (1982). Another work of this category is David Copperfield, based on the novel of this very name by Charles Dickens. The Treasury of Fables has been rewritten in Rajasthani by Bhikhamachanda Vidyarthi which forms an issue of Jhunjhaniyo (Vol. 5, No. 20 1984). Suraj Bapa ra Beti Janwai (The daughter and son-in-law of the sun) is a translation of a Lithuanian folk tale done by S.N. Joshi. L.K. Chundawata has collected eight folk tales of different countries in her book—Desa Desantara ri Vatan (Tales from different countries). China, Japan, Burma, Thailand and Afghanistan are the countries other than India. Ramakrishna Bajaj has given his impressions about Russian children in the travelogue—Rusi Tabaran men, 1982 (Among Russain children). Two collections of one-act plays, Kunkun Kanya, 1982 (The auspicious saffron and the bride) by Mahendra Banawata, and Payala Hansai, 1982 (The anklets laugh) by Jayachandra Sharma are meant for the children, but the subject matter and the treatment are of a higher standard. Lastly, we have four novels, as under: (a) Bhora ra Pagaliya 1979 (Steps of the dawn) by B.L. Suthara, (b) Bilaniyo Dado, 1979 (The dwarf-sized grandfather) by B.L, Mali, 'Ashanta', (c) Khushamdi Raju, 1981—(The Naughty Raju) by B.L. Mali 'Ashanta' and (d) Baiju, 1983 by the same author. A collection of popular jokes has been published under the title Hansi ra Sabadaka, 1981 (Sips of laughter) jointly collected and edited by Manohar Sharma and B.L. Mali 'Ashanta'. S.N. Joshi and Dinadayal Djha have given us short biographies of national leaders, such as, Mahatma Gandhi, Sardar Patel, Lokamanya Tilak, and so on. Joshi's Apana Bapuji, (Our Bapuji i.e. Mahatma Gandhi) is a fairly lengthy book divided into 46 small chapters. Gandhiji's theory about's Satya-Ahimsa' (Truth and non-violence) and his preachings and sayings have also been explained in simple language in the appendices. Dinadayal Ojha has given 18 short life sketches of leaders of national importance in his book Desa ra Gaurava, 1972 (The pride of the country). The first eight names of this list (Rammohana Raya, Dayananda and so on) have been published separately under another title Bharata ra Nirmata, 1972 (Makers of India), while the rest ten (Gokhle, Tilak, Lajpat Ray and others form the content of Chuti Umar Mata Kam (great deed in young age) 1972. As the list of books mentioned above reveals, the best contribution in the field has been made by B.L. Mali Ashanta through his children's quarterly magazine Jhunjhanio which is now in its sixth year. Almost all his books have come out through the pages of this magazine. There is a very wide scope for this literature to develop in the language.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Issues of Jhunjhaniyo quarterly magazine, ed. B.L. Mali. Ashanta, Lachamanagadha (Sikara).

Raw. S

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Sindhi). Prior to the advent of the British rule in Sindhi in 1843, there was not even a single Sindhi work in the written form, which was especially meant for children. But, if we take into consideration the Sindhi folk literature preserved through oral tradition, which contains considerable material for the younger generation, the development of children's literature in Sindhi also can be traced back plausibly to the beginning of the 8th century.

The folk literature in Sindhi contains various tales, fables, semi-historical legends, songs, nursery rhymes, drolls, sayings, proverbs, riddles, anecdotes, jokes, etc., which are specifically meant for the entertainment and instruction of children. A large portion of such oral literary corpus is as old as the Sindhi language itselt.

The modern period in the Sindhi literature starts with the conquest of Sindh by the British in 1843. The development of Children's literature in Sindhi during the modern period can be classified conveniently into the three stages:

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE—SINDHI

After the advent of the British rule in Sindh, although the Sindhi literature showed rapid growth in prose as well as poetry, yet there was no concentrated effort on the part of writers to develop children's literature in Sindhi as a separate branch. Hence, writings especially meant for younger generation mostly got place in school text books and supplementary readers. Besides, some literary, magazines, such as, Saraswati (started in 1890) and Joti published interesting material for children. It was later on collected and published in the book form. There are a very few Sindhi books for children which were brought out during the later half of the last century. Early writers in modern period who contributed significantly to the growth of general as well as children's literature in Sindhi are Nandiram Thadhomal Sewhani, Udharam Thawardas Mirchandai, Kewalram Salamatrai Advani Navalria Saukiram Advani, Hiranand Saukiram Advani, and Akhund Abdul Rahim. They were followed by four great pillars of the Sindhi prose, Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani (1844-1916), Mirza, Qalich Beg (1855-1929) Dayaram Gidumal Shahani (1857-1927) and Parmanand Mewaram Ramchandani (1865-1938).

In the field of poetry, an attempt was made to publish folk poems narrating legends and tales. A narrative poem, Kamsen ain Kamrup written by Lalo Bhagat in Devanagari script was transliterated into Perso-Arabic script by Udharma Thanwardas and published in 1869. Udharam himself was a good poet and prose writer. He wrote a large number of moral stories, poems and small essays on different subjects for children which were generally published in school text books and other academic literature.

Two collections of small poems and nursery rhymes Barana Shaira by Mirza Qalich Beg and Barana Gita by Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani were published in 1870 and 1891 respectively.

As regards fiction for children, a good number of books containing fables, folktales and small moral stories were brought out during the last century, most of them being translations and adaptations of literary works in Sanskrit, Hindi, English and Persian. The earliest tales of Sindhi in print are those which were printed in Devanagari in the appendix of Grammar of Sindhi (Published in 1849) by Captain George Stack. After the standardization of Perso-Arabic script for Sindhi in 1853, a good number of prose books for children were brought out, for instance Bhambhe Zamindara Ji Galhi (A tale of Bhambho the landlord, 1854) by Ghulam Hussen Qureshi, Sudhaturo ain Kudhaturo (1855) by Sayyad Miran Muhammad Shah, Esap Ju Akhanyu (Aesop's Fables) by Nandiram Sewhani and Ellis; Dilpasand Qissa (An adaptation of Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare) by Mirza Qalich Beg, Vetala jun Akhanyu (Stories of Vetala) by Gurdasmal Kirpalani, Sabha Jo Singaru (Decoration of court, selected tales from Panchatantra) by Hasaram and Sobhraj Dasvani, Baranyun Akhanyun (Tales for children, by Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani.

During 1901 to 1947 the region of Sindh came under the impact of socio-cultural, political and literary movements which spread throughout the country. The wave of national awakening influenced the Sindhi literature also. In comparison to poetry, the prose became a more powerful vehicle for people to express their emotions, thoughts and national consciousness. In such atmosphere, some poets and writers felt an urgent need to develop children's literature as a seperate branch.

In the field of poetry, Bherumal Mahirchand Advani (1876-1950) though mainly a prose writer and historian, composed a good number of lyrics and small narrative poems, many of which became very popular among children. Kishinchand Tirthdas Khatri 'Bewas' (1885-1947) was the first major poet who, besides leading Sindhi poetry to new directions, felt the urge to mould tender hearts of younger generation. His collection of lyrics Shirin Shairu (Sweet poems, 1929) contains melodious lyrics for children. Besides, his several songs, full of national and patriotic fervour, were so popular in Sindhi that children used to sing them. Inspired by the ideals of 'Bewas', Hundraj Dukhayal (b. 1910) and Hari Daryani 'Dilgir' (b. 1916) composed several melodious songs for children. Bawas and Dilgir brought out together Mauji Geet for children.

During the period a large number of prose writers came forward to pay special attention to the growth of children's literature in Sindhi. In this field, Melaram Mangatram Vaswani did a remarkable service by establishing Gula Phula office in Karachi in 1925, and publishing in monthly series beautifully illustrated books for children of the age group 4-9. Bala-Ramayana, Bala Mahabharata, Bal-Shrikrishin, Hindu Vira Balak, Insafa Jun Akhanyun, Akhlaqi Akhanyun, Gula Gadi, Paristan and Devistan are some of the titles published under this series. Melaram Mangatram Vaswani besides giving interesting material to children, always aimed at inculcating pride in tender hearts for Indian literary heritage and culture.

An important event in the world of younger generation was the founding of Balakan-Ji-Bari (Children's Guild) in 1925 by Shewak Bhojraj. In due course of time, it became an organisation which spread through out India. Shewak Bhojraj started a monthly magazine in 1944, with the title Gulistan. It was an importat Sindhi periodical for children containing variety of interesting and instructive material such as stories, essays, lyrics, biographies, humour, questions and answers column, and material on general knowledge.

The first half of the present century, undoubtedly, is the period in which the Sindhi literature showed remarkable growth in quality as well as quantity. Some of the important books for children published during this span of time are Tahika-i-Tahika (a collection of jokes, 1906) by Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani, Barani Ji Vindura ya Pirolyun (Riddles, 1922) by Mirza Qalich Beg, Dil-Bahar (A collection of interesting and humourous stories in four parts) by Parmanand Mewaram, Baranyun Bolyun (Tales for Childrens, 1926) by Naraindas Ratanmal Malkani, Tolstoy Jun Akhanyun (Stories from Tolstoy, in three volumes) by Shewaram Bhagchand Lala, Charchan Ji Chahira (Jokes), Rano Pratap (1926), Shivaji (1927), Raja Ashok (1928) all books by Mellwaram Mangaram Vaswani, Akhlaqi Talim by Deumal Mahboobani.

After Independence (1947 onwards) many writers migrated to India. Jethanand Bhavandas Lalawani (b. 1916), a journalist and writer had started monthly series Phulintan in Sindh. After partition, he began to publish monthly books for children, 1950, at first from Ajmer, and then from Bombay. Prabhudas Brahmachari (1904–1977) started the monthly magazine Phulwari from Ajmer. The management of Kamla High School, Khar, Bombay has published about thirty books under different series for children. The Sindhi literature for children has shown remarkable progress in India but still there are a few subjects like science, technology, adventure on which there is hardly anything in Sindhi. However, the efforts made by Hundraj Balwani for keeping the children's literature alive are commendable.

M.K.J.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Tamil) There were occasional writings for children by prominent men of letters at the end of the 19th century and early 20th century, and traditional classics popular through oral circulation were recorded in simple language. Further, some of the writers contibuted to the children's sections of various Tamil journals. When journals exclusively for children started appearing, more and more writers began writing for children. Certain writers have devoted themselves wholly to writing for children. Many of them write purely for the pleasure of writing.

Periodicals: The first children's magazine in Tamil was printed in 1840. It was called Bala Deepikai and was published by the Christian Society at Nagercoil. Siru-Pillaiyin Nesa Thozhan published by the Christian Association at Palayamkottai during the same time and Balyar Nesan published from Jaffna (Ceylon) by a group of Christian missionaries in 1859 could not continue for long for some reason or other. In 1891, another attempt was made when C.V. Swaminatha Iyer started a journal Viveka Chintamani wherein he reserved a section for children. In addition, he published some booklets for children. In 1971, A. Madhaviah published traditional children's stories in his journal Thamizhar Nesan serially and later published them under the title Bala Vinotha Kathaikal. In 1942 from Rayavaram, a village in Pudukottai District, emerged a magazine Pappa Malar. Following this, a number of magazines appeared, all with a view to cater to the needs of children. Only after the publication of these journals, books for children came to be published and publishers began to show interest in bringing out children's books. Between 1947-52 there were some 40 Tamil periodicals for children. Due to the high cost of production and lack of wide circulation, all these journals except Ambuli Mama were discontinued. Ambuli Mama however, is being published in 13 languages. Now Ratna Bala and 3 or 4 other periodicals are still in circulation.

Today, there are approximately 2000 books written and published in Tamil for children in general. About 40% of them are well illustrated and with a good layout; 10% of the books are poems, 60% are stories, novels and plays and the remaining 30% are books of knowledge and information. No serious effort has yet been made to produce books for children in the smaller age group.

Poems: Of course, in ancient Tamil literature, there are some poems dealing with subjects suitable to children, but the style is not completely suitable to attract children of modern age. Folk songs with a special appeal to children have been in vogue down the ages through oral expressions. Still in the realm of poetry, Kavimani Desikavinayagam Pillai and the poet of national eminence Subramania Bharati, were the pioneers who gave the lead to contemporary poetry for children. Al. Valliappa is well known as the 'Children's Poet' and his Malarum Ullam, (The Blossoming Heart: volume I & II) are very popular among children. Some years ago it was Ka. Namasivaya Mudaliar who introduced delightful verses in the elementary text books and following him Mani Thirunavukkarasu, Mayilai Sivamuthu and others wrote a number of poems for children and enriched children's literature in Tamil. In 1970, an anthology was published in Madras. In this, poems by poets from Ceylon, Singapore and Malaysia were included in addition to those from Tamilnadu. This anthology entitled Muthu Kuviyal consisting of about 130 poems was serialised in All India Radio, Madras and the poets, (about 60 in number) were introduced by Poovannan who published in 1960 a book under the title History of Children's Literature. R. Ayyasami's Bala Ramayanam has poems that appeal to the ear, while Thambi Srinivasan's Sivappu Rojappu shows some interesting experiments with different technique and form to suit the themes handled.

Poems on pet animals, natural scenes, motherland, nation-builders and scientific subjects have been and are being written in Tamil side by side with narrative poems and witty lyrics. In 1977, the Tamil Writer's Co-operative Society brought out an anthology of story-poems for children compiled by Al. Valliappa. This book consists of 60 story-poems composed by 60 poets. Children of lower age groups prefer jingling nursery rhymes whereas poems with good subject matter and powerful expressions generally appeal to the higher age groups.

Stories: There are several writers who have written short stories and novels for children and some of the novels have been serialised in periodicals or broadcast from All India Radio. Besides fairy-tales, animal stories and moral stories, stories from everyday life have also been published. Adventure stories, social novels and historical novels, suitable for higher age groups are also available. Thooran, Poovannan, N.C. Deivasigamani, Thangamani and Arvi contributed a lot to this field. Humorous stories, patriotic stories and science fictions are now available in plenty. Comics that are very popular among children are produced occasionally. Most of these picture stories are serials published in journals.

On the model of Grimms' Fairy Tales, the late Vai Govindan started collecting traditional folk tales from all over Tamilnadu by publishing an appeal in his children's weekly Anil. Out of his valuable collection, some have been published posthumously in book form.

Plays: There is a great demand for plays for children in schools and children's clubs. And yet, when plays are published in book from, they do not sell well. With the aim of encouraging playwrights to write for children, the Association of Writers for Children conducted a Children's Drama Festival in 1955. At the rate of 2 one–hour plays per day, they staged six plays and the festival, inaugurated by Rajaji, was a tremendous success. But the attempt was not followed as expected. One of the plays Thanga Kuzhanthaikal written by Thambi Srinivasan and staged at this festival got the central Government award, the only children's play to get such an award in Tamil. Poovannan and Koothapiran have written a number of plays and enriched the field of children's literature in Tamil. On the Radio too, several good plays are broadcast and some of the Radio stations are conducting children's drama festival to entertain children. At present, there are about 80 books available in this category. 50% of them are good and suitable for staging. A number of one-act plays appeared in children's periodicals and some good plays staged by children in their schools and clubs still remain unpublished.

Non-Fiction: Another branch of literature for children is non-fictional writing. There is a wide range of text-books available on all subjects of scientific and technical interest. But a child would like to know new things, if learning can be made fun. Some of the writers have done this by presenting factual information in a lighter vein and with good humour. At present there are over 300 books in Tamil on different branches of science and in some of these books, a story and dialogue form of presentation have been adopted with advantage. P.N. Appuswamy is a pioneer in this field of writing. It is also gratifying to note that more than 200 books on biographies of great men in different walks of life have been published for children. T.J. Ranganathan's (T.J.R.) contribution to this field is very valuable.

With M.P. Periasamy Thooran as its Chief Editor, the Tamil Academy which has published a general encyclopaedia in Tamil has brought out Kuzhanthaigal Kalai Kalanchiyam (Children's Encyclopedia) in 10 volumes. A pioneering work, this publication is quite appealing from the point of view of get-up, illustrations, printing etc. Kuzhanthai Ezhuthalar Sangam (Association of Writers for children) founded in the year 1950 by Al. Valliappa has been greatly responsible for the rich development of children's literature in Tamil. This Association organises exhibition of children's books and photographs of children's writers in Tamil, holds conferences of children's writers along with literary meetings and symposia to discuss problems of writers and exchange notes, honours writers and publishers who have rendered valuable services for the cause of children's literature by presenting silver shields and participates through its members in conference and seminars organised by UNESCO, Southern Languages Book Trust, National Book Trust, and Children's Book Trust. In response to the appeal made by the Association, Tamil publishers bring out new books for children every year and these books are released simultaneously on Children's Day (Nehru's birth day–14th November) at a function wherein the authors and publishers concerned are introduced to the public. So far 450 books in Tamil have been released in this manner since 1957. The Association published a Who's Who of Children's Writers in Tamil in the year 1961 and its revised edition in 1972 consisting of 370 writers. Another publication of the Association Thamizhil Kuzhanthai Ilakkiyam –Oru Mathippeedu (Survey of Children's Literature in Tamil) was released on the occasion of its silver Jubilee (1976). An attempt was made by the Southern Language Book Trust in 1957 to encourage authors even at the manuscript stage. They announced a manuscript contest and awarded prizes for the best written manuscrips and published them in four South Indian languages. The Assoication of Writers for Children also invites manuscripts every year and present A.V.M. gold medals to the best two manuscripts.

A course of lectures delivered by Al. Valliappa in October 1979 on Valarnthuvarum Kuzhanthai Ilakkiyam (The Development of Children's Literature in Tamil) at the University of Madras under the Kalki R. Krishnamurthy Memorial Lectureship has been brought out in book form.

Research on children's Literature in Tamil for Ph.D., and M. Phil are being done by students of the University of Madras, Madurai Kamraj University and also of the University of Kerala.

A.V.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Telugu). As in other Indian languages, children's literature in Telugu, in its modern sense, developed only after coming under the influence of western literature. However, Telugu had innumerable songs and stories meant exclusively for children which included nursery rhymes, non–sense rhymes, humorous songs, didactic songs and the like. A Telugu song says that children go to sleep when lullabies are sung and serpents dance when the wind–instrument 'Nagasvar' is played.

The well–known informative book which was till recently taught to the Telugu children is Pedda Bala Siksa written by Puduru Sitaram Sastri and first published in 1847. This commences with the lists of alphabets in Telugu, Kannada and other languages and ends with the famous Shyamala Dandakam. In between are the fables, maxims and important details about world geography, the Railways, etc. In short, it is an encyclopaedia for the growing Telugu child.

Kandukuri Viresalingam Pantulu is one of the pioneers in the field of children's literature. His Satyarjapurvadesa Yatralu is an interesting storybook for children. Gurazada Venkata Appa Rao's Puttadi Bomma Purnamma (Purnamma, the golden doll) is an excellent story poem. In spite of these books however, it can be said that a real effort to produce good children's literature began only from 1910 onwards. It is during this period that Venkata Parvatisvara Kavulu (the twin poets) Chinta Diksitulu, Gidugu Venkata Sitapati, Veturi Prabhakara Sastri, B.V.N. Narasimha Rao, B. Rajanikanta Rao and a host of others wrote several songs, poems and stories for children.

Venkata Parvatisvara Kavulu has published Bala Gita Vali (Poems for children: 5 parts).

G.V. Sitapati has, through his songs, enriched the children's literature in Telugu. In 1940 when he was editing the popular literary monthly Bharati, he had set apart 2 pages for children's songs and stories. Among his songs, Chilakamme Pendli (The parrot's marriage), Railu bandi (The railway train) and Iga-Salidu (fly-spider) are worth mentioning. Chinta Diksitulu wrote songs and narrated stories. The first children's novel entitled Lila Sundari was penned by him. His other writings have become equally popular.

Innumerable books have appeared, giving stories relating to legendary, didactic, historical situations, besides the retold versions of the Ramayana, the Bharata and the Bhagavata.

At this juncture, M. Bapinidu's Telugu Talli, Md. Khasim Khan's Bala Vijnana Sarvasvam (Children's Encyclopeadia) and the bibliography of children's books in Telugu compiled by P.S. Devadas and P. Devadanom should be referred to as they serve as good reference books and are also valuable additions to children's literature in Telugu.

1945 saw the birth of a monthly called Bala entirely devoted to children's literature. It appeared under the able editorship of the Nyayapatis (Raghava Rao and Kamesvari). This was followed by Balamitra, Chandamama and other children's journals. Earlier, a few journals like Balakesari had appeared.

The credit of popularising children's literature should go to the Nyayapatis who made it their life mission to inculcate in children the habit of reading books and listening to the children's programme broadcast by the All India Radio. They made the Radio programmes interesting and informative. The efforts of the Southern Languages Book Trust, Madras, in providing interesting reading material for children also deserve mention. They have published a good number of children's books in Telugu including translations from Tamil and other languages. It is heartening that the government of Andhra Pradesh has been evincing keen interest in children's literature. The Andhra Pradesh Balale Akademi has been doing commendable work from its inception. Besides organising statewide competitions for children and workshop-cum-taining camps in creative writing for Children's writers, it published anthologies of biographies, one–act plays, stories, dance–drama. The Akademi also runs a children's monthly called Bala Chandrika.

It is significant that individual authors and commercial publishers are also bringing out valuable books for children. The National Book Trust, India, has also brought out several books for Telugu children.

Informative books of general knowledge and popular science are being written, usually by experienced teachers of science like Vissa Appa Rao, Vemaraju Bhanu Murti, A.V.S. Rama Rao and others. Among the writers of children's literature, M. Suryanarayana (Masuna), R. Bharadvaja, Kavi Rao, Reddi Raghavayya, M. Venkata Rao, I. Sarasvati Devi, V. Venkatappayya, V. Sambasiva Rao, Edida Kamesvara Rao, M. Ramakrishna, C.R. Sharma and several others may be mentioned for suppliying interesting reading material for the children.

C.R.S.

CHILDREN LITERATURE (Urdu) Urdu is a modern language not backed by sufficiently long tradition. 'Nazir Akbarabadi' (b. 1735, d.1830) is supposed to be the first poet who wrote poems for children. A collection of his poems for children, Bachchon ke Nazir was published in 1958. These poems do have moral lessons, but the poet's approach makes the text thoroughly enjoyable for children. Nazir also wrote poems on the religious festivals of different communities. He was a people's poet in the real sense, and was admired by men of all communities. He also loved animals and birds and has written some interesting poems about them, such as 'Reech Ka Bachcha', 'Hiran ka Bachcha', 'Bulbulon ki Larai' and 'Hans Nama'.

Maulvi Muhammad Ismail of Meerut (1844–1917) who concentrated mainly on children literature did pioneering work in the preparation of text books for children. His poems and stories written exclusively for children in a simple language and an interesting style were included in many of his text books. He shows a thorough grasp of children's vocabulary. His text books have accordingly been used in the teaching of Urdu language for more than a hundred years.

Maulana Muhammad. Husain Azad (1832–1910) a top stylist and writer in Urdu, prepared three text books for children on the suggestion of Major Fuller, Director of Eductation, Punjab in which he has retold some interesting tales from the History of India particularly useful for young minds. His collection of tales Qasas-ul-Hind written in a simple and interesting style became very popular with the children. Another book Nasihat ka Karunphul meant for boys and girls was written in the form of dialogues. In this book the Maulana has impressed upon the young minds India's traditional values, virtues and standards of morality.

Maulana Altaf Husain 'Hali' (1837–1914) was a versatile writer. He was a poet as well as a prose writer of the first rank. Being a teacher he understood the psychology of children and wrote poems glorifying Indian culture and also some powerful patriotic songs. For their simplicity and charm his poems like 'Piare Nabi', 'Duniya ke Malik', 'Ladla Beta', 'Mitti ka Diya', 'Mein Bara' 'Hunga Ammajan', 'Barkha Rut', 'Hub-e-Watan', etc. are still popular with children.

Allama Shibli Nomani (1857, 1914), a contemporary of 'Hali' has also written some poems for children, which are included in his collection Majmua Nazam-e-Urdu. The Poem 'Jahangir ka Insaf' is particularly popular with children.

Nazir Ahmad 'Dehlavi' (1831–1912) often considered the first Urdu novelist, wrote many interesting novels for young girls. The story of 'Mirza Zahir dar Beg', or Hazrat Bi's story. may be cited as examples. Nazir Ahmad wrote primarily for girls, especially the Muslim girls, because he saw that people of his community were not much interested in the education of girls. Taubatun Nasuh Binat-un, Nas and Mirat-ul-Uroos are some of his more popular novels from the angle of the children, particularly young girls.

Allama Muhammad Iqbal (1877–1938), often acknowledged as the greatest poet of the early period of the twentieth century, is best remembered in India for poems which he wrote for children: 'Sare Jahan Se Achcha Hindustan Hamara', 'Himala', 'Parinde ki Faryad', 'Jagnu', Hamdardi', 'Bachche ki Dua', 'Ek Parinda aur Jugnu' and such others. He also translated some English poems and versified some stories which had a moral background and were therefore useful for children.

Brij Narain Chakbast, (1882–1926), was a popular poet and a great nationalist. His patriotic songs inspired children. Although his language was not very simple, the thought content helped children to understand and enjoy his poems. 'Chakbast' also versified certain incidents of the Ramayana. His poems were prescribed in school text books.

Tilok Chand 'Mehroom' (1877–1966) was another significant poet of children's verses. Although he wrote poems for adults also, he will be remembered mainly for those he wrote exclusively for children. His main themes were patriotism and the beauty of nature. His poems helped children to understand the meaning of freedom, peace and progress.

Afsar (Hamid-ul-Lah) (1895–1974), wrote poems as well as stories. For his poetry he selected topics that had a direct bearing on the psychology of children. His favourite topics were: 'Beauty of nature' and 'Patriotism'. He also versified many interesting stories. Some of his booklets viz. Asman ka Hamsaya, Pandhra August, Makanon ki Kahani, Gandhiji ke Sathi, Hikayat-e-Gandhi, Hamara Jhanda and the anthology of his poems entitled Bachchon ke Afsar, which provide general knowledge and useful information for children, became very popular. Institutions like the National Book Trust, Children Book Trust and Sahitya Akademi have also produced useful literature for children. Id-Gah by Prem Chand and Foot Ball ki Kahani written in an autobiographical style by Raj Narain 'Raaz' may be cited as good examples. Jagannath 'Azad' has written poems for children, contained in Bachchon ki Nazmein (Publication Division, New Delhi).

At. P.

CHILIKA (Oriya), a long, descriptive poem (750 lines), based on the lake Chilka, adjoining the Bay of Bengal, in the eastern coast of Orissa, was published in 1892 and written by Radhanath Ray (1848-1908). It was dedicated to Sri Ramchandra Bhanja Deb, the then King of Mayurbhanja, an ex-feudatory state of Orissa, and the poem also ends with a reference to the same king by name who has been spoken of as the destroyer of gloom of illiteracy in Utkal (Orissa). The poem consists of end-on rhyme couplets, and each line consists of 12 letters. The structure is generally musical and the language is a combination of Sanskrit-based words with colloquial words, and emphasis on the former. A large part of the poem is given to an account of Chilka, its vast expanse of blue water, varying vegetations, innumerable fishes, numerous types of birds many of which come to Chilka every year from distant lands, its islands, forests and many rivers that flow into it as well as the villages, places, temples and mountains that surround it. Then there are changing pictures of the lake with the change of seasons, as also with the change of hours during the day, with fine pictures of afternoons, evenings and moon-lit nights. Thus this is how the sun sets over Chilka: "Now the Lord Sun sets his golden throne on the top of valley in the west. As the long shadows fall on hills, the yellow turns to blue. As the cattle return home, the noise of bells round their necks fill the valley and echo in the forest-path. The smoke rises from hamlets below and curls through the forest." Or the moon-lit night is described as follows—"The white moonlight falls on vast blue expanse of Chika even to the distant horizon. The fishermen's boats now dot the eastern line, and as they return home from the sea their happy songs float lazily over Chilka. The spirit of the songs moves over blue water and vanishes in white moonlight. All around in sweet moonlight the sweet maidens laugh and sing". Or the account of night is one of quiet and peace—"Now the night has come; the noise is no more; the earth is quiet.... The chequered forest looks like the body of a snake. The hills and forests are quiet; men do not move; only the cricket sings; only the distant stream murmurs. The night deepens.The peace reigns everywhere". The poem makes references too, such as to the past glory of Orissa when the ships used to go out from Chilka to distant lands. But it mainly remains a fine descriptive poem, describing nature's beauties woven around Chilka, the lake, as the central figure, and to that extent it has inspired a whole line of descriptive poems in Oriya Literature.

Jo.M.

CHIMANRAVANCHE CHARHAT (Marathi) is a collection of humorous essays and stories by Chintamman Vinayak Joshi, an eminent Marathi humourist of last generation. First published in 1933, the book now runs into its 10th edition. In his introduction to the book, the writer states how he developed his humorous style through earlier imitative attempts and discusses the genesis of his stories. 'Chiman' is the abbreviated form of the author's own name. He is the central character and all the stories are woven round various funny incidents and petty adventures in his life. Chiman is portrayed as an average Marathi middle-class man, neither clever nor dull, but a simpleton, neither brave nor coward, but cautious, and self-protective-a typical clerk. The author calls them stories but they are rather straight narratives, told in an interesting humorous style.

Earlier Joshi was influenced by two humorous stalwarts–S.K. Kolhatkar and R.G. Gadkari whose pen name for humorous writings was Balakram. In this first few stories, the influence is clearly preceptible. The writer confesses that 'Tikakar Ani Nhavi' (The Critic and the Barber), and 'Maza Mumbaicha Pravas', the two parodies were inspired by Kolhatkar's writing of similar nature, But he soon left parody for satire which he thought more suited to his temperament.

Though four of his stories 'Lagnasarai' (The marriage season) 'U.Kidwe, ICS', 'Varsanshodhan' (In search of a Bridegroom), 'Akher Lagna Jamale' (The marriage settled at last) are similar in subject to those of 'Balakram', he has developed a style of his own. They are satires on the Hindu marriage system with tiresome search for a bridegroom done by bride's father and severe hurdles like the caste, gotra, horoscopes, and dowry that have to be crossed during the process. Things have much changed now. 'Bolwan' (Dismissal) is another satirical eye-opener on bigamous marriages in fashion amongst some writers who on the pretext of intellectual starvation used to desert their uneducated wives, and go in for more compatible educated girls. 'Gulabn', 'Pahara' and 'Capt. Chimanrao Scout Master' tell funny exploits of Chimanrao and Gundyabhau.

Perhaps the best story in the collection is 'Maze Dattak Vadil' (My Adopted Father) in which simpleton Chimanrao is very cleverly cheated and robbed by a rogue who claims him to be his son lost 20 years ago. It is a hilariously funny story. So is another one 'Raosaheb Chimanrao State Guest". It is a satire on the corrupt administration of the princely states where good for nothing staff cheated the guests and the State as well, and rulers were also equally good for nothing.

Joshi's humour entertained Marathi readers for four decades. The book established him as a humourist with a difference. His humour is gentle, pleasing and mostly situational. It tickles, but does not pinch. He exposes human frailties and inconsistencies. His twin characters Chimanrao and Gundyabhau have become memorable in Marathi literature.

I.S.

CHINGANGBAM KALACHAND SHASTRI (Manipuri, b. 1903) was a scholar of distinction. Born in a Hindu family and son of a noted Nata Sanskirtana, musician of Manipur, he is a graduate of Calcutta University, B.T. of Gauhati University and Shastri of Kashi Vidyapith. He worked as a teacher in schools and retired as Head Master of Johnstone High School, Imphal; he was a also a lecturer in Manipuri in Imphal College, Imphal. He undertook the translation of the Mahabharata into Manipuri from the original Sanskrit in 1965 which is nearing completion. Basudev Mahakavya is an original Manipuri epic he wrote on the theme of killing of Kamsa by Krishna. Premdut is composed in Sanskrit on the lines of Kalidasa's Meghadutam. He translated into Manipuri Kalidasa's Raghuvamsa and the Gita, wrote Manipuri Vyakaran Kaumudi, Sheireng Leiteng, a book on rhetoric and Ashamba Manipuri Sahityagi Itihas, (a history of Manipuri literature). Associated with the theatre movement in Manipur he can sing, act and write; he translated several plays from Hindi and Bengali. He was President of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad, Manipuri Hindi Parishad and Sanskrit Research Committee and many other such organisations. He was awarded Padmasri in 1971 by the Government of India, fellowship of the Manipur State Kala Akademi in 1974, and honoured with the title Sahitya Bhusan in 1966 by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad. received the national fellowship for the best teacher from the Government of India. Deeply religious, now he spends his days in propagating the essence of Indian literature, culture and religion by way of narrating and commenting on great Indian classics in localities throughout the State.

I.R.B.S.

CHINNAYA SURI - PARAVASTU (Telugu, b.1806, d. 1862) was born to Srinivasamba and Ramanujacharya belonging to Chattada Vaishnava sect. Chinnaya is the Telugu version of the Sanskrit of Srinivasa. Being the only son of his parents, he whiled away his time till his sixteenth year in playful activities. However, he learnt Sanskrit, Tamil and Prakrit under the guidance of his father. Kanchi Ramanujacharya taught him Tarka, Mimansa and Alamkara Sastras. He learnt Vedartha from a North Indian pandit, Rama Sastri. Chinnaya worked for some time in the Afghan School in Madras and then he joined Pachaippas' College and worked there from 1844 to 1847. He became Professor in Presidency School (which was to become Presidency College later). His scholorship and erudition came into limelight in this period. The then President of the College, Arbuthnot was impressed by his erudition, teaching skill and writing ability and added the title, Suri (meaning scholar or pandit), to his name. He was presented with a golden anklet inscribed with the title, 'Chinnaya Suri'. From then on he came to be known as Chinnaya Suri.

He was the first Professor in Telugu, Madras University, which came to be established in 1853. He wrote Nitichandrika in this period and dedicated it to the Vice-Chancellor of Madras University, Arbuthnot.

Chinnaya Suri's acitivities were three-faceted, namely, teaching, research and writing. He had a printing press called 'Vanidarpanam' for his printing work. He published a monthly, called Sujanaranjani. In his view, a dictionary, and a book of grammar are essential for the development of any language.

Following this ambition, he wanted to publish Nitichandrika in four parts out of which the first two, Mitralabha and Mitrabheda were first brought out in one volume. Not that there was no prose writing in Telugu before Chinnaya Suri. But his prose was of a distinct variety which was at once beautiful and erudite. His attempt was to teach language to the pupils through the medium of stories. His prose was unique in its own way, the like of which could not be seen before him or after him. Students of Telugu language and literature have continued to study his Nitichandrika.

The brightest jewel among his creations is his Bala Vyakaranam. There were works on Telugu grammar even before Chinnaya Suri like Andhra Sabba Chintamani in Sanskrit by Nannaya, Andhra Bhasha Bhushanam in Telugu poetry by Ketana, commentaries like Balasaraswathiyam and Ahobalapanditiyam. But they lacked brevity and simplicity. Inspired by the aphorisms of Panini's Ashtadhyayi, Suri wanted to make a gift of a similar nature to the Telugu people. Before he actually took up Balavyakaranam, he wrote grammar books of different styles: (1) Padyandhra Vyakaranam (1 chapter), (2) Samskrita Sutrandhra Vyakaranam (complete), (3) Sabda Sasanam, (4) Sabda Lakshana Samgraham (5 chapters). But none of them came up to his ideal standard. Then he made another attempt. His vast teaching experience and erudition ultimately came to his rescue in creating the wonderful Balavyakaranam in the Ashtadhyayi style with 10 chapters and 465 aphorisms. It took nearly eighteen years of tireless effort and shows the influence of Vaiyakarana Siddhanta Kaumudi.

He reached different corners of Telugu Land, studied and collected Telugu words and usages and prepared the manuscript for a complete dictionary in his own hand. This provided the source material and inspiration for Sabdaratnakaram by Bahujanapalli Seetharamacharyulu and Suryarayandhra Nighantuvu.

He authored many other books including Adiparvam, Pachayappa Yasomandanam, a commentary on Viswa-Nighantu, Nitisamgraham, Aksharaguschcham, Andhra Dhatumala, Vibhakti Bodhini, commentary on Andhra Sabda Chintamani, Andhra Kaumudi, Andhra Kadambari, Yadavabhyudayam, Hindu Dharma Shastra Sangraham, Chatuvu poems. However, Nitichandrika and Balavyakaranam have stood the test of time signifying the greatness of Chinnaya Suri.

A.Ve.

CHINTAMANI (Hindi; b.1600, d. 1680-85). The change from 'Bhakti' to 'Riti' was not altogether unexpected in the course of Hindi literary development. After 'Bhaktikal', considering the main poetic trends of the age, historians have given it different names, 'Ritikal', 'Sringarka', 'Alankarkal', etc. The full stream of 'Ritikavya' in Hindi really began to flow after the passage of half-a-century of post-Keshav period. Chintamani, born in a Kanyakubj family, stands at this juncture. This uninterrupted flow of 'Riti' poetry originated with the works of Chintamani, son of Ratnakar Tripathi and eldest brother of two great poets, Matiram and Bhushan. As such Ram chandra Shukla recognised him as the originator of 'Ritikal' while Nagendra regards it as a mere chance. He was well-versed in Sanskrit besides having full command on Brajbhasa. He enjoyed the patronage of several rulers including Suryavansi Bhonsle Raja Makrand Shah of Nagpur and was rewarded even by Shahjehan. His period of composition may be regarded as around 1643. He mainly followed the 'Rasadhvanivad' of 'Uttar-dhvanikal' of Sanskrit in his important works, Kavyaviveka, Kavikul-Kalpataru and Kavyaprakash. He belonged to the first section of 'Riti' tradition comprising the poets who usually describe all the aspects of poetry after Kavyaprakash of Mammata. Out of his works, the best known work Kalpataru, regarded as a comprehensive treatment of various topics related to poetry, was composed in 1650. The basic work of the second school was Ras Manjari, which has been based on the theory of erotic sentiment, chiefly concentrated on the differentiation and classification of 'Alankars'. His other works including Chhandavichar an elaborate work on prosody, are preserved in the State Library of Datiya. Another parallel work Sringar Manjaria, a poetic translation of Sanskrit book Ras Manjari has been mixed with his original works. Bhagirath Mishra edited this important work in which the poet generally used verse while giving illustrated descriptions and prose on the pattern of 'Karikavritti'. Being a profound scholar he wrote books which covered the entire field of poetics with its different theories. With two other names, 'Mani' and 'Srimani', he attained great success as a poet. Ramayana was another of his known works. He composed it in chaste language full of alliteration with a complete mastery over the use of Brajbhasa. On the whole, both as a poet, like Matiram, and an Acharya covering the entire field of poetics, like Bhikharidas and Kulpati Mishra, his position is authoritative.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirendra Verma (ed.), Hindi Sahitya, Part II, (Varanasi, 1963); Nagendra (ed.,) Hindi Sahitya ka Brihat Itihas, Vol. VI-Ritikal (Varanasi, 1958).

K.B.

CHINTAMANI (I, II & III, Hindi; first published 1939, 1954 & 1983 respectively). This collection of essays by Ramchandra Shukla was first published in the year 1930 under the title, Vichar-Vithi. After a good deal of additions, alterations and revisions it later appeared in the form of Chintamani Part I in the year 1939. The first ten essays of this collection pertain to human emotions or feelings ('Bhav ya Manovikar') and the rest of them seven in number - dwell on topics related to practical criticism as well as principles of literary criticism. The essays regarding 'Bhav ya Manovikar' had been published earlier in 1912-1919 under the title 'Manovikaron ka Vikas'. The first essay propounds the psychological aspect of 'Bhav ya Manovikar', the next seven essays—'Utsaha', 'Shraddha aur Bhakti', 'Karuna', 'Lobh aur Priti', 'Ghrina', 'Bhaya' and 'Krodh' are linked with the main enduring emotions (Sthayi-Bhav) of 'Rasas.' The remaining two essays, viz. 'Lajja aur Glani' and 'Irshya' are linked with the fleeting auxiliary emotions (Sanchari-Bhav) of the 'Rasas'. Among the essays on the topics of criticsm, three essays - 'Bharatendu Harishchandra', 'Tulsi ka Bhakti-marg' and 'Manas ki Dharmabhumi' deal with applied criticism while the remaining four, viz. 'Kavita kya Hai', 'Kavya mein Lok-mangal ki Sadhanavastha', 'Sadharanikaran aur Vyakti-Vaichitryavad' and 'Rasatmak Bodh ke Vividh Rup' deal with principles of criticism.

The themes of the essays relative to emotions or feelings (sentiments) are not limited to activities accepted or recognized by psychological analysis; their study is rather the result of the urge based on free thinking. Keeping the common sensibility in view, the emotions are defined in the perspective of modern psychology. But the personal sensibility, contemplation and new ideas have imparted them a completely original form. Perhaps for the first time in Hindi literature, such a vital depiction of 'Bhav ya Manovikar' has been put across in a psychological and literary perspective. In the preface, the author describes them as some "vital regions, that he chanced to visit during his inward journey. His mind has been on a constant journey but the heart has always kept company with it." Thus inspite of the fact that the mind had an upper hand, his interpretations do not suffer from the lack of support by the heart. It would be difficult to categorise these contemplative essays into the traditional subjective or objective essays as the essence of both has got inextricably interwoven in these essays. While writing these essays Shukla's eye is concentrated basically on literature, and not on mere factual or theoretical research. That is why we do not find here a mere discussion of psychological theories through the collection of factual data, nor do we have any discussion about the possible classification of emotions from the point of view of psychology. On the other hand, we have a logical discussion about the emotions as they manifest themselves in the various conditions of public life from the point of view of 'Rasa' or enduring emotion. It appears that Shukla's aim is confined to that extent through which he can show how these basic emotions have an all pervasive existence in human life.

The social interpretation of emotions or sentiments is, as a matter of fact, the basic subject matter of these essays. The writer here also indicates which emotions contribute to the people's welfare (Lok-mangal) and which others get transformed into psychologial ailments. In order to understand the emotion in its completeness, he tries to explain all the elements of 'Rasa' through gestures, feelings, thoughts, instincts and psychological endeavours.

The essay 'Kavita kya Hai' represents the sum and substance of his life-long reflections on the essentials and essence of poetry. The process of modification and revision of this important essay continued right from 1909 to 1929. It may thus be termed as the basis, and the edifice of his literary emotion as a whole. The essay 'Kavya mein Lok-mangal ki Sadhanavastha' abounds in solid arguments. 'Sadharanikaran aur Vyakti-Vaichitryavad, deals with the process of 'Rasa'. In order to explain the Indian theory of Rasa , the mental states of the poet, the reader and the poetic work have been analysed in a theoritical perspective. Shukla has revised the ancient theory of Sanskrit poeticians and has given it a universality through his more modern and systematic perspective. The last essay 'Rasatmak Bodh ke Vividh Rup' discusses the permeative character of 'Rasa'. Refuting the theory of 'art for art's sake', and the Freudian dream theory, he has laid emphasis on the theory of reciprocity of literature and life (Art for life's sake).

The Chintamani: Part II was published in the year 1954 by 'Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi (U.P.). It is a compilation of three long essays - (1) 'Kavya mein Prakritik Drishya', (2) 'Kavya mein Rahasyavad', (3) 'Kavya mein Abhivyanjanavad'. The editor Vishvanath prasad Mishra, has termed them as 'critical essays'. These essays reflect the depth and minuteness of Shukla's study of modern as well as ancient literature and of the Indian and western theories of literary criticism. These critical essays form the foundation stone of Shukla's critical approach to literature. His theory about the direct depiction of Nature in poetry is elaborated in the essay 'Kavya mein Prakritik Drishya'. While laying emphasis on the age-old relationship of man with nature and its various aspects, he maintains that nature represents the 'Vibhav Paksha' of poetry. In addition to this, the essay is an excellent critique interpreting the attitude of representative Sanskrit and Hindi poets towards nature. The next essay 'Kavya mein Rahasyavad' was intended to dispel the ignorance and illusion that prevailed about 'Chhayavad' amongst students of Hindi poetry. Shukla maintains that the mystical poetry is not essentially based on the natural emotional content of Indian poetry. To him Rahasyavad appears to be a philosophy of a foreign origin, which drives poetry away from its basic simplicity and invests it with an air of artificiality with the introduction of an unknown invisible, unearthly and spiritual entity into it. The third essay of the collection, viz. 'Kavya mein Abhivyanjanavad' mainly reflects on modern Hindi writings in the context of the detailed analysis of expressionism (Abhivyanjanavad). He finds the expressionistic theory guilty of the neglect of 'context'. With its undue importance to 'form', and refuting the theory of 'Art for art's sake', he pleads for the theory of 'Art for life's sake' as more balanced and rationalistic and quotes 'Richards and the Indian Theory of 'Rasa' in his support. From the point of view of critical approach to literature, it thus respresents one of his most important facets of his critical writings.

The third collection of essays, under the title Chintamani (Part III) was published as recently as the year 1983, edited by Namwar Singh. It consists of twenty essays of Shukla that had remained uncompiled and unpublished so far. The first two essays of this volume 'Sahitya' and 'Pleasures of Imagination' are translations of Cardinal Newman's 'Literature' (selected in his book the Idea of a University) and Joseph Addison's series in The Spectator (411-421, June, July, 1712 titled as 'Pleasures of Imagination'). 'Sahitya' was published in the 'Saraswati' in the year 1904. At the end of the essay a foot-note explicitly mentions its sources. He, however, freely quotes from Kalidas and Tulsidas. A good deal of the author's originality of thought has also crept into the essay. For instance, Newman's essay emphasizes personal rather than universal aspect of the creative process, whereas Shukla has linked it with 'Lok Mangal'. In his attitude of discarding the 'personal' in preference to the 'impersonal', we find an unmistakable though brief, glimpse of his later theory of 'Lok Mangal'. The next translation 'Kalpana ka Anand' was serialised in 'Nagari Pracharini Patrika', Varanasi during 1905.

Four essays of the collection - 'Babu Kashinath Khatri', 'Fredrick Pincot', 'Bhartendu Harishchandra aur Hindi' and 'Premghan ki Chhayasmriti' deal with the lives and work of eminent contemporary personalities. 'Premghan ki Chhaya-Smriti' is the only essay wherein Shukla has said something about his life for the first time. This essay is an authentic document that helps us to understand his mental make-up. The essay 'Bhartendu Harishchandra aur Hindi' has its own historical importance as it is the first draft of the essay 'Bhartendu Harishchandra' compiled in Chintamani Part I. Among the literary essays of Part III, 1909 version of the essay 'Kavita Kya Hai' has been included. The essays like 'Sabhyata ke Awaran aur Kavita', 'Upanyas', 'Kshatra Dharma ka Saundarya', 'Prem Anand Swarup Hai', 'Shesh Smritiyan ki Praveshika', 'Gadya Prabandh ke Prakar' aur 'Kavita ki Parakh' indicate the development of his thought-currents. Besides 'Sabhyata ke Awaran aur Kavita', and 'Kshatra Dharma ka Saundarya', the early portion of 'Praveshika', all the other essays of the collection are completely independent. Four essays—'Apni Bhasha par Vichar', 'Hindi ki Purva aur Vartaman Sthiti', 'Hindi aur Hindustani' and preface to 'Buddha Charit' help in understanding Shukla's views about language in the perspective of the contemporary scene. The last essay of Chintamani Part III is the text of the speech delivered by Shukla during the Varanasi session of Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. Here he pleads for the development of Hindi literature on original lines rather than on the basis of imitation.

The Chintamani stands out as a very valuable contribution to literary thought in Hindi and reflects the essential originality of the great master's thought processes, the profundity of his scholarship, his sharp analytical process and his undaunted poise in the face of strong winds that rose in the West and swept many a scholar away from his own moorings.

K.P.

CHINTAMANI (Tamil). Etymologically 'Chintamani' means a rare gem and by legendary association a giver of all riches. In Tamil literature this refers to Cheevaka Chinthamani, a verse epic by Thiruthakka Thevar.

Cheevaka Chintamani is one of the five major epics in Tamil, the other four being Silappaikaram, Manimekalai, Valaiyapati and Kundalakesi. The last two are not available while the first three were retrieved from palm leaves, thanks to a painstaking literary hunt by the Tamil savant U.V. Swaminatha Iyer. Of the three, Chinthamani is considered a later work, but listed ahead because of its literary magnitude. It is one of the earlist works in long verse in what is called 'Virutha Pa', destined to influence later works like Kamba Ramayanam. Subsequent writers liberally drew metaphoric and other expressions from Chinthamani in their creations.

Thiruthakka Thevar, belonging to the 9th century hailing from the Chozha dynasty, became a Jain and became well-versed in Jain and Sanskrit literature. Cheevaka Chintamani came to be written by him as he was inspired by some Sanskrit works. The number of stanzas varies in the two authentic editions, one published by Swaminatha Iyer and the other by Shaiva Siddhanta Samaj. The former has 3145 stanzas and the latter 3154, while a stray verse puts the number at 3315. The famous commentator Nachinarkiniyar said the work consisted of 2700 stanzas only. If so, the rest should have been interpolations; but they cannot be identified and isolated. Nachinarkiniyar's commentary is said to have been the best. There are clues given by some commentators according to which there should have been earlier commentaries also.

The Jains hold this book in great esteem as a text showing the way for salvation through the literary exposition of a legend.

R. Na

CHINTAVISHTAYAYA SITA (Malayalam, 1919) is deemed by many as Kumaran Asan's magnum opus. In it, perhaps, he achieves the perfect fusion of his vision of love with the invaluable traditions of our culture. Sita is conceived as the symbol of a love which transcends self. Her suffering and sacrifice are the legacy of the wife and mother the world over. Asan reveals the agony and the pain and the final overcoming of them by Sita as symbolic of the lot of all sentient and sensitive human beings.

In the poem, Sita is depicted not merely as thinking but as totally lost in thought. The poet deftly isolates a unique occasion of billowing feelings and rare insight, when Sita breaks loose of her wonted composure and scrupulous restraint. She is, as it were, uprooted by poignant thoughts. There is a veritable churning of her subconscious. Many thoughts surface which were so long lying inert and dormant. At times, she mouths the idiom of a modern suffragette. She even hauls her Lord over the hot coals of her indignation. She reveals unpalatable facts about his inadequacies and castigates him in no uncertain terms. Sita appears then far different from the helpless victim and patient sufferer she is usually taken for. In fact, this momentary reverie has transformed her into a merciless judge of men and things. She turns an apostle of Truth. She does not mince words. Rama is turned inside out and also indicted mercilessly. At this stage, her indignation and moral fervour are at their height. But as they ebb, composure returns. She sees into the life of things. Then she apprehends her Lord as he truly is, and visualises the moment of their reunion, when bereft of flaws and blemishes, he rises again to the height of glory, enabling him to inherit the peace that passeth understanding, which his spouse would have already attained. In the end of the poem, there is a hint of Advaitic unity. The protagonists seem to cast off their earthly garbs. Ceasing to be individuals, they become transcendent symbols of Prakriti and Purusha or Paramatma and Jeevatma. Sita herself is transformed into the Eternal Mother - the all-suffering but also all-enduring Principle of Life.

The poem's artistic success is vouchsafed by the right choice of the moment of obsessional introspection. This indicates Asan's astute apprehension of the totality of the theme. The poem opens with a declaration of that crucial turning point which lets loose the flood-gates of her emotions. The time has come for a lacerating review of her life so far.

> Aftar Sita's sons had, with the great sage,
> Left for Ayodhya, rapaired she, on an eve,
> With heavy laden thoughts, and remained
> In the garden at the hermitages' end.

She feels the void in her life. A train of thoughts is unleashed, conscious as well as subconscious, for a time coursing straight ahead and then taking devious paths. The poet captures this feverish exercise of the excited mind with consummate skill. The technical device adopted for this purpose is not that of Browning's dramatic monologue. Here there is no suggestion of action. The simple movements are those of a soul struggling through tortuous thoughts. Asan follows with great skill Bharata's Rasa Theory. He evokes the related phases of Bhava, Anubhava, etc., and through a dexterous display of feelings and emotions, he finally evokes the rasa of santa. Just prior to her exit from this worldly stage, there are a few invocations of hers to her beloved in Nature which begins with the one to the Sun:

Let me now bid goodbye to thee,
Lord of the day's empire, O Sun,
Robed in the limitless radiance
Of thy hands' golden shafts.

She takes leave of Rama also:

Beloved Raghava, adieu to thee;.
Leaving thy arm's refuge I rise;
Into the firmament would I fly
By myself, unaided, undaunted.

The poem ends appropriately with the spectacle of Sita welcomed back into 'Mother Earth's' bosom, while the whole court including Rama watch aghast with surprise and awe.

The poem written in the classical four-line Sanskrit stanza form is a veritable mine of wise and well rounded phrases and sayings which are oft-quoted. Every line is filled with the rich ore of poetry and each adds to the solemnity and sublimity of the conception. The diction and style are in perfect agreement with the theme. The cumulative effect of the poem is to humanise the legendary character. Asan's Sita is a revivified version of Valmiki's heroine. Her impact on the reader's consciousness is tremendous. Still the surprising thing is that finally she too fades into the background. Instead, Rama rises in all his glory. He undergoes before our very eyes a metamorphosis. From a wooden puppet he is transformed into a great hero of great charm with a modest share of the human failings.

K.Sr.

CHINTU (Tamil) is a kind of song which was mostly prevalent after the 18th century in Tamilnadu. A particular metre is followed for such songs. A line of a poem with three syllables is also called Chintu. There was also a kind of 'vari kuttu' (a type of dance) bearing the same name.

When devotees perform Kavadi Attam as a part of their ceremonial worship of Lord Murugan, songs in Chintu music are sung. They are mellifluous and melodious with a particular rhyme called 'Chintu Isai'. Poets compose such beautiful songs for devotional purpose. Such songs would relieve the tedium of dancers who had to bear the kavadi from long distances to the temples which are mostly on hill-tops, which made the upward journey all the more difficult.

'Chity' occurs first in Tolkappiyam (Porul, 370) which means the three-syllabled foot of a particular metre. At present in some chintu songs the number of syllables is changed but the rhyme scheme remains the same. Chintu music is originally found in folk-songs. Common people like this music which was used by Annamalai Reddiar in his songs and he made it very popular among the literates. His Kavadi Chintu songs earned popular appeal because of their literary flavour.

According to Saravana Tamilan's Yappu Nool (1981) chintu songs have to be composed with a 'Tanicchol' (a word standing aloof) in the first line. It is marked off with a hyphen. If in a chintu the first two lines are found equal it is called 'samanilai chintu'. In the case of variation it assumes the name of 'Viyanilai chintu.' Altogether there must be three lines in a chintu song. Kavadi chintu, Vazhinadai (walking path) chintu, Nondi (lame) chintu, Kolai (murder) chintu, Vipattu (accident) chintu and Neethi (justice) chintu are the various kinds of chintu songs.

Kazhugumalai Murugan Kavadi chintu by Annamalai Reddiar, Kandan Chanta Kavadi Chintu by P.S. Balaraja Baskarar, Thirupporoor Kandan Kavadi chintu written by Sabapathy Mudaliar and edited by Krishnappa Chettiar, Thonkuva Srisivasubramniar Kavadi Chintu by Chellapillai, Purombunagar Sivasubramonia Kadavul Kavadi chintu by P.N.S. Sivagnanam Pillai and Mayilam Sivasubramaniar Sentamizh Chintu by S.S. Sankaralinga Nadar are a few of the Kavadi chintus persistently used by the devotees. The greatness of Lord Murugan, historical occurences related with the temples, the importane of the Arupadai Veedugal (the six abodes of Lord Murugan) etc. are found elaborated in these songs. They are based on love themes and they make frequent references to the Puranas. The life and role of the famous devotees are given proper places in them in order to emphasise the element of piety. Such things may elevate the importance of these songs.

Kovalan Charittira Tiruppukal Chintu by Varakalur Subbiah Pillai, Ramayana Tiruppukal Kavadi Chintu by V.N. Sabapathy Pillai, Valli Charittira Kandan Chintu by Kankasabai Pillai, Thirugnanasambandar Charittira chintu by Thiyagaraja Pillai are sung before an audience rather than during pilgrimage.

'Vel pattu' by Thangavel Pillai, Kunrakkudi Kumaran Nondi chintu by Chinna Lakshmanan Chettiar are found in Nondi chintu songs. Thirutani Murugan Thirukkulattil Aaru per Tarkolai chintu, Anni Arputa Mary Katalal Annanai Konra Kolai chintu (C. Visvanatan), Kopalu Naickar Kolai chintu (Manickam), Govindammal Sati Mosa chintu (Thangavelu), Devadoss Kolai chintu–all deal with some of the famous murders which attracted the attention of the public. Accidents related to train, fire, lorry etc. were remembered in chintu songs. Shencotta Railway accident chintu, Karamadi Accident chintu, Ariyalur Accident chintu (Railway), People's Park Ground Fire Accident chintu, Breaking of Veedur Dam chintu are some of them pertaining to important accidents which took place at various times. Thirukkural Neethi chintu, Katkudi chintu (prohibition), Atticoodi Neethi Chintu, Aanpillai Neethi Chintu (Justice for male), Penputti Chintu (Advice for females), Thevadi Chintu (against prostitution) are some which issue instructions against certain evils prevalent in the society. Mahatma Gandhi Charittira Nondi Chintu won for its author the Namakkal Ramalingam Pillai prize. Gandhi Marana Chintu by N.P. Karuppanna Pillai gives an account of the assasination of Mahatma Gandhi. The funeral procession is depicted in such a way that it creates a feeling of awe and sorrow.

Chintu developed to help the creation of fine pieces of literature. Subramania Bharatiyar accepted and developed this form in some of his best compositions. Twentieth century poets like Bharati Dasan and Kanna Dasan also followed the chintu metre in their poems.

Ramachinkara chintu, Chidambara Alaya Thiruppani chintu, Ranaganathar chintu, Ramanuja chintu, Subramoniar Panchachara chintu, Ennai Chintu, Oli Nayagar Avatara chintu are a few chintu works which require special mention.

A.N.P.

CHIPLUNKAR, KRISHNASHASTRI (Marathi; b.1824, d.1878 was a celebrated translator and writer of Marathi prose, who influenced Marathi prose style during the mid-19th century. He was educated in Poona Sanskrit Pathshala (school) and became proficient in Sanskrit. Later, he joined the Poona College for English education. In 1852, he was appointed a Translator by the Government. Later he became Assistant Professor and a member of the Daxina Prize Committee. He started Marathi periodicals Shalapatrak (School Gazette) and later Vichar Lahari (Waves of Thoughts) to counter the propaganda of Christian Missionaries. Among his important translations are Arabi Bhashetil Suras Ani Chamatkarik Goshti (Interesting and Strange Tales from the Arabic Language), which is a model of simple, expressive and lucid Marathi narrative prose, capable of expressing delicate nuances when occasion demanded. He was a populariser of scientific knowledge in his Aneka Vidya Sangraha, 1861 (A compendium of many branches of knowledge). His essay on Marathi language, Marathi Vangmayavaril Nibandh, shows his subtle, analytical intellect. He was also the author of a short biography of Socrates (1852) and translated Johnson's Rasselas (1873), Kalidasa's Meghaduta and Jagannath Pandit's Karun Vilasa. He has also composed the long poems - 'Vidyaprashansha' and 'Prashnottaravali'.

A.K.B.

CHIPLUNKAR, VISHNUSHASTRI (Marathi; b. 1850, d. 1882) was born and educated at Poona. Krishnashastri, his father, was an illustrious educationist, well versed in Sanskrit, Marathi and English. His education was more or less on orthodox lines in the beginning. After passing B.A. in 1872, he joined as a teacher in the Poona High School.

His father allowed him the use of the columns of monthly Shalapatrak even when he was learning in the college. He was asked to continue with the translation of Rasselas, which was partly done by his father Krishnashastri. After completing the translation he started writing on five eminent Sanskrit poets. His critical abilities were aptly exhibited in these essays. It was, however, with the publication of Nibandhamala magazine that he became famous. Soon he left the government service and founded New English School (1880) along with Tilak, Agarkar, Apte and Khare, etc., which inculcated the nationalistic outlook among many generations to come. He also started Kavyetihas-Sangraha a magazine to publish original historical documents, 'Chitrashala' and 'Kitabkhana' a lithographic press and a publishing unit respectively.

Nibandhamala remains unparallelled in the history of Marathi Journalism. All the 84 issues of it were authored by Vishnushastri. So profound was the effect of these essays on posterity that entire Marathi literature instinct with its spirit of patriotism for many a decade. He was orthodox in spirit and pragmatic in action. He severely criticised the pro-British bureaucracy and rebuked and ridiculed the leading band of reformers who lacked the courage to practise what they preached. His criticism against Phule, Lokahitwadi and Swami Dayanand, though relished considerably by his readers, was however short-sighted. When during the first few issues he exposed British historians like Macaulay and the ruling class in India his voice was suppressed by Press Act. Some of the issues and essays were proscribed by the Government. He then wrote extensively on literary issues. His essay on Moropant opened a broad vista of creative literary criticism in Marathi.

Essays in the Nibandhamala when published in a book form remained as a significant work in Marathi literature. His style remains unparallelled to this day. His love for the nation, the Hindu religion and the mother-tongue is seen in every line he wrote. Few essayists rival him in the power of eloquence and style with which he aroused the youth of the day. 'I am the Shivaji of Marathi language', he declared with pride. His style is elegant, graceful, full of vigour, having its own rhetorical devices. He had all the tricks of the trained rhetorician at his command: exaggeration, amplification, illustration, balance and antithesis. His style raised the Marathi language which was treading as a crippled child in the first 60 years of British rule, to great heights.

All his writings were published in the book form posthumuously. Nibandhamala (I. 1888, 2. 1889, 3. 1890), contains his essays. Stray articles from Shalapatrak and Kesari were published in Kirkol Lekhasangraha-Part I (1896), Part II (1902) respectively. Sanskrit Kavipanchak (1888) and Vinod Mahadakhyayika (1901) are his other works.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.T. Madkolkar, Chiplunkar, Kal Ani-Kartrutva, Amravati, 1954.

Bh.K

CHIRAKUMAR SABHA (Bengali; 1904). This farcical play by Rabindranath might remind the readers of Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost for the central motivation of the theme. But the treatment and the social milieu in which the characters are placed, are so different that the final outcome is a light but pleasant comedy totally Indian in structure and characterisation. The humour of the play lies in the comic irony of the situation, witty conversation and dialogues, in the incongruities of different kinds displayed by the characters in action. It is possible to look upon this play as a didactic plea for accepting the sorrows and joys of mundane life instead of going after a life of renunciation, but the merit of this play as a play does not depend on this exhortatory note. This is one of the few non-symbolic plays of Rabindranath and shows his early penchant for the realistic drama.

As the title indicates, the theme of the play centres round some young people who initially planned to remain unmarried - but ultimately fell victim to the age-old institution and got married to the women they loved.

Pro.S

CHIRANJIT (Hindi. b. 1919) was born in a respectable Suryavanshi Thakur family of Distt Amritsar, Punjab. After his education there, he shifted to Delhi for good.

Chiranjit began his literary career as a 'Chhayavadi' lyricist but soon thereafter established himself as a leading Radio playwright and acquired renown in that capacity. In his great strides as a playwright, the poet in him was left far behind but even so he continued to write humorous and satirical poems under the pseudonym of 'Parody Das'. Even in the field of Radio plays also it is his humorous and satirical plays which pushed him into the limelight.

He happened to be the Chief-Producer (Drama) in the All India Radio during the Indo-Pak war of 1965. It was during these troubled times that his serialised plays under the title 'Dhol ki Pol' achieved phenomenal popularity. He was awarded the 'Padmasri' in 1972 for his significant contribution in the field of Radio plays.

Apart from Radio plays, Chiranjit also wrote socially purposeful plays and also plays with national sentiments for the stage. His serial 'Dadi Ma Jagi' telecast by the Delhi Television was as controversial as it was popular among a section of the viewers. Chiranjit normally sets forth with a wide canvas but lacks the capability to go deep into the problem he undertakes to portray. Perhaps it is not possible in plays that are avowedly propagandistic in nature. He will perhaps be remembered as one who imparted richness to the typical genre that is the Radio Play. He has so far written over a thousand plays, skits, farces and operas.

He has also written for the children and has edited some journals, too. During the late forties and early fifties, he edited the Vir Arjun, Manoranjan monthly and the weekly Jansatta published from Delhi. After retirement, he again plunged into editorial world and is now publishing and editing the Sarvapriya monthly which has entertainment as its primary objective.

His untiring endeavours and efforts in the field for enrichment of the Radio play led to his nomination as a member of the International Jury for the award of the 'Italian prize' for excellence in the genre in 1972. The Government of India appointed him Producer Emeritus for Drama in the Akashvani and the Doordarshan in January, 1982. His notable works are: Plays: Gherau, Tasvir Uski, Abhimanyu Chakavyuh mein, Dhol ki Pol, Dadi ma Jagi, Mandir ki Jot.
Poetry: Chilman, Madhu ki rat aur Zindagi, Kahen Parody Das.
Novels: Master Silbil, Silbil ki Sil bilahat, Mahashveta.

V.P.

CHIRASMARANE (Kannada) by Niranjan (pseudonym of Kulkund Shivarao) is a novel which records in the form of a recollection of early youth, the story of the fight which the agricultural laboures of Kayyur, (a small village in Kasargod taluk, now in Kerala), put up against their capitalist exploiters. In a sense it is a story of class struggle. Though ostensibly backed by a communist revolutionary zeal, the novel holds no plea for the communist ideal but successfully underlines how the working classes can unite and gain strength by organising themselves and voicing their protest; how even if for a while the protest is suppressed, the suppression itself adds strength to the movement; and how the capitalist exploiters use every available subterfuge to break the movement. The manner in which Nambiar, the capitalist landlord in the novel, manages to involve the members of the agricultural workers' union in a clash with the police with allegations of insurgence and murder turns out to be the turning point and leads the novel towards its climax.

Chirukanda and Appu, two intimate friends in their early youth, come under the influence of the local teacher whom they highly esteem and who puts the idea into their heads that agricultural labourers are exploited and the deprivation of their chance to work in the fields drives them to cities as destitutes in search of work. The teaching is brought home to Chirukanda when his family is thrown out of work by Nambiar who believes that labourers are no better than beasts of burden who understand only the whip and that their literacy should be limited to their being able to put their signatures so that he can escape the charge of cheating them. Chirukand's deprivation becomes the motivation for organising the agricultural labourers' union which, in course of time, gathers strength and becomes an influential body. With the addition of revolutionary workers like Abubakar and Kuyyambu, the union becomes a centre of powerful protest and, on one occasion, is able to repulse the police offensive.

On the eve of the proposed agriculturists' conference when in the course of a morning procession Abubakar is slapped by Subbayya of the police, the crowd retaliates by hounding him into the river. Nambiar's complaint that there was an armed insurrection which claimed the life of a policeman becomes an invitation to police repression and atrocities. Chirukanda and Kuyyambu are arrested and so are Appu and Abudakar and the teacher too who was in hiding. The farce of a trial follows and all the four, Appu, Chirukanda, Abubakar and Kuyyambu are convincted of the policeman's murder and sentenced to death. They meet there and shout slogans that presage the hope of a better tommorow.

Though on occasions the reader feels that the situations are contrived with a pre-determined end in view, the narrative is powerfully recapitulated. The locale of the action and the characters stand out clearly. The teacher who was the source of the new awareness and a symbol of hope for the future despite present setback, Chirukanda who stood for the labourers' union all through, Appu, Abubakar and Kuyyambu who held the revolutionary banner aloft, the fat and uncouth companion who provided comic interludes, the ruthless landlords Nambiar and Namudiri, all in their own ways haunt the reader's memory for long. The narrative could have done with a little less ardour but the pre-independence situation provides some justification for it. Altogether, Chirasmarane is a memorable novel, in a way representative of the "progressive" phase that swept over Kannada literature during the forties.

V.M.I.

CHIRMULAY SHARATCHANDRA WASUDEO (Marathi; b. 1930) has over the last thirty-five years, written about Fifty-plus short stories, some literary essays, travelogues and pen-portraits. His published books, all collections of short stories, are Shri Shillak (1967), Cogs (1973), Eka Janmatalya Gathi (1985). He has been Professor, and ultimately the Principal of Pune Commerce College.

The socio-cultural milieu in his narration is limited to the lower middle class of south-western Maharashtra to which he belongs. A brilliant student of Economics, then a professor, and ultimately the Principal of Pune Commerce College, he has led a life of an academic, interested in literature and Hindustani classical music.

However, what makes his narration different is the inner core of his characters and situations. This core tries to reach beyond the socio-cultural limitations and embark on a philosophical search of the how and why of this human existence. This raises his writing to the 'tragic level' and gives it the classical aura for which he is deservedly famous.

His narrative style also closely follows the classical mould. He simply tells his story in an aloof, straight-forward mood and manner. There is no ostentation, nor any novel experiments with the technique. In fact, in his narratives he avoids even a semblance of that technique which is commonly used as an effective substitute for authenticity.

This is why he belongs to no group, no wave or no particular tradition. He happens to be the contemporary prototype of the eternal story teller, who loves his characters and the anonymous listeners.

S.S.B.

CHISO CHUHLO (Nepali) is a mahakavya (epic) by Balkrishna Sama (1902-1981). Nepali poets do not subscribe to the view that writing epics in the present times has become obsolete. The form and essence of epic have at their hands undergone discreet modifications and the epic is retained as a still serviceable and powerful literary genre. In the process Nepali Kavya writing has branched out into Kavyas, Prabandha-kavyas, Khanda-kavyas, Navya-kavyas and Mahakavyas of several remifications.

Chiso Chuhlo (The Oven cold, 1958) is a modern Nepali social epic. As the title signifies, it depicts the wintry Nepalese social situation which is likened to a fire-place that remains unlit and cold. A group of three snowy peaks visible from Chapagaon, the setting of the epic, is imaged as a rudimentary fire-place where the sun-rays kindle a fire every morning and evening providing some comfort to the people around. Unfortunately the social situation is hostile and inimical for two reasons: first, the stark poverty and secondly, the rigid casteism. Surely both are derivatives of the centuries-old feudalism under which the main bulk of Nepalese population still suffers.

Santay, a 'damai' untouchable and Gowry, a high caste 'chettrini' woman, are protagonists, so to say, in the epic. But they suffer more than they deserve by their action. Contrary to the requirement of Indian classical epic they are more like non-heroes, almost non-resisters on the social and visible plane. So much so that Santay and Gowry merely mutely exchanged glances of endearment but never exchanged a word between them. Victims of hard poverty and unyielding casteism thrust on them by the prevailing social condition, both of them were immobilised and reduced to acquiescing in that state. Gowry is given away in marriage in a well-to-do family. But she just withers away and dies. Santay contemplates suicide but he senses that Gowry forbids him to take his life. He now hears Gowry speaking to him and telling him–

Peace died with me
Let revolution survive with you
Plough through and overturn this earth
Where hate is virtue and love sin;
And in the orifice of that oven cold
Ignited be a volcano and speak.

Chiso Chuhlo is a ringing call, firstly, to throw off the shackle of casteism and secondly and more importantly, to struggle against the bondage of poverty. The two souls were crucified on these crosses. The call, however, wells up not from any socialistic reasoning or theorisation. It comes from a deep humanistic feeling that pervades the entire entity of the epic. Sama's humanism asserts the dignity of man and emphasises human values. How ugly and cruel looks any social condition that tends to impair these. Yet how radiant and noble are the men and women even when they bear the yoke and more so when they bestir themselves to shake off the yoke.

Chiso Chuhlo, a voluminous epic, is a modern masterpiece. Its high literary excellence does not rest merely on the depiction of existing social irreconcilability, on its portrayal of characters, its social or humanitarian message or its being a leap forward in advancing and transforming the tradition, social as well as literary, but on the quality of its poetry which is at once very simple and very high, speech of common mode and great poetry, artlessness and consummate artistry that give it the stamp of a really great literary work. It constantly rises up to the sublime height.

Lastly, Chiso Chuhlo is not bereft of intellectualism. In fact Sama insisted upon poetry incorporating in itself what he discribed as the tender intellectualization of feelings. The whole gamut of tenderly intellectualized emotions that we come across in the epic is truly astounding, to say the least.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Krishnachandra Singh Pradhan, (ed.) Sajho Samalochana, 1968., Taranath Sharma, Sama Ra Samaka Kriti, 1971.

M.D.R.

CHITNIS MALHAR RAMARAV (Marathi; 18th-19th century) was a Marathi biographer who flourished during later part of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th century. He was the great grandson of Khando Ballal Chitnis, the personal clerk of Rajaram. He worked as the personal clerk (chitnis) of Shahu Chhatrapati (junior).His fore-fathers having been in service on the same post right from Shivaji, his family was in possession of important historical documents and he also knew old traditional information. Therefore, he was well equipped for writing the biographies of Chhatrapatis. He has written biographies of six Chhatrapatis from Shivaji to Shahuji the junior.

His works are Siva Chhatrapatiche Saptaprakaranatmaka Charitra, Srimanta Chhatrapati Sambhaji Maharaja, Thorale Rajarama Maharaja Yanche Charitra, Thorale Shahu Maharaja Yanche Charitra, Srimanta Chhatrapati Dhakate Ramaraja and Dhakate Shahu Maharaja Yanche Charitra.

He elaborated his works with the help of Visnupurana, Dandaniti and Rajaniti. His writing is influenced by Sanskrit and Persian, but it is not difficult. The qualities of his style are, efficiency in describing episodes and lucidity of narration.

He has also prepared the second enlarged edition of Hanumantaswami's Sri Samarthanchi Bakhar according to Hanumantaswami's instructions. This 'bakhar' often repeats the old information. He is never particular about the chronology of events. His references to time and period are also faulty. But even then according to V.K. Rajwade, his works are useful for history because he was the man who had first-hand information.

Nis.M.

CHITRA (Maithili), is the first collection of 28 poems of a leading Maithili poet Vaidyanath Mishra, popularly known as 'Yatri'. Published in 1950, the collection contains some of the best modern lyrics and poems in the language. It is noted for its modernity in theme, spirit and style. The poet does not use in every poem a highly sanskritized diction but has successfully raised common everyday speech to a polished and elegant diction. Some of the poems are markedly leftist but the best lyrics reveal a tender and even nostalgic regard for Mithila's ancient and old world charm. The poet called himself at one time 'Vaideha' which exactly reflects the deep attachment of the poet to his land and culture. While some poems deal with the social evils like marriage in old age and marriage in childhood, the best poems powerfully and most poetically bring out the conflict between the old and the new, the ideal and the real, and the rural and the urban. The best poem of this kind is entitled 'Dvandva' which gives perhaps the finest vignettes of Mithila's quiet and pulsating life in the countryside. A sizable number of these poems deal with natural scenery as the background of human drama such as, the intense lyric on a solitary palm tree in a rural landscape which symbolizes the unconventional, defiant and firm attitude of the poet in a society which is excessively tradition-ridden.

The poems reveal the evolution of the poet's vision from his youth to manhood, from a young experimentalist in free verse and colloquial style to a mature master in a new idiom and a new technique. 'Yatri' succeeded in finally liberating Maithili poetry from the bondage of Vidyapati tradition and revealed Maithili as a modern literature, mature and powerful in theme and technique.

This small volume of poems has had a tremendous influence on contemporary poets, and though many have not been able to excel him (indeed some have produced at their best modernist poetry of a very common-place sort) poets like Rajkamal Chaudhary, Jivakanta, etc. have achieved new heights.

J.M.

CHITRADARS HANO (Gujarati). Nahnalal Kavi who was a great lyricist of modern Gujarat and who made several experiments with form and content in different genres has published his pictorial poems and pen pictures in prose in this book. Besides poems and poetic prose articles, it contains several pictures in blank verse of a special type which are called by him 'Apadyagadya' (neither verse nor prose). As there is variety of the forms of the pen pictures so also there is a variety in the subject matter. The poet in the introduction of the Book says, "This is a collection of pen pictures drawn on different occasions. In the book there are some historical pictures. Some are imaginary, some of them are about the best gems amongst men. Some are pictures of incidents. Some are about the special features of nature or art."

Of the pictures of historical personages are those of Maharaja Sayajirao Gaekwad, ruler of Baroda; Swami Dayanand Saraswati, the founder of Arya Samaj Sect; Kalapi, ruler poet of Lathi state in Saurastra. All the three are portraits in prose, but in all the three the poetic touch of Nahnalal can be seen. It is poetry in the garb of prose. Nahnalal was a student of history and so, in the life-sketches that he has painted we see a happy blending of history and poetry.

Amongst portraits in songs his song 'Gujarat' which he terms as a historical poem is the best. The poet in the songs on Gujarat, and on Charuvatika (a region in Saurastra) describes these regions in a historical perspective, their natural beauty, their people, their dresses, and great men like Dadhichi, Vasista, Bhrigu, Dayananda and Gandhiji who have contributed to their greatness. He imagines Gujarat as a fountain of flowers in the palm of India. He also describes the specialities of the region like the abode of lions in Gir forest; the ocean presenting a garland of pearls to the land.

Of the five pen pictures in Sanskrit two, Sarad Poonam (full moon day of autumn); and 'Shravani Amas' (moonless night in the month of Shravan), are pictures of the happy union of the earth and full moon and the pathetic condition generated due to their departure. In 'Sharad Poonam' the poet has painted two pictures simultaneously with the same brush. It is a unique performance in Gujarati poetry. The double painting process is continued throughout the poems.

His poems on 'Tajmahal' is full of images. The poet begins the poem with a number of interrogatives. He asks:-

Is this the pandal of eternal marriage?
Or is it a heap of ashes of love marriage?
Is this the crown of Mumtaz Oh! friend!
Or is it a resting stick of the birds of love!

Thus the poet in order to picturise a concrete object makes use of abstract images.

Pitrirarpan (homage to the father) is one of the remarkable poems of the poet. Though the poem is personal, because of the treatment of the subject, it is considered by some critics like B.K. Thakore as a tribute of the new generation to the old generation. Poet Nahnalal is considered a representative of new generation, who having ill-treated his father, representative of the old generation, asks for his forgiveness. In the poem, the poet just gives a pen picture of his father, who according to him, represents all that is best in Aryan culture.

His portraits in a unique neither-prose-nor-poetry (Apadyagadya) style also bear their special mark. Two portraits Saubhagyawati (married woman) and Navyayuvana (Young girl in adolescence) depict the bodily movements and poses, and from such movements the poet gives us the glimpses of their mental world. In the former the woman is painted as waiting for her husband, and after some time the husband arrives and their happy union is depicted. In the later poem the poet has depicted the adolescent girl in a pensive mood and asks the readers a number of questions as to the subjects of her thought, and then himself gives several clues.

C.M.

CHITRAGALU PATRAGALU (Kannada). A form of writing not very widely cultivated in Kannada is the literary pen-portrait. A.N. Moorthy Rao's Chitragalu Patragalu happily adds some precious pieces to that rather meagre volume of writing in that form. The first section of the book brings together letters written over the years to a dear friend and colleague and one or two at the end to his dear kith and kin. Even the letters help to build up a portrait of the friend addressed to as well as sketches of a number of other friends referred to so that the book as a whole turns out to be a live and lively gallery of portaits of his teachers and friends, elders and colleagues and others he admired for one reason or another. The personalities that figure in the first part are savants like B.M. Srikantiah and T.S. Venkannaiah who initiated and fostered the Kannada literary renaissance, well known professors like Radhakrishnan, teachers and senior colleagues like Rollo and Mackintosh, Gopalaswami who, though a professor of psychology, started the first broadcasting centre in the State, a political leader like Kengal Hanumanthaiah who, as Chief Minister, built not only the spectacular Vidhana Soudha, but also the not-so-spectacular but yet more important department for the promotion of Kannada literature and culture. It also figures some other less known teachers of his at school like Rev. R.W. Boot, Desikacahchar and D.N. Moorthy, who were all his educators in the best sense of the term. Moorthy Rao gratefully recalls that the last named teacher first taught him to love English literature of which he became an ardent student and finally a professor in his own college, making a mark for his fine and discriminating taste in literature.

No man writes about another unless there is something to attract and admire but since no man is perfect, a portrait would not be true to the original if it were only praise. It is easy to bestow praise but hard even to touch upon the limitations of those one admires. What brings life to Moorthy Rao's portraits is his open-mindedness which perceives both the lights and the shadows and the deft touch with which he handles both without making the former too bright and the latter too dark. B.M. Srikantiah's contribution to Kannada like his admirable scholarship in English literature receives due praise but not so admirable was his over-sensitiveness to criticism or his extreme subservience to authorities. Radhakrishnan's erudition was unquestionable and his elocution perfect but his authoritative stance was not altogether an unmixed blessing. Rollo was an inspiring teacher of English literature but he obscured his own good reputation towards the end by his imperialist postures. Mackintosh was a perfect gentleman of very few words. He had a fine sense of humour, but was too shy, "a sparrow among men", to make himself impressive. N.S. Subba Rao with all his magnanimity was as quick to explode as he was to cool down and, like a child, forgot all about his outburst. The only unflawed portraits are those of T.S. Venkannaiah who was goodness itself and of Gopalaswami who put him in charge of the broadcasting station and educated him in administration without seeming to do so; and K. Hanumanthaiah, the Chief Minister, whose deep concern for literature and culture was matched by the forthright steps he took to foster them. So the portraits come to life vividly and delightfully.

The letters to T.N. Srikantiah which form the bulk of the book were never intended for publication and so are characterised by a quiet informality, natural intimacy and even occasional impishness. Together they build up a portrait of TNS., the meticulous scholar, the sensitive critic, the generous friend who, contrary to outward impression, could be jovial and could crack jokes and enjoy them even when they were at his expense. So too came to life sketches of other friends that figure in the letters. With his typical lightness of touch and sly humour, Moorthy Rao makes his pages a delight to read and a pleasure to remember. The book won the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1979.

V.M.I.

CHITRAKATHA (Pan-Indian). The tradition of chitrakatha or narration of stories and legends with the visual aid of painted scrolls or panels has been known to prevail since ancient times in many regions of India. Many such pictures show-traditions have vanished but some have survived till the date. The chitrakatha proper as well as other pictorial ritual panels involves invocation of deities and ritual singing related to such panels. Connected with the painted panels was the whole mass of oral literary tradition which was transferred from generation to generation by the itinerant picture-story-tellers. The literature was an integral part of a folk-theatre-cum-picture-show.

Some of the earliest and most interesting references to such picture-showmen are contained in early Jaina literature. Bhagavati Sutra, a canonical text (3rd cent.), refers to the life of Mankhali Gosala, the greatest of the Ajivika teachers. There it is said that Mankhali Gosala was the son of a mankha named Mankhali. Abhayadeva (11th cent.), commenting upon the word mankha in the Bhagavati Sutra, says that it refers to a special type of mendicant "whose hands were occupied with a picture board". Aupapatika Sutra (3rd to 5th cent.) also mentions mankha (picture-showman) along with other performers. In its description of the Purnabhadra Chaitya, the Aupapatika Sutra states that the shrine was always visited by dancers, actors, rope-dancers, wrestlers, jumpers, mimes, story-tellers, rasa dancers, fortune-tellers, acrobats, picture-storytellers (mankha), instrumentalists, attendants and bards (magaha). Hemachandra, in the Abhidhana Chintamani, explains the word mankha as magaha or bard, but it is interesting to note that the above reference in the Aupapatika Sutra mentions both mankha and magaha and, therefore, perhaps these were two different kinds of performers.

Kuvalayamal (8th cent.), a Jaina text, refers to a wandering teacher (upadhyaya) who showed to a Jaina monk a painted panel of Samsarachakra, the cycle of the universe which continued depictions of the pains and pleasures of the human world, the heavenly regions, the involvement with various karmas and the different punishments in the hells.

Comparable to the reference to Samasarachakarachitpata are the descriptions of the 'yama-patas' of classical Sanskrit literature. In Vishakhadatta's Mudrarakshasa, there is a reference to a spy who disguised himself as a yama-pattika (picture-showman) and carried with him the painted scrolls of hell punishments. "He habitually entered the house of his patrons, where he displayed his yama-cloth, and sang songs, presumably of a religious type". Bana's Harshacharita also mentions yama-pattika and explains that they showed pictures and gave sermons on vice and virtue, reward and punishment.

In Vaddaradhana, a 10th cent. Kannada collection of nineteen stories from a Jaina prose classic, there is an interesting reference to a picture-showman performing in the market place of a town. The story of Sukumarasvami, in this collection, contains a description of a Brahmin minister and his daughter going to a Jaina monk. On the way she saw a man being taken to the gallows by the kings's guards. On inquiry it was found out that the victim was a picture-showman whose gang used to steal paddy from the bags of the paddy-merchants who were kept engrossed in the picture performance by the picture-showmen.

This account sheds light on the fact that such shows were arranged in market places and suggests that they were so absorbing that the audience even lost track of what was going on around them. Another curious point, apparent from the reference in Mudrarakshasa and Vaddaradhane, is that spying and stealing could be accom plished by picture-showmen, because they could get people engrossed in their pictures and take advantage of a situation where their attention was diverted.

From all these references in literature, dating from the 3rd cent., it is evident that the tradition of wandering teachers-cum-picture-storytellers was ancient and widely popular. It is interesting to note that even today in various parts of India there are wandering picture-storytellers who carry painted scrolls illustrating popular and regional versions of religious stories.

The Rajasthani picture-show tradition is predominantly connected with the legend of the folk heroes who lost their lives in the battle-field or in a plundering raid. Those men or women who died a premature death due to a snake-bite, disease, murder, battle or a plundering raid, received a special appeasement, because it was believed that a soul that departed suddently had many unfulfilled desires left in this world and therefore often came back and hovered around the settlement, where the person had lived. After going into trance, a bhopa (sorcerer) could identify and communicate with such a soul. Normally the soul demanded housing (shrine) and annual offerings, like a godling. This is how the various cults of the heroes and satis and the connected shrines came into existence. Most of the heroes and satis could be invoked at these shrines for consultations and guidance by means of songs of invocation mainly narrating the life-story and specially the highly glorified mode of death of the concerned deceased. In this manner a whole class of glorificatory oral literautre in the form of invocation songs came into existence. These songs were composed in verse and were handed down from generation to generation by the bhopas of the concerned shrines. The songs were a unique mixture of authentic incidents, legendary idealism, deification, cultic biases and pre-existing mythology and folklore.

In the case of local ancestors and satis, palila (a cultic memorial shrine) was erected and often a shrine constructed above it. But in the case of other warrior heroes such as Pabuji, whose popularity transcended a locality and became widespread over large regions of Rajasthan and the neighbouring states, not only large shrines were constructed in the villages of their origin and at several other places related to their life, but patas or painted cloth scrolls depicting the legend of their life were created and carried from place to place to organise picture shows with the accompaniment of oral narrative, singing, music and dancing. In addition to that of Pabuji, the painted panels of Dev Naryana, Ramdev Ramdala, Kisundala, Bhavani, etc. were prepared and narrated in front of an audience.

Pabuji lived in the 14th century and belonged to the Rajput clan of Rathod and hailed from Kolumand in Rajasthan where there is the main shrine dedicated to him. His story as painted on the pata and narrated by the bhopa is as follows:

An apsara, a water nymph, agreed to marry Pabuji's father Dhandhal on the condition that he would never have a secret glimpse of her when she was alone. The nymph bore a son called Pabu and a daughter called Sona. As Dhandhal broke his promise the apsara disappeared. After the death of Dhandhal Pabu's step-brother Budoji ascended the throne and his step-sister Premalde got married to Jindrao Khichi. When Pabu became a young man, he obtained a beautiful black mare from the Kachela Charans on the promise to protect their lives and cattle when required. For many years Pabu was involved along with his band of Thoris in cattle and camel lifting raids and counter-raids with the Bahelas, Sumras, Dodas, etc. Pabu invaded Sirohi and humbled the ruler, because the latter had humiliated Pabu's sister Sona, who was married to him. Similarly Pabu invaded the Dodas of Didvana and carried away their camels, because their daughter, who was Pabu's step-brother Budoji's wife, had jokingly challenged Pabu's valour.

Once Pabu attacked Dode Sumra to capture his camels as he had contemplated giving these as wedding gift to his step-brother's son Gogeji. As Pabu was returning with his captured camels and passing Umarkot of Sodha Rajputs (in Sind), the Sodhi princess saw him from the balcony of her palace and at once fell in love with him. Later on both got marred. But immediately after the ceremony Pabu reveived the news that his step sister's husband Khichi had attacked the cows of his Charan proteges. He fought with Khichi, restored the cows but did not kill him to prevent his sister from becoming a widow. But in a later battle with Khichi, Pabu died while fighting. The Sodhi princess became Sati after his death.

Pabu, the deified hero, is venerated by many communities in Rajasthan and its bordering areas, specially by the camel herders.

Painted cloth padas depicting the life-story of Pabuji are prepared by the Joshi and Chipa painters at Shahpur, Bhilwada, Chittor, Udaipur and Nathadwara. These panels which are between 15 and 20 feet long are carried to village audiences by the bhopas of Pabuji who narrate the legend at great length. Bhopa sings the stanzas and plays on ravan-hattha, a string-instrument while his wife repeats the stanzas and dances holding a wick-lamp in her hand.

The stanzas related to the narrative of Pabuji are known as Pabuji ke Pavvade. These are preserved in the still living,oral literary tradition of Rajasthan and sung by the Thoris and other communities.In order to get rid of misfortune and for prevalence of general auspiciousness, many people invite Thoris to come to their house or village and narrate the pavvadas of Pabuji. Pabu had lost his life while protecting the cattle of the Charanas and therefore as a token of gratitude the Charan poet Modji Ashia composed a large volume called Pabu Prakash, which is a significant work of Rajasthani folk literature. The doha, (couplets) of Pabuji composed by Ladhraj are preserved in manuscript form in Rajasthan Shodha Sansthan, Jodhpur. The latter institution has also published an edited version of the same work. The earliest date of writing of the manuscript is 1750 and therefore the author must have lived before this date.

Another panel involving an oral narrative is that of Dev Narayana. Dev Narayana is not so much a folk hero as a neo-Vaishnava incarnation. Dev Narayana was the son of Savai Bhoj, one of the 24 Bagadavat brothers. In return to the services rendered to a holyman called Babanath, Savai Bhoj acquired a lot of wealth from him. He with his 23 brothers went to Dwaraka to invest the fortune in horses. On their return they came to Ransahar where they offended the gardener of a royal park and quarrelled with a lady wine merchant. They were worshippers of Shiva and the Goddess Basag, the serpent king, who was offended by their partiality, complained to Vishnu. Vishnu came to punish the Bagdavat brothers, but was so charmed by the devotion of Savai Bhoj's wife Dadu, who came to worship him naked, that he promised to be incarnated as Dev Narayana through her womb. Then Vishnu requested the Goddess Bhavani to incarnate as princess Jayvanti or Jasvanti and destroy the Bagdavats. She appeared in the mountains and was adopted as princess by Raja Savar. When she grew up she expressed the desire to be married to Savai Bhoj, the eldest Bagdavat brother. But as destiny would have it, she was married off to the old Raja of Ransahar. But Jasvanti, secretly performed another marriage ceremony with the sword of Savai Bhoj and started to wait for the latter to unite with him as her husband. Finally the Bagdavat brothers prepared to march on to the old Raja. Jasvanti eloped with the Bagdavats. A battle took place between the two armies but on all occasions, Bhavani, the goddess, in the form of Jasvanti, came to the rescue of the old Raja. Due to Vishnu's desire and Bhavani's help all Bagdavat brothers were destroyed in the battles with the Raja. All the Bagdavat ladies became satis except Dadu. Vishnu kept his promise and took the incarnation of Dev Narayana through the womb of Sadu. With the help of the family bard Chochu, the surviving Bagdavat children were re-united. Dev Narayana married the daughter of the serpent Basag. At last all the property of Bagdavats was regained and the old Raja defeated by Dev Narayana.

Bagdavats were Gujars by caste and today the main followers as well as the bhopas of Dev Narayana are from the Gujar caste. However the bhopas from the Balahi, Rajput, Kumbhar and Gadari castes also narrate the pada of Dev Narayana.

When the epic of Dev Narayana is narrated with the help of the painted panel the main bhopa sings, dances and explains the legend while playing upon jantar, a three-stringed instrument constructed from bamboo and gourd.

The painted panel of Dev Narayana is usually from 20 to 40 feet long and the oral narrative could last the whole night or continue for several days. Most of the bhopas who are the carriers of the entire narrative on the tip of their tongue live in the Nagaur district. The epic of Dev Narayana or the Bagdavats is a formidable and valuable part of the folk literary tradition of Marwar.

In Gujarat, the Chitrakatha tradition is connected with Garoda caste of priests who officiate at the various ceremonies of the scheduled castes of Gujarat. Garodas were occupied with astrology as well as narrative singing connected with tipanu, a picture scroll. The paper scroll, painted in watercolour was roughly 14 inches broad and 168 inches long. It was divided into 19 panels containing pictures of deities, soul's journey after death and the punishments in the hells, as well as narrative illustrations of various puranic and local legends. Garodas who travelled from village to village gathering audiences, mainly women, narrated, partly in prose, partly in verse, the stories contained in the painted scrolls. In this respect they have been the prime carriers of oral tradition and local folk lore which they transferred, diffused and spread out. Though the Garodas are found all over Gujarat, the ones who painted the scroll and travelled all over for Chitrakatha narration came from the Palanpur-Vadgam areas of Banaskantha.

The first panel of the Garoda scroll depicts a temple. The second panel shows the personfication of the sun and the moon. In the third panel Ganesha, with his two consorts, is installed. The fourth one has Shiva and Parvati on the bull flanked by the images of Parvati as a Bhil woman and as a nati or street juggler. The fifth panel has the goddess Lakshmi. The sixth panel contains the narrative of Dhana Bhagat, who obtained great harvest by the grace of Vishnu whose ardent devotee he was. The seventh panel has the goddesses Bahuchara and Durga killing the Buffalo demon. The eighth panel has Kaliya-damana, Krishna's act of killing Kaliya, the serpent. The ninth panel shows Sravana's pilgrimage along with his blind parents and Dasharatha killing him. The tenth panel shows Sita in her cottage in the forest and Rama and Lakshmana hunting the two-headed deer. The eleventh panel shows Sita in Ashoka Vatika and Hanuman carrying the hill with herbs. The 12th panel has ten-headed Ravana and the 13th panel depicts the story of King Harishchandra and Taramati.The 14th panel shows Bhima shaking a tree to punish the Kauravas.The 15th panel has Sagalsa and Changavati grinding their son's head to feed a mendicant who was actually a god himself testing the worth of their devotion. The 16th panel depicts Ramdev Pir. The rest of the three panels show the soul's journey after death and the punishments in hells.

Partly entertaining but mainly ethical and didactic the oral tradition preserved by the Garodas is no doubt rooted in local mythology, beliefs and practices. Incidents from the Hindu epics and puranas are often parochialised and local deities, customs Sanskritised. For example the incident where Bhima shakes the tree to bring down all Kauravas is hardly mentioned in the original Mahabharata, but is described at great length in Vallabhram Surajram's popular Gujarati Mahabharata.

The story of king Harishchandra is so popular in Gujarat that the poets Nakara (16th century), Premnanda (17th century) and Ratnadasa (18th century) composed independent and extensive poems rooted in the local mythological background. Premananda composed independent poems on the themes taken from the Markandeya Purana, which was the source of the Harishchandra story. Due to his Gujarati rendering this Purana, the Devi Mahatmya, Sati Madalsa story and the Harishchandra narrative won great popularity.

One good example of how a folkore grows due to mingling of Sanskritic and vernacular traditions is evident in Ratnadasa's version of Harishchandra story. Here it is said that Vishvamitra taking the form of a wild pig destroyed Harishchandra's garden and then ran away into the forest only to be followed by the angry Harishchandra who was then drawn into the situation of patronising a marriage and thus losing his kingdom and wealth as the ritual gift to the bride. The incident of the wild pig has little puranic basis but is a formidable influence on Gujarati folklore literature. Similarly the puranic story of Mahisha-suramardini does not involve the role of the Gujarati goddess Bahuchara as found in the Gujarati narrative of the Garodas. Indeed the Garodas are the last carriers of this magnificent class of oral literature.

In Ahmedabad some Vaghri families prepare printed and painted textile pieces called candaryo or dhoti which depict the various goddesses as well as the local and puranic religious scenes and which are used as curtains to make a temporary enclosure for a special ritual worship of the goddess. The main goddesses depicted and worshipped through these pieces are Khodiar, Mommai, Vahanvati Sikotar, Visat, Meladi, Hadkai and Jogani–all local goddesses. At the time of navaratri or fulfillment of an oath the communities of the Bhangi, Dhedh, Ravalia, Thakarda, Vaghri, etc., create an enclosure with the pieces hung around a small shrine of the goddess. By singing the songs of invocation the singers and musicians invoke the goddesses in the being of a badva or sorcerer. These songs of invocation sung in the enclosure made by the pictorial textile panels are a very important but so far the least documented aspect of folklore literature of Gujarat. The various versions of the satis of Charan and the other castes, the stories of birth and exploits of different goddesses and the stories of their magical powers are contained in these songs. The songs also contain legendery accounts of local kings and their associations with various goddesses.

The Rathva tribals of Chota Udepur and Panchmahals paint the sacred legend of Pithoro on their house walls. At the time of painting as well as every year after painting the legend a badva sorcerer, goes into a trance and identifies the characters from the legend. On this occasion the legend of Pithoro is narrated. According to the legend Pithoro was born of an unmarried sister of Indiraja. Finally the child was brought up by the mother with the help of her brother. Indiraja organised an assembly of Gods and found out the real father of Pithoro. Pithoro, as he grew up, showed signs of divine powers of healing and specially those of healing cattle. Indiraja and Pithoro often came into conflict. Pithoro is an important god of the Rathva and his legend probably contains the primitive elements of a creation song and echoes of conflict between the Indra and Krishna cults of the Hindus. For this reason the painted and orally narrated legend is representative of an important class of literary tradition namely the 'creation song'.

Chitrakathi, the migrating community of story-tellers, were found once all over Maharashtra and some parts of Andhra and Karnataka. The Chitrakathi were a wandering folk, who earned their livelihood by going from village to village narrating various vernacular legends and showing the related paintings in the market places. Earlier a large stock of paintings was obtained from the town of Pithan and therefore the false nomenclature 'Paithan Painting' was popularly applied to them by earlier writers. Actually since the people who painted and narrated these paintings were called Chitrakathis and therefore the term 'Chitrakathi Painting' is more appropriate. For further classification one might use more specific nomenclatures such as 'Chitrakathi Paintings' of Pinguli or 'Chitrakathi Paintings of Paithan'. As the traditional picture show of the Chitrakathis has become extinct since a few decades, only fragmentary information on the subject is available. According to one source a tribe called Thakar came from Rajasthan in the 18th century to settle in Pinguli in Maharashtra and spread out from there to other nearby regions.

CHITRAKATHA

The Chitrakathi performers moved in a group of three or five people carrying a series of paintings connected with different folk stories, the epics and the puranas. Each painting, rectangular in shape, was twelve by sixteen inches in size and done in water colour on paper. Two paintings of correct sequence and order were pasted back to back. A stick was pierced between the two paintings so that by twisting the stick the audience could be shown the backside painting at appropriate moment of narration. The Chitraka thus used both verse singing and prose narration. The latter was in the form of a dialogue between the two narrators. Singing was accompanied by such instruments as ektara, and tambura.

The literary compositions utilised by the performers were partly rooted in the epics and the puranas and partly in the local vernacular traditions. Each set of paintings which illustrated one story or incident was called 'pothi', which consisted of several loose painted leaves. According to Sadvelkar some of these pothis were called Yuddhakanda, Lavankusa Akhyana, Nandi Purana, Indrajita Vadha, Panchavati Ramayana, Sita Suddhi, Dundubhi, Karna Parva, Balakanda, Hansadhvaja, Svayamvara, Vatsala Harana, Aranyakanda, etc. It is interesting to note that though the incidents are very much connected with the epics and puranas, a lot of local interpretations as well as local motifs and happenings of the regional mythology form the basic characteristics of the legends.

In the story of Arjuna's horse sacrifice and his son Babruvahana's battle against his own father, in the story of Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna and his wife Subhadra and that of Lava and Kusha the characters speak the local language, wear local costume, and are rooted in the local customs, manners and mythology. Parochial nature of the mythology involved in the Chitrakathi oral literature can be exemplified by the Lavankusha Katha. Queen Kaikeyi, the wife of Dasharatha,desired that Sita, after her return from Ravana's Lanka, should draw a portrait of Ravana as she was expected to have intimate knowledge about Ravana's physical appearance. Sita refused to do so fearing Rama's envy and anger. But finally only from the drawing of the toe of Ravana's foot done by Sita, Kaikeyi fabricated the portrait and showed it to Rama. Rama was so furious that he ordered Lakshmana to take Sita to the forest and kill her. Finally Lakshmana left her in the forest and showed Rama an artificial limb as a proof of her destruction.Sita found her way to the ashrama, hermitage, of the sage Valmiki where she gave birth to a son called Lava. Another son called Kusha was created by the sage from the bundle of kusha grass and presented to Sita by him. Once Lava went to steal a flower from Rama's garden and displayed his physical power leading to the happy reunion of Rama and his family.

The Bengali tradition of the Chitrakara, patua (painter) and jadupatua (magic-painter, also in Bihar), the itinerent picture-showman was the most widespread. This tradition drew very early attention of scholars and connoisseurs of art and as a result has been researched into by a large number of scholars.

The earlier scrolls were painted on cloth but most of the later ones were done on paper and occasionally pasted on cloth. The Bengali painted scrolls were vertical like those from Gujarat and Andhra but unlike those from Rajasthan which were horizontal.

Each scroll was divided into several horizontal sections with ornate dividing borders. "Some of the early scrolls (1800) show an awareness of Rajput and Mughal tonality, avoidance of suggestions of the third dimension and a calmly flowing line. . . . . scrolls painted as Hoogly call to mind qualities of Etruscan painting". (Stella Kramrisch).

The chitrakaras and the jadu-patuas carried these scrolls from village to village, unrolled them from top, verbally narrated the story depicted therein and begged money and grains in return. Traditionally the painters practised their art and operated as picture showmen in the areas of Murshidabad, Bankura, Burdwan, Birbhum and Midnapur. In addition to the village patuas and chitrakaras, travelling in the above regions there was a whole class of painter-cum-picture-showmen called jadu-patuas or 'magic-painters' operating among the tribal Santal in the Santal Parganas in Bihar.

Like the oral literary tradition connected with other picture-shows, the Bengali and the Bihari ones also derive as much from the epic and the puranic tradition as from their own regional mythology. The main theme of these paintings and the connected oral tradition are Krishnalore, Ramayana, the story of Shakti, the story of human sacrifice by king Nahusa, the story of Badekhan Ghazi, the story of Behula and Manasa, etc.

The narrative of Krishnalila follows the Bhagavata Purana tradition but differs in several details for example the motif of the pregnant Devaki's transfer to a safe island for her delivery when she was to give birth to Krishna; the mother and child guarded by wild animals like tigers and snakes; finally Kamsa killing the divine child and emergence of Narayana as incarnation of Vishnu are closer to local versions than the puranic ones.

In the Ramayana scroll the incident of Rama shooting the deer and Ravana capturing Sita is the most popular. In the folk tradition of Bihar, Orissa and even Gujarat it is customary to depict and describe the deer as a two-headed animal, the second head being representative of the demon inside it.

While painting and narrating the Shakti-pata, the patua does not only consider the most known puranic forms such as the killing Mahishasura but also incorporates local stories of the appearance of the goddess to a regional saint or a devotee. Sanskrit mahatmyas are not used but the local mahatmyas and mangalas of Sitala, Chandi,Manasa, etc., are sung by the patuas in praise of the goddesses.

The story of Badekhan Ghazi, also a local saint called Satya Pir, is heard with great interest by the Hindu and the Mulsim village population. In Rajasthan Ramdev and Pabuji are also described as Pirs. The story revolves around the might and miracles of the greenclad tiger-riding holy man whose tiger punished those who did not pay homage to the saint.

The legend of Behula and Manasa seems to be the Bengali version of the puranic story of Satyaban and Savitri. Here Behula whose husband died of snake-bite due to Mansa's anger was rewarded by restoration of life by the goddess Manasa due to Behula's devotion.

In contrast the jadu-patuas who operate in the tribal areas of Santal Parganas narrate at great length the Santal song of creation. Here it is described how the earth was created after a great deluge. Thakurjiu created the water creatures. Then he created a mound of earth on the back of a turtle with the help of a worm. From the eggs of a pair of birds the first human couple was born. Then Moran Buru, a Santal spirit, taught the art of making rice beer. After drinking rice beer the couple gave birth to seven boys and seven girls who became the ancestors of different Santal clans.

The Santal scrolls depicting the events of the Baha or spring festival of Santal involves the narration of fertility rites of spring; women holding Sal tree blossoms in their hair and dancing; the various bongas or Santal spirits who partially derive their conception from the Hindu description of Garuda, the vehicle of Vishnu, and Hanuman, the monkey leader and devotee of Rama; the creation of the first Santal couple and subsequent generation of this clan, etc.

Here too, the scroll and the story of Badekhan Ghazi is very popular. Some of the most popular Santal scrolls and the related narratives are connected with the lilas of Krishna. Such lilas as related to the forest and open natural life were chosen for the purpose and therefore Krishna's exploits as cowherd, his many loves, the rasa dance with many gopis, Krishna stealing butter and finally taking away the clothes of the bathing gopis are more popular than other lilas. It is interesting to note that the Vastraharana lila wherein Krishna steals the clothes of the bathing gopis merges with the Santal story of creation where the boys and girls go to the forest and the girls climb Banyan trees to pick fruits. This is one of the most appropriate examples of how a Sanskritic tradition is regionalised incorporating many regional myths and legends.

In Andhra Pradesh as well as in the surrounding states several chitrakatha and other related traditions existed. The most important narrative panels involving illustrations of katha, both puranic and local, included the hand-painted textile temple hangings and the chitrapata tradition. In addition to these the fabulously illustrated manuscripts of the Ramayana having a highly narrative character were also created, perhaps for a more private picture-show. Moreover, the wall-paintings at Lepakshi and other sites were of picture-show in that respect. In Andhra, Karnataka and Kerala there was also the famous tradition of leather puppets connected with public narration of stories. But above all Andhra Pradesh had a very important tradition of picture-show.

The devices used for narrative illustrations as well as the styles and contents of all these traditions from actual picture-show panels to kalamkari temple hangings and wall paintings were related to one another and have grown in the same geographic and cultural area.

In the actual tradition of the picture-show of Andhra Pradesh, the picture scrolls used were, and still are, painted on cloth. An average pata was about thirty feet long and three feet broad. The vertical pata was divided into several horizontal sections by thin horizontal ornate bands. In each section one or more incidents of the narrative were printed. It was common to depict the same character several times in the same section if the narrative so required. The patas of different communities such as those of farmers, washerman, shepherds, etc. contained different themes depending upon their religious and cultural convention. Ramayana, Krisnalila and Markandeya Purana were the most popular themes of these patas. Local versions of these stories exist both in oral as well as written traditions of Andhra Pradesh. The group of picture-show men travelled from place to place and, after gathering an audience at the instance of the patron, narrated the legend in prose and verse. One of the most beautiful and complete patas painted in the late 18th century, having the theme of a local Andhra Markandeya Purana, is in the collection of the Calico Museum of Textiles, Ahmedabad.

Kalamkari temple hangings (cloth panels hand-painted with dyes) too are very rich from the viewpoint of illustrated folklore and the lore of the epic and the puranas. Some of the most popular themes of kalamkari temple hangings are related to the iconographies of Vishnu, Shiva, Brahma, etc. in their various forms and legends.

A local version of Virata Parva of the Mahabharata is one of the most popular themes of these hangings. The story of Kichak vadha (killing of Kichak) from this, usually shows the incidents of Pandavas with Draupadi, working as cooks, musicians and servants at the palace of the king of Virata. Kichak, the brother-in-law of the king and the chief of army, gets infatuated with the beauty of Draupadi. Bhima entraps him with various tricks and finally kills him.

Another popular Virata Parva incident depicted on these hangings is that of Abhimanyu's marriage with Sasirekha wherein Krishna's brother Balarama's daughter Sasirekha, who was intended to be married to the son of the Kaurava chief Duryodhana, was finally married off to Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna, the Pandava ally of Krishna, through the latter's diplomacy.

Sita Kalyanam (the marriage of Sita) is still another legend, finding its way on to the textile hangings. Here usually the incidents of Rama's display of valour in exterminating the demons of Dandaka forest and finally wooing Sita and getting married to her are shown. While depicting or narrating this legend generally, the incident of Rama breaking the bow of Siva becomes prominent. But in the painted kalamkari version this important detail is eliminated and instead the scene of wooing her through delicate, romantic gestures and embraces are shown, which certainly is from the local mythology.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.L. Basham, History and Doctrine of Ajivikas, a Vanished Indian Religion, London, 1951, Irwin John, Margaret Hall, Indian Painted and Printed Fabrics, Ahmedabad, 1970., Jagdish Mittal, Andhra Paintings of the Ramayana, Hyderabad, 1969., Jyotindra Jain, The Painted Scrolls Of Garoda Picture Showmen of Gujarat, in the Quarterly Journal, National Centre for the Performing Arts, Vol. IX, No. 3, September, 1980.

J.J.

CHITRA KAVITA (Telugu). Ancients have divided poetry into 4 kinds: 'asu' (impromptu), 'madhura', 'chitra' (Variegated) and 'vistara' (elaborate). Thus 'chitra kavita' is one of the forms of poetry imported into Telugu from Sanskrit. Kavyalankara Chudamani, Lakshana Sara Samgraham, Appa Kaviyam, Narasa Bhoopaliyam, Lakshana Rajeeyam, Lakshana Deepika and other works described this form with examples.

Chitra Kavita was spread in Telugu literature by poets like Nannechoda and Palkuriki Somana. Jakkana, author of Vikramarka Charitra, says his grandfather Peddayamathya was an expert at the four types of poetry. He could spin poetry impromptu and perform poetic gymnastics. But today his works are not available. Some feel that Nannaya in his 'avatarika' or introduction to Bharatam mentioned these four types of versification.

Vartakavi Raghavayya in his Lakshana Deepika explains 'Chitra Kavita' as follows: hiding a line, twisting a stanza or a line, hiding a name, or a poem reading either way; writing 'Vrittas' with 'Kandam' and 'Githam' inside; 'chitra bandhas' or writing poems in strange patterns. Thus it contains as many poetic and verbal gymnastics as imaginable.

Modern scholars divide 'Chitra Kavita' into three types: 1) Sabdardha chitra kavita. This depends on sounds and the meanings of words. This has several kinds: 'ekakshari' (only one letter), 'dwyakshari' (two letters), 'thryakshari' (three letters): using all letters with the vowel 'a', 'e', or 'u'; without a nasal sound; labials, other than labials; and sounds pronounced without moving the tongue and many other gymnastics.

2) 'Bandha Kavita': placing the letters of a stanza in patterns of lotus and other such gimmicks. 'gomutrika', 'chatra', 'gutcha', 'naga', 'kankana', 'khadga', chakra', padma', 'Bhadra', 'Rasha', 'Pushpamala' and others are the popular 'bandhas'.

3) 'Garbha Kavita': one stanza containing one or more stanzas. Examples are varied. 'Champakamala' containing 'Kanda'; 'Seesam' containing 'mattebham' and 'gitam'; 'bhujanga prayatham' containing 'Sragvini'; 'marnigananikaram' containing 'Kandam', four types of 'Kandas'; then eight types; 'Krounchapada' containing 'rukmavati', 'Kamalavilasita' and two Kandas; 'Sarasijam' containing two 'Kandas' a 'neelotpala' and a 'manigana-nikara'; a 'seesam' containing a 'sragwini', a 'bhujangaprayata' and a 'drithavilambini', 'bhaskaravilasitham' containing two 'Kandas'.

These poetic gymnastics existed in the ancient Sanskrit literature although they were only the first two types and not the last. So we may as well declare that the last type, 'Garbha Kavita' is a speciality of the Telugu literature. Vinnakota Peddana was the first to list out the characteristics of this 'chitra kavita', and the next was Chitrakavi Peddana. The surname of the latter was 'Parsvamchala' but his wonderful skill in the said poetic form earned him the title 'chitrakavi' which in course of time became his family name. This is what a few critics feel. He wrote a book Lakshana Sara Sangraham and gave many examples of the various types of poetry mentioned above. He quoted examples from poetry for 'pada gopana'; 'Jagana chatushkandam'; 'Kalpitha Kalpavalli' 'padya bhramakam', 'pada bhramakam'; 'dwyakshari', 'garbhamangala maha Sri'; 'Laya grahi Saugandhi' containing 'vana mayura'; 'uthpala mala' containing 'Kusuma manjari', entire verses with words which only have the 'a' vowel sound, 'i' vowel sounds, 'u' vowel sounds; words with short vowels; and examples for 'Khadga bandha' and 'Chakra bandha'.

Chitrakavi Peddana introduced a new type 'Kalpita Kalpavalli–ka bandham': draw a pattern of twenty squares, five across and four down; write four 'Champaka malas' in the twenty squares; remove a few letters here and there according to a deliberate pattern to get seventeen more prosody like 'Pramitakshara vrittam', Aarya githi', 'Kandam', 'mani bhushanam', 'dritha vilambam', 'nagabandham', 'Kavikanthabhushanam' and others.

Coming after Appa Kavi, Ganapavaram Venkatakavi wrote a Chithrakavita prabandham under the name Prabandha raja Venkateswara Vijaya Vilasam.Sixty six verses out of the 808 which this work contains are written with the poetic gymnastics. Gudaru Venkata dasa Kavi's Prabandha Raja Sirobhushana Prakrishtha Balarama Charitra is noteworthy. Similarly Mandapaka Parvateeswara Sastry and Nadella Purushottama kavi of the recent times brought out such 'Chitra kavyas'.

But rhetoricians maintain "Prayena yamake chitre rasa pushtir navidyathe", meaning that where such jugglery is used, poetry fails to evoke 'rasa'; yet it must be admitted that this type of versification has carved for itself a special place in Telugu literature.

J.V.S.

CHITRA KAVYA (Hindi). Of the following three main divisions of Kavya (poetry)-Dhvani-kavya, 'Gunibhuta-vyanjya-kavya' and 'Chitra-kavya' the last is considered to be the lowest, the second and the third are considered to be of a higher order. In the first division 'vyanjyartha' (suggested sense) is pre-dominant and more charming than the 'vachyartha' (the expressed sense), while in the second it is sub-ordinate to or less charming than the 'vachyartha'. But in the case of 'Chitra-kavya' the suggested sense becomes indistinct-rather subdued -against the charm of one or many (i) 'Sabdalankaras' or (ii) 'Arthalankaras' (the figures of speech based on the aesthetic beauty of the sound or sense of the word respectively), or the construction of letters fixed for the framework of one of the following three gunas: 'madhurya' 'ojas' and 'prasad.' In short, 'Chitra-kavya' is based upon the pictureque use of the sound or sense of the word. Therefore, it is, of two kinds: 'sabda-chitra' and 'artha-chitra.' In Hindi literature, most of the poetry of Keshavdas (1555-1623) can be cited as the example of 'chitra-kavya'-especially in his works 'Kavi-priya' and 'Ramachandrika'. It may be noted that one of the 'sabdalankaras' is 'chitralankara,' but this one is not to be confused with 'chitrakavya'; 'chitralankara' occurs where the letters are arranged in such a way that they produce the form of a lotus, sword or drum, wheel, disc, etc.

Sa.C.

CHITRA KAVYA (Sanskrit). Literally Chitrakavya means 'Picture-Poetry' or 'Figure-Poetry' or 'Peculiar Poetry' or 'Variegated Poetry' (Chitra a picture, peculiar, variegated).

In poetic parlance, Chitrakavya is the lowest category of poetry having no dhvani, 'deeper or suggested sense' but charming only in its outer elements, diction or denotative sense or both. According to Anandavardhana all poetry worth the name must possess dhvani which is its soul; that which does not possess it is only an imitation, 'a picture' of poetry, hence the name.

The three varieties of Chitrakavya are (i) Shabdachitra (ii) Arthachitra, and (iii) Ubhayachitra. The last variety exhibiting ingenuity both of words and sense consists mainly of Prahelikas 'riddles'; and Kuta, 'poetic tricks'. The main components of Prahelikas are puns as well as respective order of poetic question-answers. In Kuta, the composer either conceals some elements (e.g. Bhavanishankaromesham prati pujaparayanah to be read as bhava anisham kara umesham prati, etc., meaning 'be always worshipful towards Shiva') or drops "half a syllable, one full syllable, bindu, visarga or a letter," and the reader or listener must find out the meaning of the verse.

The second variety comprises all the figures of speech of sense, particularly those based on comparison as these contain a bimba 'an image' or upamana 'a standard of comparison' leading to picturesque apprehension of the poetic subject. Brilliant images often constitute the highest order of poetry; labelling arthachitra, therefore, as the lowest category has been a little controversial. Appaya Dikshita has raised the status of figures of sense and Jagannatha assigns them to the medium and only verbal figures to the lowest category.

The first variety i.e. Shabdachitra or verbal peculiarity may occur either as shabdalamkaras or vilomakavyas or chitrabandhas. Shabdalamkaras 'verbal figures of speech' such as anuprasa (alliteration), latanuprasa (repetition of a word with difference in meaning due to the context), yamaka (chime), shlesha (pun), vakrokti (twisted mode of speech) are regularly defined and illustrated by eminent rhetoricians like Mammata and Vishvanatha. But the poets very often revealed an excessive fondness for verbal juggleries. They composed verses using only one consonant for each of the feet or the hemistich of a verse, or even for a whole verse; or composed verses with almost entire feet rhyming; or with chain rhymes; or with identical hemistiches with unidentical meanings and so on. There were Vilomakavayas ('reverse' poems) wherein lines read forward and backward gave either a complete stanza or a different meaning. Paronomastic poems narrated two or more (nay, once even seven) tales simultaneously; or the whole story was narrated without using even a single dental or labial or some other class of syllable.

But most ingenious and intriguing were the Chitrabandha compositions. They were either gatichitras (movement pictorials), or akarachitras (form pictorials), or bandhachitras (poetic designs). The first was an arrangement of letters showing certain movements like ardha—bhrama (half-foot movement), sarvatobhadra (movement in all directons), gomutrika (arrangement like the moving cow's sprinkling of urine), turagapada (steps of a horse), sharayantra (chess-steps), so that when we read the letters in an indicated order, the entire verse could be identically reconstrued. Similarly in the second variety letters could be arranged in certain patterns to give the form of padma 'lotus' or chakra 'wheel', etc.; or, in the third variety to give certain imagined shapes like chhatra 'umbrella', pataka 'banner', khadga 'sword', maraja 'drum' (-knots) and so on.

This was the proper domain of Chitrakavya. It combined scholarship, skill in handling language and poetic amusement. It was an excellent pastime in vidagdhagoshthis 'learned assemblies'. People with lesser imaginative faculty also could try their hand at it. Evidences of its popularity are found in the Time-riddles of Vedas, mystical riddles of Upanishads, kutashlokas as well as a variety of puns, rhymes and alliterations in the Mahabharata and Puranas, in the rhymes in Raghuvamsham ix of Kalidasa, in the chitrabandhas in Kiratarjuniyam xv of Bharavi and Shishupalavadham xix of Magha, in the five-fold paronomasia in Naishadhacharitam xii of Shriharsha, in the non-labial diction in Dashakumaracharitam vii of Dandin, in grammatical epic Bhattikavya of Bhatti, in the paranomastic double (Raghavapandaviyam) or triple (Raghavayadavapandaviyam) or even seven-fold (Saptanusandhanakavyam) narratives, or in the 'reserse' poems like Ramakrishnavilomakavya (narrating Rama-story, if the story is read forward, Krishna-story backward), in collections of enigmetical verses like the famous Vidagdhamukhamandana of Dharmadasa or Kavindrakarnabharana of Vishveshvara, and even in some verses of the 20th century Sanskrit works. Besides their popularity, the Chitrabandhas were considered indispensable in an epic in deference to its universality. Their employment in the battlefields in the epics has inspired a theory that their origin is in the art of arraying armies in various forms on the battlefields. But it is more likely that the practice of writing inscriptions on swords and leaves gave rise to this type of poetry.

The status of Chitrakavya as poetry has been debatable. Anandavardhana poses the problem thus: If suggestion is the soul, can a composition devoid of it be called poetry at all? Does it deserve notice? The answer is, since the practice of composing such poems is wide and prevalent, we must notice it. Dandin and Rudrata treat them properly, but Abhinava calls them akavya 'non-poetry', Mammata suffers it, Vishvanatha does not recognise it at all.

Another consideration is that there cannot be any poem without the suggestion of feelings. But if the sugggestion of feelings is not intended by the poet, it will be extremely feeble, almost as good as naught.

And the biggest question is if all Chitrakavyas are of the lowest category. This has been controversial, particularly in the context of figures of sense. Appaya Dikshita and Jagannatha have been moderate. Mammata characterises all sense-figures as mere 'turns of speech' vakrokti which is an essential ingredient of the concept of poetry according to Bhamaha and Kuntaka, and which is nothing else than I.A. Richards' 'emotive word'! To class arthachitras, therefore, as the lowest poetry would be nothing less than unfair. (Kalanath Jha: Figurative Poetry in Sanskrit Literature).

Second variety of the kavya type of Uparupaka is a musical composition, consisting of songs in various ragas and talas, meant to be sung to the accompaniment of the dance-abhinaya by a single person, and covering a complete story. (The first variety called ragakavya or kavya has songs all in one raga and tala). This and the first variety are termed as shuddhaprabandha and sutraprabandha respectively by Narayana who as well as his father Purushottama (court-poet of King Narayana of Parlakhimidi, 18th century.) composed some poems of both the varieties. But the best example of Chitrakavya is the famous Gitagovinda of Jayadeva whose wife Padmavati herself, it is said, rendered it into abhinaya.

R.N.

CHITRAKAVYAM (Malayalam). According to Sanskrit literary theorists, the term Chitrakavyam refers to verbal compositions devoid of real aesthetic beauty, especially those compositions which are either flat descriptive statements or clever verbal acrobatics. Chitrakavyams can of course be pleasing on a superficial level with their ornamentation. The real aesthetic impact is beyond its goal.

In Malayalam it would be very difficult to point out whole works as examples of the type. However, some of the works produced during the early Manipravala period like Anantapuravarnanam (early 14th century) could be said to belong to this type of versification. In it the poet describes the Sri Padmanabhasvami temple in Trivandrum and its surroundings. There are long sequences of quartets which are but either factual descriptions of various spots in the temple or listings of merchandise items displayed in the bazaar outside the temple premises. Nowhere in this Manipravala poem do the verses rise to the level of suggestiveness. This way of treating the poetic craft in a light manner can be seen in other early Manipravala works also. In Unnunilisandesa, for instance, the bazaar talks of various types of people are examples of flat poetry. If we scan through the literary works across the history of Malayalam literature, instances of 'flat poetry' can be cited even in the highclass compositions of master-poets. Cherusseri (15th century), Tunchat Ezhuttachhan (16th century) and Kunchan Nambiar (18th century) have all produced flat poetry here and there. The later poets including those of the present century are victims of this 'dry musings' once in a while.

The Yatrakavyams (poems describing journeys undertaken by authors), the Sandesakavyams (message-poems), the letters in verse, the Samasyapuranams (a kind of literary pastime where one poet publishes the last line or a portion of the same in a quartet inviting other versifiers to complete the rest), the manglapatpabra poems (poems composed to felicitate dignitaries or royalties, or to bless auspicious events) and many such compositions arising out of either the desire for imitation or out of worldly motivations are perhaps the best examples of Citrakavyams in Malayalam. The aksarasloka recitals have also contributed to the swelling of 'flat poetry' in Malayalam. Literary criticism in Malayalam, however, has not made use of this concept in a technical sense in evaluatory studies.

K.M.P.V.

CHITRANGADA (Bengali,) is one of Rabindranath Tagore's lyrical dramas which is, at once, the vehicle of a superb poetic thought and yet a well-knit play of unflinching grace and compactness.

The poet elaborated the antecedents of a somewhat mysterious nature that spurred his imagination on the occasion of the germination of the drama. Sometime in April, while returning to Calcutta from Shantiniketan, his eyes were dazzled at the colourful sight of the shrubs all around the railway line, beaming with flowers of various shades. Spontaneously he felt that, after a few days, at the end of spring, the season of flower would vanish yielding place to the hot summer. And it is the final culmination into fruitfulness, for which nature adorns herself with abundant colours and fragrance. In human life also, the season of flower, the youth, might achieve its fullness in calm and sober fruition. At once the difference between the environs of the mirthful spring and a rough and rugged summer seized the poet's imagination, and somehow it flashed into his mind that if a young lady came to discover that she had allured her consort merely with the physical charm of her youth, bereft of all the enduring graces of mind and soul, she might curse that shortlived bodily endowment of hers as a rival, baffling the innate fervour for an abiding companionship. Immediately the Mahabharata story of Chitrangada and Arjuna flashed into his mind, and the play emerged out of a sustained impact of the disjointed ideas. In June 1890 an outline entitled Ananga Ashram was written. After some fifteen months, in September 1891, at last the muse flourished in the lonely camp house of Pandua in Orissa. The poet, in 1936, rendered the same theme into a dance drama, one of the best of its kind, evolved by himself, through the fusion of music, dance and drama into a brilliant synthesis.

The theme was woven around the perennial question which exercised the poet's mind all his life and particularly in that part of his youth–what is love, what is beauty and what could be the basic stimulus behind an enduring and perfect man-and-woman relationship.

That is what emerged at the end of Chitrangada (1892) and to depict a concrete visual form of the abstract idea, Nature crept in spontaneously in a benevolent role, with sets of active figures resembling and aiding the pivotal human characters of the play. The interaction between the natural environs and personified figures thereof, and the human characters, unfurled, step by step, an unperceived mystery of passion, mirth, satiety, exhaustion and finally a new dimension of love emerging out of a mutual comprehension of true man-and-woman relationship, which instilled the play with an ever-growing penetrative dramatic interest. The blank verse with a beaming cadence of its own rendered a valuable handle in that illuminating process of fusing a lyric theme into a dramatic frame.

The plot runs thus: Arjuna, the third Pandava, reached Manipur while wandering all over India for fulfilment of a solemn vow. There Chitrangada, the Manipur princess, had an astounding encounter with him. The king of Manipur brought up his only daughter like a son; and thus she came to prefer masculine dispositions like war and hunting. One day, while Chitrangada and her associates, all in man's costumes, were on their way to a hunting pursuit, they suddenly found a man–strong and stout–lying on their way in deep forest, and Chitrangada commanded him to move away; but the fellow did not care. Enraged at that, she pushed him with the fine end of her bow and the man jumped up vigorously, but smiled, looking at the tender faces of the girls in masculine garbs. Chitrangada stunned by the masculine candour of the man accosted him for his credentials and came to know that he was Arjuna.

That brought a total change in the princess' disposition; she turned a feminine self out and out. Next morning she went to woo Arjuna in an unusual feminine dress; but her rough and rugged complexion, devoid even of usual feminine grace, evoked a flat refusal from Arjuna, who made his oath of celibacy a plea to that. Chitrangada, utterly disgraced, sought the benevolence of Madana, the god of love and Vasanta, his associate and craved for a day's grace, to make her as beautiful as was her sudden awakening into this bewildering feminine fervour. 'Celibacy of a man, celibacy of a Kshatriya', she groaned, 'would have to be smashed and smothered totally'.

Madana agreed to adorn her with the gift for a year and Vasanta assisted. The next morning, Arjuna saw an increbidly graceful feminine form, frolicking in a forest pool with her newly achieved beauty and he lost his heart to her instantaneously. Forgetting all about his vow of celibacy he wooed her, and Chitrangada cursed her lot violently—it was not for her, indeed, that Arjuna was breaking his own vow—but for those 'two blue—lotus eyes', for an embrace from those two 'butter—melted' tender arms, which were not Chitrangada's own; yet she could not resist herself and succumbed to the claims of the flesh and blood, giving away a woman's glory to no consequence. And the poet was flawless in depicting the mirth and passion of those physical encounters simply to contrive finally the unfathomable grace of the heart. The whole game turned intolerable for Chitrangada in no time, yet she could not desist. At last she sought escape from the burns of the 'fearful flame' with which she had been covered by Madana and Vasanta.

And as the year turned round Arjuna became tired of a pure physical attachment. Tired and disillusioned, he now was in a frantic search for that feminine grace which is not subservient to physical beauty alone, and Chitrangada emerged in her true self "I am Chitrangada, the Princess of Manipur–neither a goddess to be worshipped nor a mere female to be used or brushed aside as it pleases a man. If you care to have me as a comrade by your side in the path of danger and daring, if you let me share the great duties of your life, then only you will know my true self". And having come to know that, Arjuna confessed, "Beloved, my life is full".

The play has since been translated amongst other languages into English, French, German, Gujarat, Hindi, Kannada, Malayalam, Marathi, Oriya, Tamil and Telugu.

Gop.R.

CHITRE, DILIP PURUSHOTTAM (Marathi; b. 1938) remains a potent experimentalist in the post–independence world of Marathi poetry, short story and literary criticism, and now of films. He was born at Baroda. His father P.A. Chitre was the editor of Abhiruchi, a literary magazine. In 1951 the family moved to Bombay. Dilip took the B.A. degree examination of the Bombay University in 1959 with English Special. Then he worked as a teacher for three years in Ethiopia. On returning to India, he did his stints in the fields of advertisement, journalism, sales promotion, and in the Arts Section of the Indian Express.

His published works include collections of poems, Kavita (1960) and Kavitenantarchi Kavita (1978);a collections of short stories, Orphias (1968); an autobiographical travelogue, Shiba Ranichya Shodhat (1970). He has edited an anthology of Marathi poetry (1967). Besides, several of his articles in English and Marathi have found places in anthologies. A series of critical articles, 'Adhunik Kavitela Sat ched', two novelettes–Saphire and Rubhiraksha, translation of selected poems of Tukaram and Jnanadev (from Amritanubhava) await publication. Recently he has entered films and his experimental feature film, 'Godam' has won critical acclaim.

With the publication of Shabda he became the founder of the little magazines movement in Marathi. He belongs to the avant-garde generation in Marathi claiming affinity with the trends of surrealism and expressionism in the art world of Europe. Chitre has brought in fresh air into Marathi poetry and fiction.

Chitre is reckoned as a major figure in modernistic Marathi poetry after B.S. Mardhekar. He showed precocious but genuine poetic sensibility that bore the hall mark of mature modernity. With intuition and industry, he assimilated into his native sensibility the finest features of the western aesthetic tradition, not restricting himself only to the British or the American. He tried to reconcile with remarkable conscientiousness the heritage of the West with native traditions, exhibiting an agonising search for identification inevitable to educated Indians vigorously exposed to western culture. This process is clearly reflected in the short stories, personal memories, travel accounts and poems of Dilip Chitre. This is what distinguishes him from poets of sheer literary sophistication who keep on spinning webs of fantasies in midair. It is precisely for this reason that Chitre remains a genuine modernist in Marathi literature.

M.D.H.

CHITTA LAHU (Punjabi) is Nanak Singh's first popular novel, published first in 1932, later going into dozens of subsequent editions.

Rodu–a juggler–finds a forsaken child behind a bush, whom he adopts and brings up into a young beautiful girl, Sundri–the heroine–comes into contact with young Bachchan Singh–the hero–a devoted idealist very much interested in the reformation of his village. He starts a school in the Gurdwara for giving free education to the children, but due to his villagers' conservative ideas about untouchability, Sundri is denied this facility. Bachchan Singh teaches her privately and in due course of time, they develop love for each other. Bachchan Singh wants to marry her but is prevented by Pala Singh–group-leader of the village-vagabonds, addicted to wine and opium. Pala Singh himself has an eye on her. Not succeeding in his designs, Pala Singh implicates Bachchan Singh in a murder case.

Karam Chand, a hypocrite Brahman of the village plays foul with a young widow Gurdai of the village. The maltreatment and injustices by the society compel Gurda to adopt the profession of a dancing girl under the name of Anwarjan. During a marriage celebration Sundri comes into contact with Anwarjan—whom she wanted to dissuade from giving her dance-items in the village. During their conversations Anwarjan (Gurda) comes to know that Sundri is none-else but her own forsaken daughter.

Bachchan Singh is ultimately hanged and Sundri vows to avenge his death by killing Pala Singh. In her attempt to kill Babu Sham Dass, a station master to avenge her mother's miseries, she finds him (her father and Gurdai's first husband) a completely changed man and ultimately forgives him.

Chitta Lahu has literary as well as historical importance in the annals of Punjabi novel. Although the author had earlier contributed some novelettes, yet this was his first major achievement, which like a milestone, showed the Punjabi novel the path of realism. The portrayal of Punjabi life, individuality of characters, their variety and proper psycho-analysis, alongwith a double well-knit plot, interspersed with dramatic situations and dramatic-irony, are praiseworthy. The entire novel has been written in an ironical style, making it an effective satire on the wrong doings of society of the time.

S.S.U.

CHITTAL, GANGADHARA (Kannada, b. 1923) is one of the major voices in Kannada Navya Kavya ('Modern' poetry.) After a brilliant academic career he joined the Central Government Services and ultimately retired as the Chief Auditor, Western Railways.

His literary career spans a long period of four decades during which Kannada poetry underwent many transformations. His output though confined to three volumes, is remarkable for its quality. Kalada Kare (1948, The Call of Time), his first venture in poetry is a tiny volume full of adolescent effervescence and idealistic fervour. But a poetic bent of mind and a talent for versification are evident. However his next two collections i.e. Manukulada hadu (1961, The Song of the Human Race) and Hariva a niridu (1970, This Water that flows) established him as a poet of the first order.

Chittal is distinct in his thematic range and stylistic originality. His major pre-occupations are with the eternal themes of death and sex. He approaches sex with a combination of total involvement and cool detachment. His long poem, Kama sutra celebrates sexual love in all its dimensions. His musings over the meaning of life and death have crystallised in a series of poems based on personal experience. His style is full of rhythmic variations though in a leisurely, loose-knit way. He has forsaken the dialectic variations preferring to exploit the possibilities of the standard language.

Kirtinatha Kurtakoti devotes an entire chapter to Chittal's poetry, in his Navya Kavya Prayoga (1963). But a deep analysis of this poet is long overdue.

H.S.R.

CHITTAL, YASHYANT V. (Kannada; b. 1938) is a short story writer and novelist. He was educated at Hanehalli, Kumata, Dharwar and New Jersey. He is now the Marketing Director of Hylem Bakelite Ltd. His first collection of stories Sandarshana (Interview, 1957) is indicative of his later writings which have both rural and urban backgrounds. He exhibits a mastery over the colloquial as well as the literary idiom. In his second collection of stories Abolin (1960) the title story is of an innocent girl who is destroyed by her own innocence. Innocence facing harsh realities of life ends in tragedy in many of his early stories. Details serve in his stories like images in a poem. U.R. Ananta Murthy goes to the extent of saying that the best poetry in Kannada is to be seen in the prose of Chittal and Lankesh. Abolin contains another story 'Aparichitaru' a kafkaesque nightmare which is symbolic of the childhood fears of the narrator, which visit him in the form of dominating strangers. His third collection Ata (1969) with an introduction from Gopalkrishna Adiga claims a place of importance for Chittal. Ayda Kathegalu (Selected stories) came out in 1976. His latest collection Kathe Yadalu Hugudi (The girl became a story, 1980) is so far the best collection he has produced. In these stories Chittal enters into a creative dialogue with the current fashion setters who simplify life either from an extistentialist or from a progressive point of view. He shows the limitation of the symbolic mode which abstracts life beyond recognition. He demonstrates that current literary taste is spoiled by slogan mongering of writers who are confused between caste distinctions and class distinctions. The naivete of this trend and the barbarism which might ensue from it are the themes of these stories.

Chittal's first novel Muru Darigalu (Three Roads 1964) tells the story of an innocent girl who is conscious of her innocence and to guard it and protest against the whispering campaign that tarnishes her image, she commits suicide. It is a story set in the author's place of birth, Hanehalli. His recent novel Shikar (The hunter 1979) has been widely discussed and considered to be one of the best novels of the decade. It is the story of a man from Hanehalli who is an executive in a Bombay firm. The intrigues that surround him and vague accusations made against him remind him of the nightmare world of Kafka. The world depicted in the novel is a cruel world of competition, selfishness and greed. It is a world where the innocent are hunted until they accept defeat and become puppets in the hands of the corrupt bosses. In a moment of disgust the hero resigns his job, but the corrupt bosses are afraid that he would expose them. They try to tempt him with a promotion, but he declines their offer. The hero who was in the beginning like a confused and terrified animal, because he did not know his own past, accepts his past in a moment of grace. Having learnt about his past, he is no more afraid of it. He decides to go in search of his runaway brother and lost sister. It is a rare piece of writing in which the choice is made to be human. Here is the vision of a man, who voluntarily gives up his craving for success in the competitive world, who voluntarily stops fighting for territorial supremacy and who goes in search of significant human relationships. Chittal has shown new possibilities of the novel. Chittal got the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1983.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.M. Nayak, Samikshe, 1967; K.D. Kurtakoti; Yugadharma Mattu Sahitya, 1962; R.S. Muguli, Kannada Sahityada Itihasa, 1963.

Su. N.

CHIVARAKU MIGILEDI–CHOKHAMELA

CHIVARAKU MIGILEDI (Telugu) is a famous novel by Bucchi babu, who is second to none in the technique of probing the psychic depths of a character. Depicted in this novel is the inner conflict of the hero, Dayanidhi. The novel is a series of conflicts between Dayanidhi's nature and the situations he is caught up in. Bucchi babu has closely studied psychological workings in the human mind in different situations and wrote this novel accordingly. One can see in Dayanidhi's character how incidents from the past influence the present life of a man.

The novel has Dayanidhi as its central figure. The many characters that he comes across, several resultant problems he faces, various experiences he gains, and a series of defeats he encounters that leave him alone in the society and acquire a philosophical attitude make the novel interesting. The main incidents that turn the hero towards a philosophical path have been connected with women characters like his own mother, and women like Komali, Sushila, Amritam, Nagumani, Indira, Shyamala, Katyayani, Rose and others. Their psychologies and strange behaviour puzzle the hero and he is not able to decide the course of his action.

The writer has split the hero's experiences into eleven stages. In the first stage we see the conflict in Dayanidhi between his love for his mother, and the biting criticism of his mother by others. In the end he accepts his mother and stands up to her ideals and as a result he has to stand alone in this unfriendly, and unsympathetic society. He is not able to accept any one who criticises his mother. It is only Amritam who has a word of sypathy for his mother, which touches his heart but for a brief moment.

If one observes closely the plot construction, one can see with what tender care the author has sketched the several stages in the hero's journey through life, the several turns he has taken in his attempts to reach the goal and the goal he has finally reached. The one truth Dayanidhi learns in his struggle in life is that it is far better to hate the weakness of a man than the man himself.

In his foreword, briefly narrating the story, the novelist writes how the hero cannot fit into the environment of the 'circar' districts; how he is made lonely by circumstances, how he makes a fresh start in Bayalaseema where fortune smiles on him quite unexpectedly; how again the forces and experiences from the past surround him and he is swept off in a current of loneliness; how he somehow escapes from there with life intact to turn a new leaf; how he can fulfil nothing in his life, but life can never throw him in despair though it might defeat him. The writer says that the crux of the novel is individual emancipation. The writer feels that the real tragedy in life is not being able to love. In this novel the writer views from various angles the psychological aspect of how the evils of the elders cast a heavy shadow on the lives of the young and curb the life's tendency to flourish.

Each of the many women that walk into the hero's life has a distinct feature. Komali has physical attraction; Amritam has companionship and love; Sushila has education; Indira has social acceptance. The ideal womanhood should be a synthesis of all these, but he does not come across such a woman. Hence his philosophical attitude. As a result of many external and physical defeats the hero forgets the surroundings and turns inward quite successfully.

Butchi babu has an instinct for poetic expression. Some of his sentences in the novel therefore, are unforgettable. To cite a few: Desire kills a man unless he derives comfort in imagination. 'Don't commit crime, for if you do, this graceful society blames you only for being caught doing a crime'. 'Those who desire to be, and struggle to be better than others are the real enemies of social progress'. 'A woman accepts a man for the sake of marriage and a man accepts marriage for the sake of the woman'.

Lines like these are innumerable. Suffice it to say that this novel is the masterpiece of a master-mind who has done it seriously. He was a painter too. Even a casual reader will have flashes of the artist in the delineation of characters. One admires the wonderful unfolding of the psyche of the characters. Above all, Bucchi babu is unparallelled in his art of characterisation and of story telling.

K.S.S.

CHOKHAMELA (Marathi, 14th century) belonged to Mangalvedhe, near Pandharpur and turned to the path of devotion because of abject poverty and social injustice done to him and his family by the then orthodoxy. His whole family consisting of himself, his wife Soyara, son Karma and sister Nirmala, came under the influence of Namdev, the leader of the bhakti cult of Pandharpur. Being an outcast, Chokha was denied entry into the temple of god Vitthala in Pandharpur. Instead of making a grievance of it, however, he continued to pray internally and composed devotional songs of exceptionally high calibre. This is how he speaks about himself and his intense devotion to God:

"A sugarcane may be crooked, its juice is not crooked.

A bow may be curved, and yet the arrow is not.

A river may have windings, and yet its water is even.

So also, Chokha may be a pariah, but his heart is pure."

The 'Johar' poems of Chokha tell both about his sincerity and the social injustice from which he was suffering. He preached the way of bhakti to all and sundry in the following manner:

"Clap your hands, raise the banner and tread the path to Pandhari, which is the open market of liberation for devotees to meet.

Flocks of banners have come together,

And the whole bank of the river Bhima is resounding with the name of God,

Let the vile and the villanous come and go back purified, proclaims Chokha."

Chokha has written about 350 abhangas which are full of devotional fervour, sincere humility and social consciousness. The other members of his family have also contributed to Marathi literature. Chokha thus stands as a unique representative of the downtrodden.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Khandekar and M.S. Kanade (ed.): Santa Chokhamela, Abhangavani, Pune, 1981., S.B. Kadam (ed): Santa Chokhamela Yanche Charitra va Gatha.

S.G.T.

CHOKHER BALI (Bengali, 1903) is Rabindranath's fourth novel, which was first published serially in Bangadarshan, a literary monthly of repute, revived after the death of its founder-editor Bankimchandra, under the editorship of Rabindranath, during the period 1901-1902. It had been written about a year back and in its draft form, it bore the title of Binodini. While giving it a final shape before publishing the novel in the monthly Bangadarshan, Rabindranath preferred a suggestive name Chokher Bali for the novel. It was published in book form in 1903 from Calcutta.

Chokher Bali, translated into English by Krishna Kripalani, was published under the title of Binodini in 1959 by the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi. It was also translated into some other foreign languages, viz., Russian (1959), Chinese (1961), etc. and into most of the Indian languages like Hindi, Gujarati, Kannada, Malayalam, Marathi, Punjabi, Sindhi, Tamil, Telugu and Urdu. A transliteration in Devanagari script with footnotes in Hindi was also published by the Sahitya Akademi in 1961.

The story centres round Binodini, a young widow of exquisite beauty and imposing personality. She had her early education from an English lady, that gave her an independent, prejudice-free outlook on life.

Though a widow, she would not practise the austerities enjoined by the social customs. For sometime she made it her mission to avenge herself on Mahendra, who refused to marry her and who was not only the cause of her misfortune, but also an insult to her womanhood. And this she could do very easily. Asha, Mahendra's wife, was really 'an inexperienced girl, a mere doll' in comparison to her, and with the magic spell of her charm and beauty, Binodini easily won over Mahendra. But ultimately she realised that life needed something else for its fulfillment. And that was the love of a real man, whom she discovered in Behari, Mahendra's friend. The author might, however, be said to have betrayed some hesitation in keeping Binodini and Behari apart at the end.

With such a heroine as Binodini struggling for her human rights, with the author's emphasis on psychological realism, with a group of real men and women, Chokher Bali stands out as a pioneering work in the realm of Bengali fiction.

Dh.D.

CHOMANA DUDI (Kannada), an important novel by Shivaram Karanth, was first published in 1933. Since then there has been several editions of Karanth's classic. The short novel depicts the tragedy of Choma, a 'mari holeya', one of the lowest untouchable sects of Dakshina Kannada in Karnataka, who had to be content with mean little jobs like grazing cattle, weaving baskets, or fetching foliage for the landlord for meagre rations. They had to subsist partly on leavings of the dead cattle. Choma's tragedy is the result primarily of the conflict implicit in the refusal of the tradition-bound upper-caste to accord the status of tenants to 'mari holeyas' and Choma's unwillingness to sell the pair of bullocks he has reared to plough the land not tenanted to him, an unwillingness born of a strong, almost elemental desire to cultivate a piece of land of his own. Choma who is past fifty-five would not dispose of the three year old bullocks to free himself from debt; instead he sends his two grown-up sons to work in the tea plantation. The sons, like the father, take to drinking and the debt, a paltry sum of twenty rupees, remains unpaid as is usual in such cases. A sequence of misfortunes strikes the family; the younger son Gurva, elopes with a Christian girl; the eldest, Chaniya, dies of fever on his return from the estate; the daughter, Belli, subsequently falls a prey to the overtures of the steward Manvela Souza at the plantation where she has joined as coolie after the failure of her brothers to clear the debt; the youngest son Neela is drowned, with some of the onlookers preventing the timely rescue by a Brahmin youth since it would involve his defilement by the holeya's touch.

Karanth treats Choma with sympathy, depicts him as a human being with an identity of his own. Choma's distinctive identity lies both in his quest of a piece of land, and in his 'dudi', the primitive drum he is seen beating regularly. The rhythms of the dudi, like the 'te-te-te' to which Belli sometimes sings in accompaniment, reflect the monotony of the routine within which society seeks to confine the 'mari holeyas' and the frustrations which alone punctuate the routine when an individual like Choma dares propose a deparature from convention. Choma's 'dudi' may be both compared and contrasted with the violin of Nagaveni in Karanth's Marali Mannige, for while tragedy draws out in the two characters the artistic potentialities inherent in human nature, the difference in the temperament and their rhythms is a pointer to the respective positions Choma and Nagaveni occupy in the caste-class hierarchy and also to their qualitatively different responses to the crises. Though Chomana Dudi appeared in the early thirties the controlling impulse in the novel is neither romantic nor reformist. Despite Karanth's sympathetic handling of Choma's aspiration and of the profound impact its failure has on him, the novel does not overlook the limits set by history and tradition to individual initiative. Choma has to pay a price for having pitched his aim higher than what is feasible in his environment and, given his addiction to drink which is not unrepresentable of his class, he has little chance of redeeming himself from debt once he rules out the sale of the bullocks. Tragedy inevitably follows.

With the powerful evocation in the opening passage of the novel of darkness in the deep interior of the forest interrupted significantly by the 'dudi', the appropriate atmosphere is set for the tale where the sequence is predominantly dark. The depiction of the varying responses to the different phases of the village car-festival is also not without significance: the recurring festival functions as a cloak to indicate the maturing cycles of misfortune, and appropriately so, since the car festival works in complex ways on the rural Hindu psyche and signals to it the termination of an annual cycle and the beginning of a new. Chomana Dudi traces the disintegration of the protagonist's well-knit family (where the sense of the harmony was initially like that of 'the petals in a flower') in Bhoganahally, a small village steeped in poverty and superstition, where Choma surrenders almost daily a major part of his meagre earnings at the liquor shop before he goes home to sit before the dudi. And Sankappayya, the brahmin landlord, appreciates as he does Choma's earnest request for land, although he cannot but submit to his mother's counsel against granting tenancy to the 'mari holeya' on the ground that it is against established practice. As the scene shifts from Bhoganahalli to the plantation in the hilly tracts to the east, it becomes clear that in the Christian controlled colonial estate the set-up is as hierarchical and inhuman as the one in the village below: the cells built for the coolies are more like stables, with the liquor-shop to ensure that the coolies do not leave the plantation free from debt; and neither the white master nor the supervisors are averse to taking advantage of the helpless coolie women like Belli.

At one stage in the novel, Christianity which offers land to the converts, appears to Choma as the only way out. But he has to contend with native deities to whom his family has owed allegiance from time immemorial and whose 'wisdom' he cannot ultimately dispute. He seems to hear, at the critical moment, the voice of Panjurli, an awesome spirit, which reminds him that Christians, like others, are also subject to the sorrows and joys of life. As Choma returns home chastened, it is the sight of Belli seated on the mat with Manvela Souza that finally breaks him and his long cherished vision. He takes the bullocks to plough the master's land, leaves them at the very spot in the forest where he had found them as heifers, breaks the plough and sets fire to the heap of pieces. He recognises the human element and the compulsions that have led to Belli's fall and acknowledges his own lapses which contributed to it. This time, he starts beating the 'dudi' with unprecedented fury. The novel closes with the silence that ensues. The final passage of Chomana Dudi, the humanist work in which the use of language is subtle and evocative, is replete with suggestions and reverberates with overtones. Belli, frightened, runs to the partially closed door:

"The bullocks stood across the door. They had followed Choma home. Badu, the dog, was also there. Belli brushed past the dog and went in. In the faint half-light she could see Choma's 'samadhi.' The 'dudi' held fast, the upraised hand, the ecstatic fury–everything is as it is. But Choma is no more."

B.D.R.

CHORGHADE, WAMAN KRISHNA (Marathi; b. 1910) is a major short story writer and scholar in folk literature. An M.A. (Marathi & Econimics), B.T. of Nagpur University, he taught in College of Commerce at Wardha upto 1949; shifted to Nagpur's G.S. College of Commerce and Economics where he rose upto its Vice-Principalship (1949-70). Later he worked as the Director of University Text-book Committee (1970-80).

Brought up in rural surroundings, Chorghade developed interest in folk literature. While at Wardha, he came under Gandhian influence, and was imprisoned in the 1942 national movement. These influences are reflected in his writing which consists mainly of short stories. He has devoted himself to the form with singlemindedness and has developed a variety characteristically his own.

Most of his stories are collected in Sushma (1936), Hawan (1938), Yauwan (1941), Prasthan (1945), Patheya (1946) and after a long gap in which he remained silent, in Sanskar (1950), Pradeep (1954), Onjal (1956), Majal (1963), Bela (1964) and Khyal (1973). Sampurna Chorghade is a collection of his selected stories.

Chorghade stands as a link between the romantic writing of Phadke-Khandekar era and the realistic short story developed by Gadgil, Gokhale and others after World War II. He freed the short story of its plot-bound, technique-ridden framework, popular with earlier generation. He rejected these mechanical contraptions and wove his stories around small incidents filling them with a great deal of moralising, personalised stuff. Though they had a loose framework, they were neat, highly lyrical and articulate. Sometimes they were very thin, and they took a form close to personal essay.

But he did not free the story of idealistic make-believe and sentimentalism. After the emergence of the 'new' story as the aftermath of World War, he chose to remain silent, but reappeared not in a very different garb.

He stuck to his idealistic approach and overlooked the ugly and seamy side of life. Life's ship, according to him, has floundered, but not yet sunk, and this is the theme of his later stories.

Chorghade's other publications include–Sahityache Mooldhan (1938)–essays on folk songs of Vidarbha region, written in collaboration with the Gandhian writer Kaka Kalelkar; Champarani (1944), Prabhawati (1945), Aboli and Bhagyawati (1950) are folk stories retold; while Ahimsechi Sadhana (1945), Ahimsa-Vivechan (1949) are translations. He has edited and translated works numbering 74, chief among them being Marathi Hindi Kosh with Madhav Sawant as co-editor. His latest publication is Jadan Ghadan (1982) covering the main events and the personalities he came across that influenced his life.

Chorghade has won several awards and honours. His story collection, Patheya and Pradeep brought him awards from the Govt. of old M.P, while Sampurna Chorghade won Banga Sahitya Sammelan's Yugantar Award, and a gold medal from the Nagpur University (1967).

He was president of the Vidharbha Sahitya Sangh, a member Marathi Mahamandal, and was also president of Marathi Sahitya Sammelan.

I.S.

CHOTRAYA GOPALA (Oriya, b. 1918) is a famous Oriya playwright. The impecunious circumstances of his family and his early interest in the theatre prevented him from receiving much formal education. He began his career as an actor-member of an amateur theatre group. In 1940 he joined a professional theatre company called the Bharati Theatre performing then in Manikghos Bazar, Cuttack. The actor-turned-playwright wrote his first one-act play, Sahadharmini (wife) in 1941.

Later most of his plays were staged by two other professional theatre companies, the Annapurna theatre and Janata Theatre of Cuttack. He was also associated with the All India Radio, Cuttack, and worked as a producer in its Drama Section, from which he retired in 1977. Chotraya is one of the chief architects of post-Independence Oriya drama, the others being Kartikakumara Ghose, Adwaitachandra Mahanti, Bhanjakisor Patnaik, Ramachandra Misra, Kamalalochana Mahanti and others. Oriya drama before them dealt mostly with historical and mythological subject-matter and its chief aim was patriotic propaganda. There were of course, a few plays depicting such social themes as untouchability, prohibition and women's liberation, etc., Kalicharana Patnaika's Bhata (Rice, 1943) for instance, dealt with the problem of food scarcity which Orissa faced in 1943. The play was a great success. Social realism became the principal mode of dramatic art in the post-Independence era. Playwrights like Chotraya were acutely aware of the numerous problems that had cropped up in the Indian society at the advent of independence. They also became familiar with Marxist and Freudian ideas and with the experimental theatre of Ibsen, Strindberg, Chekhov, Shaw and others. Chotraya's first full-length play Pheria (Come Back, 1946) was staged by a professional theatre company, Annapurna Theatre, 'B' Group, Cuttack in 1946. The play ran to packed houses for several months. Pheria celebrates the triumph of Gandhi's programme of village reconstruction and welfare through its central character Suresh's return from the town to his village where he devotes all his time and energy to the welfare of the people. The play is not entirely free from sentimentality and melodrama. But its sensitive characterisation and its realistic and precise dialogue are its plus points. Bharasa (Reliance, 1952) is a very different kind of play. Its central character is a poor, idealistic painter called Mohana who is helpless before the ill-treatment society metes out to him. The play examines the role of the artist in society and the aim of art in a manner similar to that of Bhajakisor Patnaik's Jayamalya (The Garland of Victory, 1956), although its artist-hero Braja is very differently conceived. Bharasa has a flawed structure, it poses the questions alright, but fails to resolve them. The last three scenes are insufferably melodramatic. The success of the play lies in the complexity of its characterisation especially of Kumar Saheb and Mrinal.

Next is commercially a very successful play, Parakalama (The Quill Pen, 1954). It traces the rise and fall of one Acharya, a politician, whom power corrupts absolutely. In the last scene in which he is arrested, his characterisation verges on the tragic. The conflict between capital and labour is the theme of Pathikabandhu (The Friend of the Wayfarer), one of the three plays published in 1955. The other two, Sankhasindura (Bangles and Vermilion) and Nasta Urbasi (The spoilt Urbasi) are about two girls, Madhabi and Urbasi, and their search for their essential human identity through love and suffering. Abhaginira Swarga (The Salvation of the unfortunate Women, 1957) deals with the dowry system. Ardhangini (The Better-half) which received the State Sangita Nataka Akademi Award presents the psychological study of a woman torn between her love for her son and her duty towards her husband. Chotraya's other full-length plays include Sadhana (Perseverance, 1965), Ghataka (The Astrologer), Sriharika Samsara (The World of Srihari 1974) and stage adaptations of Oriya novels like Jhanja (The Cyclone), Abhinetri (The Actress), Amadabata (The untrodden Path), Malajanha (The dead Moon) and Pratibha (Genius)–all published during 1956-60. In addition to these he has written a number of radio-plays and one-act plays. Sakhaprasakha (1977) is his latest collection of one-act plays.

Chotraya's drama is noted for its wide variety of themes, its social criticism, its realistic characterisation and for its witty and powerful dialogue. In some of his major plays like Parakalama, Nasta Urbasi and Ardhangini Chotraya displays a sense of irony which saves his art from deteriorating into cheap propaganda.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hemantakumara Das, Odiya Natakara Udbhaba O Vikasa (Cuttack 1979). Sarbeswara Das, Odiya Natya Sahitya (Bhubaneswara, 1981).

Sau. M.

CHOURANG (Konkani) by Pundalik Narayan Naik is a collection of five one-act plays (1982), all produced and staged successfully in various competitions. The winner of the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1984, the book contains one act-plays entitled Eka-Zumvyar Zaim (On an Island), Pavnni (Auction), Mornnokotto (The Bank of Death)', Ani Ek Por Nagddemch Urta (.... and a child remains naked) and Khamsutrim (Puppets). The title Chourang in the present context signifies the particular rhythmic beat on the drum which precedes the dramatic performances and is a part of the traditional ritual of 'sumvari' still prevalent in some parts of Goa. The first three of these are philosophical in tone dealing with themes like freedom, sacrifice and death while the fourth has a socio-political context; the last one deals with the dramatic art, the handling of characters in particular. Pundalik Naik apart from being a successful short story writer, novelist and poet is the foremost playwright in Konkani today. In the present one-act plays one finds him at his best. The collection is certainly the most representative of the trends current in modern Konkani drama. These plays are extremely gripping. Pundalik knows how to write dialogues in colloquial Konkani, create extraordinary situations, develop character and shape dramatic endings. He handles with ease a variety of techniques. In 'Khamsutri' for instance, he presents the same story in four different ways, from four different angles (1) as seen by the writer, (2) as seen by the director, (3) as seen by the audience, and (4) as seen by the actors themselves. Chourang is certainly an important landmark in the field of one-act play in Konkani.

M.S.

CHRIST PURANA (Marathi) is an epic written in Marathi by Father Stephens (1549-1619), an English Jesuit who settled in Goa in 1579. The conference of Christian Bishops held in Goa in 1585 issued a directive that books in vernacular languages should be composed to propagate Christian doctrine. Accordingly, Fr. Stephens studied both Konkani and Marathi, the literary languages of Goa and wrote a booklet in Konkani entitled Doutrina Christa (Christian doctrine) in the form of questions and answers and composed the voluminous Christ-purana in Marathi consisting of 11,032 verses in 1614. The Purana has two parts comprising 36 and 59 cantos respectively and is based on the great Bible. The fact that three editions of this work were printed in the Roman script in 1616, 1649 and 1654, clearly testifies to its popularity among the neo-Christians in the 16th century. The text of the fourth edition printed 1907 at Mangalore and edited by J.L. Saldanha was prepared from some manuscripts. Recently it has been transcribed by Prof. S. Bandelu (Poona 1956) into Devanagari.

The first part of this Purana narrates the history of the Jews while the second narrates at length the life of Jesus Christ. The narrative poignantly depicts the affectionate adoration of the mother Mary, the impassioned devotion of Magdonel May, the martyrdom of John the Baptist, the rich splendour of King Solomon, the impudence of the tyrant Herod, the courage of young David and the awe felt by Adam and Eve after their disobedience of the almighty. The poet has taken special care to explain the religious background of the composition and also eulogises the Marathi language in the 1st canto. In addition to the characters in the original biblical stories, the poet has introduced the characters–inquisitive listener and the answering priest. At some points, their dialogue is skilfully employed to vindicate Christianity and refute the Hindu idolatry.

The narrative style of this epic has been deeply influenced by the Marathi saint poets, particularly Jnanadeva, Vishnudasnama and Krishnadasnama. Though not highly poetic like Jnaneshvara or Mukteshvara, with its genuine simplicity this treatise adequately expresses various moods and emotions in the different episodes in the narrative.

This is the first Marathi book to be printed, albeit in the Roman script. The prose introduction of this mythical narrative is a rare specimen of contemporary Marathi prose. What is more notable is the fact that a foreign English missionary has been able to fuse the tradition of the saint poets of Maharashtra with a foreign sacred book, namely the great Bible.

S.G.M.

CHRISTIAN LITERATURE (Telugu). The honour of laying the foundation for Christian literature in Telugu belongs to Pingali Ellanarya, son of Nagayamatya of the 17th century. He was born in Kondavidu in Guntur District, a Niyogi Brahmin of Shaiva cult. Encouraged by Thamma Narapa Reddy, he wrote Thobha-charitra alias Sarveswara Mahatyam, an epic in four cantos. This is the Christian epic in Telugu, depicting the life story of Saint Thomas, and is dedicated to the Lord. But we do not have any proof that the poet embraced Christianity. In the present century, one Mangalagiri Ananda Kavi, a Brahmin convert, wrote the story of Jesus Christ under the name Vedanta Saram, a poem in four cantos, and dedicated it to Nidumamilla Dasayamatya. There are proofs that western scholars helped the poet in translating Mark, Matthew and Luke from Greek. Coming under the English influence, Subbarayudu, a Telugu Brahmin in Visakhapatnam (1822), took to Christianity and helped very much in translating the Bible and other Christian works into Telugu. Under the name of New Testament, a translation was brought about by Des Granger. This book contained all the words spoken by Jesus, his teachings and parables. Later, several Hindus converted to Christianity, brought out Luke's Gospel, Mose's Second Book and The Book of Psalms in Telugu. These books bring out the story of Jesus, his superhuman qualities and his philosophy.

Later a preacher Bedche by name wrote the story of the Great Teacher around 1860 in colloquial style. Around 1835 the first newspaper was started by the Christian Association, Bellari, which served very well to propagate Christianity and to develop Christian literature in Telugu. They enriched various genres of Telugu literature.

Kandukuri Veeresalingam, a social reformer, was also a prolific writer in prose and wrote The Story of Jesus in prose. The teachings of Jesus were taking book form, either as novel, story or drama since then. Song-writing had gradually become prominent and important as the one vehicle of expression reaching one and all, the elite and the commoner.

In the 19th century a Bengali brahmin by name Purushotham Chaudhuri sang the story of Jesus under the name of Songs of Bliss and Songs of Prayer. In Andhra, many exponents of music and letters have written the story of Jesus as folk songs and popularised Christianity immensely.

In the modern times Puludindi Solmon Raju translated into Telugu John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and wrote two Christian books Kim Kartavyam (What is to be done) and Chamanti Chenu (Grove of Chrysanthe mums). Kalaprapoorna Suragala Timothy Jnanananda Kavi wrote poems like 'Golconda' with historical background and poems like 'Tarangalu' (waves) and 'Esu Christhu' (Jesus Christ) with religious background. Modukuri Johnson was a law graduate who became a playwright with his Natanalayam. His Bible Geethalu (Songs from the Bible) bring out the intrinsic greatness of the book.

Besides these we have many other writings of Christian literature in Telugu, such as Elia and Joshua with their Krishthu Charitra (the story of Christ) and Christ Krishna a comparative study by Gadepalli Kukkuteswara Rao. Meka John Subbarao, D.V. Daniel, Pidugu Luther, Chinnam Prasada Rao, Ravela Joseph, Mannava China Narasimharao and many others have written of Jesus in their poems, plays and songs, thereby enriching Telugu Christian literature.

K.N.R.

CHRONICLES (Assamese), mostly written in prose and occasionally in verse, are the gift of the Ahoms, a branch of the Tai (Thai) race, who migrated to Assam in the early part of the 13th century and established a kingdom in the eastern part of Assam by conquering the indigenous tribes. Gradually they extended the borders of their state and became the supreme power in the Brahmaputra valley by the end of the 16th century. They were endowed with the historical sense of a high order, and their priests and leading noble families took especial interest in recording political events faithfully and periodically brought them upto date. The Buranjis by which term these chronicles are known is one of the few Assamese words which are derived from the Ahom language, now no longer a spoken dialect. The literal meaning is 'a store-house of knowledge that teaches the ignorant' (Bu-ignorant, ran-teach, ji-store or granary). Before the advent of the Ahoms the system of recording faithfully the important events of the reigns of kings was not in vogue. Chronicles were written in the Ahom language (an offshoot of Tai) during the first two or three centuries of their rule in Assam and this practice of adhering to their original dialect sporadically continued till the early part of the 19th century. From about the beginning of the 17th century the Ahoms, who in the meantime adopted Assamese by completely merging with the main social stream, began to show preference for Assamese in writing chronicles. Since then the number of chronicles in Assamese has considerably increased but only a fraction has been published of those which have been recovered.

The chronicles, mostly written in the dignified prose based on the spoken language of eastern Assam, have been classified into three broad categories:

(1) Desultory chronicles of the Kings of Kamarupa prior to the establishment of the Ahom Kingdom in 1228.
(2) Chronicles of the Ahom Kings from 1228 to the termination of their rule in 1826.
(3) Chronicles of Kingdom or countries adjoining the Ahom Kingdom or countries having diplomatic or other relations with the Ahoms.

Besides the classes mentioned above, there are chronicles dealing with dynastic histories or chronicles called Rajvamshavalis and Satriya Buranjis or chronicles of Satras, the Vaishnavite monastic and semi-monastic institutions. So far as the first category of chronicles is concerned, they are a mixed lot of traditions and legends and none of them give an exhaustive survey of all the rulers and dynasties, nor the chronology given by them is truly authentic. Some names of Kings occurring here are also to be found in the inscriptions of ancient Kamarupa. Though the account in these chronicles are not as much reliable as the inscriptions, yet they may be profitably used, some-times as corroborative and sometimes as supplementary evidences to the inscriptional accounts.

The second category of Buranjis, dealing with the different periods of the Ahom reign extending over six hundred years is not only larger in number but also more faithful and reliable as historical records. This is so because of the fact that they were compiled under the supervision of government officials and chroniclers were given free access to all necessary state papers, diplomatic correspondences and court minutes. Buranjis were also compiled by nobles who took active parts in contemporary administrative or diplomatic affairs. Therefore, the chronicles dealing with the medieval period are more authentic, reliable and mutually corroborative. Sir Edward Gait, the noted historian. certifies the reliability of the medieval Buranjis in the following way: 'The historicity of these Buranjis is proved not only by the way in which they support each other, but also by the confirmation which is afforded by the narratives of Mahammadan writers, wherever these are available for comparison." (History of Assam.)

The third category of Buranjis deals with the history of some neighbouring ruling dynasties of Tripura, Jayantia (Khasi-Jayantia districts of present Meghalaya and Cachar) and Delhi under the mughals. A chronicle of Burdwan was recovered several years back, but it mysteriously disappeared from an exibition of manuscripts. This class of Buranji bears stamp of writers who were intimately connected with the political relation of the Ahoms with the neighbouring powers. For instance, the twin authors of the Tripura Buranji, viz, Ratna Kandali and Arjundas Bairagi were the envoys of king Rudra Simha of Assam (1696–1714) to the court of Tripura between 1710-1715. They carried secret diplomatic message of Rudra Simha to the court of Tripura on three diplomatic missions. Another note-worthy chronicle of this class is Badshah Buranji where the history of the Mughal dynasty especially of the 17th century is narrated, exhibiting wonderful knowledge on the part of the author of the tradition and customs of the Mahammadan world. The language, though Assamese, is replete with Persio-Arabic words which contribute towards conjuring up the Mughal atmosphere.

The Datiyalia Buranji narrates the political relations of the Ahom Kings with some of the frontier tribes and chiefs during the later part of the Ahom rule. It may be mentioned in this connection that the chroniclers of this class of Buranji have not confined themselves to the narration of political events only, they have also made valuable observations regarding religious and social conditions of the state about which they wrote.

Following the Ahoms, the Koch Kings of western Assam encouraged learned scholars to record the achievements of their dynastic rule. This class of chronicles, mostly written in verse and interspersed with poetic embellishments, chronologically narrate the important events of the successive rulers. Darrang Rajvamshavalis written by different chroniclers, though loosely categorised as the Buranjis of the Ahoms, however, differ from the latter in respect of treatment and style. The same comment holds good in the case of Satra-Buranjis where the religous motive plays the dominant role. Nevertheless both the types of chronicles are valuable historical documents for reconstructing the history of medieval Assam.

Literary importance of the chronicles lies mainly in the nature of their narration and the style of prose moulded to suit the different situations and circumstances. Although verse has not been totally discarded as the vehicle of expression, the usual medium was prose. Based on the spoken dialect of the courtly environment of eastern Assam, the language of the chronicles is free from artificiality and unnecessary ornamentation. The prose style of different chronicles bears the stamp of the characteristic environment in which each chronicle was compiled and written. S.K. Bhuyan, the eminent historian of Assam who edited and published more than a dozen chronicles speaks of the prose style thus: 'In the process of conserving the deeds of the people with a remarkable touch of realism, the Buranjis have become endowed with human interest instead of being dry as just chronicle of court events, (Studies in the Literature of Assam).

The chronicles adapted their prose style according to the nature of topics dealt with. The writers did not unnecessarily indulge in emotional effusion or adulation. They have maintained rigid objectivity in narrating political events, without caring to curry favour with or incur any frown from the ruling power. The art of chronicle writing was considered sacred and therefore the writers tried to maintain restraint in language and thought. But that does not mean that they uniformly used flat and dry narration. The variation of the tone of the language according to the nature of situations and contexts could be noticed. A comparison of the style of writing in Tripura Buranji with that of Badshah Buranji or Datiyalia Buranji or of Assam Buranji recovered from the house of Sukumar Mahanta would reveal the variation of diction and style in presenting facts and events under different circumstances. While the Tripura Buranji, being an eye-witness's account of the political envoys, gives an objective narration marked by lucidity, sobriety and dignity, the language of Datiyalia Buranji presents a mixture of Assamese and the dialects of the border areas; or more correctly we notice a form of broken Assamese which we usually hear from the lips of tribal people of the border region not conversant with the niceties of the standard colloquial.

The narration of the Buranjis is frequently enlivened by reproducing the exact dialogues and speeches of historical personages which sometimes lend a dramatic colour to the situations. Frequent use of epigrammatic expressions, wise-sayings and adages and at times eloquent, forceful and cryptic utterances produce a colourful effect in the minds of the readers.

The chronicles have also preserved the early Assamese epistolary forms, both in Assamese and Sanskrit. The diplomatic letters exchanged between the Ahom Kings and other monarchs have been reproduced verbatim in different chronicles and they illustrate the then existent protocols and formalities. In short, the chronicles of medieval Assam not only fulfil the criteria of political histories but also represent fine specimens of prose.

S.S.

CHRONICLES (Telugu). The records necessary to write Andhra history are not well preserved. They are in the shape of rock-inscriptions and inscriptions written on copper and silver plates. Some records are available in the shape of village manuals, Kaifiyats, Dandakavilas and geneologies.

In the the 19th century, for the first time Colonel Mckenjae gathered much material with the help of local pundits. He made them copy all the copper, silver and rock inscriptions on paper. He preserved them and made them available to the local public. They are now available for the researchers in the Tamil Nadu Government Manuscripts Library. C.P. Brown, the great literary luminary and saviour of Telugu literature, also gathered the records useful to write local history. Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi prepared the copies of the records of Mckenjae and Brown.

The origin of Telugu language is traced to a Sanskrit inscription on the stupa of Amaravati. The word 'Nagabu' belongs to Telugu language. The first Telugu inscription was available in Cuddapah District. This inscription belongs to Erikal Mutthuraju of Renati Chola dynasty of the 6th century. Several inscriptions reveal the living conditions of people under the Cholas and Chalukyas. Some of the inscriptions were written in verse. Most of the inscriptions describe the charity of the rulers.

King Gunage Vijayaditya of Chalukya dynasty issued an inscription in the ninth century. It is available in Addanki in Prakasam District. It describes the noble rule of the Chalukya ruler. The brother of Gunage Vijayaditya, Yuddhamalla, carved an inscription on a pillar in the temple of Malleswara in Bezwada. The poems in the above inscription are in the prosody of Madhyakkara. Students of literature and Sahridayas can learn about the social and economic history of Andhra from these inscriptions.

The Nandampudi Inscription issued by Raja Raja Narendra and written by Adikavi Nannaya threw much light on Chalukya dynasty. Nannaya describes his friend Narayana Bhatta's scholarship.

A few chronicles in the shape of literature came to light. The History of Prataparudra written by Ekamranatha describes the life and times of the King Prataparudra. Kase Sarvappa versified the record of Ekamranatha with the title Siddheswara Charita.

One local officer in command of Srikrishnadevaraya wrote the diary of the king in a literary form. Kasi Viswanatha Nayani Vari Sthanapati is the author of Rayawachaka, a day in the life of Srikrishnadevaraya. This book was written in the sixteenth century. Kumar Dhurjati followed Rayawachaka to write a poem called 'Krishnaraya Vijayamu.'

In the 19th century two travelogues which read like chronicles of the times were written by two scholars. Enugula Veeraswamaiah travelled from Madras to Benaras in the 19th century. He described the nature and customs of the people of various places. It is very useful for knowing about the lives of the people in British India. In the same century, Kola Seshachalakavi travelled from Madras to Nilagiri and depicted the scenic beauty and environment in South India.

K.R.R.

CHUMMAR T.M. (Malayalam; b. 1899) started his career as a school teacher and retired as a college teacher of Malayalam. He was a promoter of the Samasta Kerala Sahitya Parishat, an old literary organisation of Kerala, of which he was a member and Vice-President. He was also the editor of the Sahitya Parishat Magazine. He composed poems, wrote studies on literature and gained reputation as a researcher and critic. He was given the titles 'Sahitya Nipuna', 'Sahityalankar', and Sahityataram' and by distinguished persons and institutions. His essays, studies, introductory articles etc. reflect his literary taste and critical insight. His Padya Sahitya Charitram and Bhasha Gadya Sahitya Charitram are masterly works of balanced and mature literary appraisal.

FURTHER WORKS: Mahakavi Kunchan Nampiar., C. Vyute Akhyayikakal., Chintapatham., Vicharalila., Gadya Saurabham. and Suvarna Kairali.

V.S.S.

CHUNDAWATA, LAKSHMI KUMARI (Rajasthani; b. 1916) was born at Devagadha, in a feudal family of the Chundawate sub-branch of the Sisodiya rulers of the erstwhile Udaipur state, and married to late Rewata

Tejasinha, the feudal head of Rawatasar in the erstwhile Bikaner state of the Rathaudas. Her inner urge for literary writings and active participation in the political and social spheres prompted her to cast off the customery Parda (veil). Though moderately educated, she had a good command over the languages, and was endowed with the power to express her thoughts and feelings in an effective way. She is a sitting M.L.A. and has also served as a member of the Rajyasabha (Upper house of the Parliament). She has travelled abroad as a member of cultural delegations and has held many a post of honour and responsibility in public life. The following creative works stand to her credit. Manjhala Rata (Midnight) 1957, Mumala, (stories 1961); Gira uncha gadhan, (Lofty Forts on Lofty Mountains), Kai Rai Ocakawa vata-folk tales. Bagho-Bharamali (1962); Pabuji ri vata story (1962) Soratha-vinjha ri vata story (1962). Dungali-Jawarajiri vata (1981). Almost all these books contain folk tales, popular historical and love stories and anecdotes concerned with minor historical events of local importance. Her style is a traditional one, as found in old texts written by the bards and other writers of the late medieval period. The narration is interspersed with relevant 'Duhas' pertaining to the story. What she has done is to reconstruct the story to her liking and recreate it in her own language. Her descriptions carry the readers with them. Her diction is exceptionally rich, fitting to the occasions, and extremely pleasing and impressive. Her style is very lucid with a spontaneous flow of events and exuberant with emotions, especially the erotic and heroic ones. She had also re-told some folk tales for the children of which the following deserve mention–Hunkaro do Sa (response to the story teller, 1957), Tabaran ri vatan (tales for children, 1961) Vata Karamata (the Miracle of story, 1981) and Gandhiji ri vatan (Facts about Gandhiji). Besides these she has translated stories of Rabindranath Tagore, and a number of others by foreign writers, especially those of Soviet Russia. The concerned books are 1. Ravi Thakara rivatan (1961) 2. Sansara Ri nami Kahaniyan—renowned stories of the world (1966) 3. Gajabana—Russian stories (1978) and Amolakavatan. Life of Lenin, has formed the subject matter of her book Lenin ri Jivani, and Suli ra Suiya Mathai (On the edge of the Gibbet) is the translation of a Russian work. Her contribution in the field of compiling and editing of folk literature, such as folk songs, popular couplets and folk tales, has also been noteworthy. Some old texts were also edited by her of which Varavana of Dhadhi Bahadara is worth mentioning. The reputed ballads known as Bagadavata Devanarayana Mahagatha, were collected and edited by her. She has also written several books in Hindi. Her multifarious activities won for her the Padmashri from the Government of India in 1984.

Raw.S.

CHURNI (Chunni, Prakrit), is a type of commentary on the Prakrit Jaina Canon. It is a proper designation of the commentary because it grinds the grain of the text into the flour of detailed exposition. It may also be mentioned that whatever was taught orally by the teacher about the text of the Canon, when put to writing, it took the form of Churni. The Churnis are found on the Canonical as well as non-Canonical literature. The Avashyakachurni which comments on the Avashyakaniryukti but not on Bhashya of the text is most important. The other Churnis are on the Bhashya like the Nishitha. All the Churnis were written first and they gave materials for Bhashya composition. Perhaps both these types were developed simultaneously, Churni in Prakrit prose and Bhashya in Prakrit verse. The Churnis are mixed with Sanskrit but the Bhashya maintains the tradition of writing in Prakrit. And ultimately the Sanskrit was adopted for the commentaries. No commentary in Prakrit was written after the 8th century. Though the tradition of writing non-Canonical works in Prakrit continues upto this century.

The Churnis explain the texts. Its spepciality is in introducing the thought-provoking stories. Sometimes the clue for the story is provided by the Niryukti with catchwords but the full narration for the first time is found for those stories in the Churnis. But even if there is no clue the author supplies the story from his knowledge of popular stories prevalent throughout India in those days. One can say without hesitation that they are the mine of Indian stories popular before the 8th century.

Not only this, the main contribution of these Churnis, apart from the traditional exposition, is that they porduce before us the real picture of the Indian society as a whole and not only of the upper classes of people of India.

Following Churnis are published: Nandichurni, Anuyogadvarachu, Avashyakachu, two Dashavaikalikachu, Uttaradhyayanachu, Acharangachu, Sutrakritangachu, Nishithachu, Dashashrutachurni and Jitakalpachurni. Important but yet not published are: Mahanishithachu, Panchakalpachu, Jivabhigamachu, Vyavaharachu, Brihatkalpachu, Oghachu, and Nishithabrihatchurini.

The Nishithachu and other Churnis were written by Jinadasa Mahattara who was alive in 676 A.D. He was the pupil of Pradyumna Kshamashramana. Agastya Simha is the author of one of the two Dashavaikalikachurnis. Pralamabasuri is the name given as the author of Brihatkalpachurni and Siddhasena (not the Divakara) is the author of Jitakalpachurni. He is the pupil of Jinabhadra (7th century).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Alsdorf, Jaina Exegetical literature, etc,. included in Mahavira and his Teachings, Bombay, 1977; Madhu Sen, A Cultural Study of the Nishithachurni, Varanasi, 1975.

D.D.M.

CHURNIKA (Marathi) Among the regional languages of Indo-European origin, Marathi is perhaps unique in its usage of Churnika. The medieval classical Kirtankaras employed a rhythmic and rhetorical strain of prose style and signified it uniformly as Churnika. Proably the rhetorical prose of the Bhata poets in Vraja Bhasa comes closer to Marathi Churnika. Ekanatha's Arjidasta is much nearer to the medieval North Indian prose style full of Persian expressions. Some of the Akhyanas of 17th and 18th centuries contain such passages. The ceremonial outbursts of the Royal trumpeters (who, in Marathi, are called Bhaldara and Chopadara) might have indirectly inspired them. But the terminology used to denote these compositions, shows the influence of premedieval or classical prosody convincingly.

The famous Marathi Akhyana writer, Ananda Tanaya, is the first extant experimenter with the Churnika, as far as Marathi literature is concerned. He adorned the otherwise trite classical way of writing with a new embellishment. Raghunatha Pandit who perhaps was his contemporary and possibly a relation followed suit. Ananda Tanaya's Churnikas are simpler in style and diction and are also occasionally enriched with a touch of metres and verse forms like 'Ovi'. Raghunatha Pandit employed a more ornate and complex syntax, making his Churnikas more like Utkalikapraya and of Vrittagandhi variety. The great lyricist Amritarai has tried his hand at Churnika, giving it a somewhat different rhythm, that of the 6 matra beats. Other 18th and early 19th century poets like Niranjana Madhava, Vinayaka and Mukunda are known to have indulged in writing the Churnika form of poetical prose. One thing common to all these Akhyanakaras is the fact that all of them use the term Churnika, and no other varieties or sub-divisions are mentioned by them.

What really was the significance of such rhythmic prose interludes ? While the Akhyana would be in the people's current prose speech, songs were interspersed in it for its musical effect. But why such ornate,artificial prose passages were introduced is not very clear. Perhaps the classicist Kirtankaras liked to give their discourses an aura of dignified style. It was a traditional way highly stylized. It was not a conscious attempt at employment of the spoken rhythm of the colloquial speech, skilfully woven into it. Churnika was something different from the ordinary speech of everyday life; it was also something other than the closely-knit Tala rhythm of the 'padas' and other Bhajani songs, something rhetorical and grand in style and diction. It was prose in syntax, yet different from the illusive rhythm of people's everyday prose speech. It was, without doubt, an achievement in itself. In the modern times the Kirtanas have become rare and the rhythmic assonance of a near-prose style is quite in ascendance.

N.G.J.

CHIKKADEVARAJA (Kannada; b. 1645, d. 1704) was one of the most distinguished rulers of the Wodeyar dynasty of Mysore. He succeeded Devaraja Wodeyar, his uncle, and ascended the throne in 1673, in his 28th year. He had to wage many wars against many petty rulers and the Marathas, who invaded twice before he could consolidate himself as the most powerful ruler in south India. He desired to eastablish friendly relations with Aurangazeb, the Moghul Emperor, and sent an Embassy to him. From 1686 onwards the State enjoyed peaceful times and Chikkadevaraja was able to turn his attention to domestic problems. He streamlined the administrative set-up by introducing many innovations, the establishment of the postal system being one such innovation. The state income grew enormously, and he was acclaimed by his subjects as "Navakoti-Narayana" (Lord Narayana of nine crores).

Chikkadevaraja is remembered not only for his farsightedness and administrative ability but more so for the munificent patronage he extended to scholars and poets, like Tirumalarya, Singrarya, Singaramma (a woman writer), Honnama (also a woman writer); Timma Kavi,Mallikarjuna, Chidananda Kavi, Mallarasa and many other minor writers. Many books like Chikkadevaraja Vijaya, Chikadevaraja Vamsavali, Chikadevaraja Yesobhusana, Chikadevaraja Vamsa Prabhava bear testimony to the greatness of the personality of Chikadevaraja.

Chikkadevaraja seems to have been influenced to a great extent by Tirumalarya (or Tirumalayyangar), his close friend in his early days, and later his Court Poet, and Minister. This probably accounts for the fact that many of the authors (though not all) patronized by the king were of Sri Vaishnava tradition.

Chikkadevaraja is credited with having written several works. The most famous among them are Gita Gopala and Chikkadevaraja Binnapam. No doubt he was assisted in his literary activity by Tirumalarya. Tirumalarya himself might have written the above two works and ascribed the authorship to his benevolent monarch and patron. Both these works are characterized by deep devotional sentiment and lyrical beauty. Both expound the main tenets of Visistaddvaita philosophy, the devotional tenet of Sarangati (absolute surrender to God) in particular, in the chaste diction of old Kannada and contain references to the conquests of the ruler. Gita Gopala is a collection of songs, reminiscent of Gita Govinda of Jayadeva, the famous Sanskrit work; each song is prefaced by a brief substance of the poem in prose. Chikkadevaraya Binnapa is entirely in prose. It contains 30 binnapas (prayers) addressed to Lord Narayana of Yadugiri, also called Melukote, near Mysore City. They contain the essence of Visistadvaita philosophy, which is more pronounced in this work than in the former. The 17th century may rightly be called "the Age of Chikkadevaraja" in the history of Kannada literature.

M.V.S.R.

CINEMA (Dogri). The first film in Dogri was completed titled in 1965 and released in 1966. It was 'Gallan Hoyian Beetiyan' which means things that happened and are now passed. Its release in Jammu city created a lot of enthusiasm. A local Urdu paper Ujala dated 13th September, 1966, wrote: "Gallan Hoyian Beetiyan' is the name given to the imaginative creation of a popular Dogri short-story written by Narendra Khajuria. Being shown in the best theatre in the city; viz. Shankar Theatre, this picture of Dogra culture is drawing large crowds of men and women even from distant places".

This first picture was a product of the creative upsurge of Dogri renaissance which started in the middle of 1940's and reached its acme in the sixties. And it was the result of a dedicated Dogri writer and other artists, prominent among whom were Ram Kumar Abrol,a Dogri short-story writer of those days and Kumar Kuldip. There was no financial help or encouragement from the State Government and yet the enthusiastic group went ahead, collected funds from local sources, set up a production unit and named it 'Tawi' Films. The film script was based on Narendra Khajuria (Sahitya Akademi award winner) one-act play Pyasi Dharti (Thirsty soil). The film script was prepared by Kumar Kuldip who also directed the film. Dialogues were written by Ramnath Shastri (another Sahitya Akademi award winner) who also had a small role in it. Songs for the film were written by Dogri poets Yash Sharma and Kehari Singh 'Madhukar' (yet another Sahitya Akademi award winner). They were all local people. For music direction and singing of songs, outside help was taken. main roles were played by Dogri writers Ram Kumar Abrol and Jitender Sharma and the film actress Kaberi (who now works in Bombay films under the name of Meena Roy) and Veena Kotwal.

The film was didactic and socially relevant. Two problems-that of 'dohri' i.e. marriage by barter, and water scarcity in the Kandi area of Duggar, have been projected in the film. The story is set in two villages-one higher up in the hills where there is plenty of water for men, cattle and crops and which is green and well off, the other lower down where there is no water. The area follows the custom of 'dohri', that is, mutual exchange of brides between two families. The 'nambardar' (village chief) of the village with water, agrees to give his sister Shano in exchange to Haria of the other village, in exchange for Lajo, Haria's sister who would be married to 'nambardar's younger brother. At the time of Shano's marriage, the 'nambardar' declares that he would give an unusual gift in dowry to his sister, viz., a waterchannel to the village of her in-laws. Soon after Shano's marriage, her brother, i.e., the 'nambardar's younger brother dies suddenly. Now Shano's 'nambardar' brother wants that Lajo should be married to his uncle who is aged and also a drunkard. But Shano opposes this proposal. The relations between the two families turn sour and Shano's brother refuses to allow the water from his village to pass to the other village. It is summer and there is acute scarcity of water in the other village and people are miserable. Shano, accompanied by her husband's brother goes to the border joining the village of her brother and in an effort to release water, gets killed by her own brother who laments his rashness. He releases the water. Both the water and Shano's dead body reach the village of Shano's brother-in-laws simultaneously. Her sacrifice has not been in vain.

Ram. S.

CINEMA (Hindi) The cinema represents one of the marvels of the twentieth century. The first movie pictures appeared at the turn of this century. But this medium came into its own when moving pictures got tongue, and began to speak and sing. This happened at the dawn of the thirties. The first Hindi talkie had dozens of songs. And with the advent of sound, moving pictures started replacing commercial theatre, which till then was a touring and roaring business. Other performing arts also suffered initially.

It was natural that writers and poets of the day were attracted to this new medium. But its novelty perplexed them. It took quite some time before they were able to grasp the parameters of this novelty. In the beginning, writers and poets were drawn from the popular stage. Thus, Narayan prasad 'Betab', Radheyshyam Kathavachak, Narottam Vyas were pioneer Hindi writers, who threw in their lot with the cinema.

Hindi cinema played a major role in national integration and spread of Hindi throughout the length and breadth of India. After Bhakti poets, cinema has proved to be the main deployer and disseminator of Hindi. Of course, national liberation movement led by Mahatma Gandhi and others also played a major role in this respect.

Calcutta and Bombay were two main centres, where Hindi cinema developed and flourished. Both these centres also produced films in regional languages, but that came later. Important film–producing companies of both these centres tried to rope in popular writers but no significant Hindi writer was attracted to the fraternity. There were many reasons for that but the main reason was a kind of aversion towards those connected with film making. Later, however, the love of money, fame and exposure to the widest possible audiences did attract some Hindi writers. Premchand was the first to make a foray in the world of Hindi cinema. But his experience was very unrewarding and he came back disillusioned after only two films–one based on his novel Sevasadan and the other on the theme of Mill aur Mazdoor. Much later, of course, some of his stories and novels were made into memorable films–'Godan,' 'Gaban', 'Heera Moti' (Do Bailon ki Katha), and 'Shatranj ke Khilari.' The last one was made by that veteran film-maker, Satyajit Ray.

Meanwhile, Dwarkaprasad Mishra, a poet and litterateur, who later became Chief Minister of Madhya Pradesh, tried his hand at film-making. He, along with dramatist and politician Seth Govind Das launched a film company and announced the making of 'Dhuandhar' . By then, power of cinema had come to be recognized and many an educated person had started taking interest in exploiting the educative and entertainment aspect of this medium. This change in pattern necessitated the inflow of reputed writers. During the forties, almost all the film companies had one or two famous Hindi or Urdu writers on their rolls.

Sudarshan, Bhagwaticharan Varma, Narendra Sharma, Amritlal Nagar, Kishore Sahu, Pradeep Santoshi, Neelkanth Tiwari, Gopal Singh 'Nepali', Ashok, Bhagwatiprasad Vajpai, Moti, Shailendra, Bharat Vyas and others found employment in Bombay, while Calcutta-based film-makers continued to employ translators, because most of the Bengali directors used to write their own screenplay and dialogues, either in Bengali or English, which were later translated into Hindi. The lyrics–writers there were mainly Urdu poets, with one or two exceptions,–like Pt. Madhukar, L.K. Singh 'Natwar' and M.L. Bajpai, who wrote in Hindi.

Bhagwaticharan Varma, before moving to Bombay, was in Calcutta, where he was persuaded by Rameshwar Sharma of Hindustan Film Corporation to agree for a film version of his popular novel Chitralekha,. Kidar Sharma, who was till then dialogue and song-writer with the New Theatres, wrote the screenplay, dialogues and songs of 'Chitralekha' and also directed it. Bhagwaticharan Varma, was not satisfied with the production and he publicly declared so, and requested the producer not to use his name as the writer in the publicity material. While in Bombay, Bhagwaticharan Varma produced a film for Bombay Talkies, Hamari Baat, which had lyrics by Narendra Sharma. Kidar Sharma made 'Chitralekha' again in colour in the early seventies.

Kishore Sahu, who had written some startling short stories in Hindi, started his career as a film director with the film 'Bahurani', which was based on the novel Mimansa by Anup Lal Mandal. After many years, Kishore Sahu chose Homwati Devi's short story 'Gotey ki Topi' and made it into a powerful film–'Sindoor'.

In the forties, internationally renowned dancer Uday Shankar made his only dance-ballet film 'Kalpana' at Madras. He secured the services of eminent poet Sumitranandan Pant, to write the lyrics of this film. Distinguished Hindi novelist Amrit Lal Nagar wrote the dialogues.

B.R. Chopra purchased the rights of Chatursen Shastri's novel Dharmaputra and based his film 'Dhool ka Phool' on it. Similarly, Chetan Anand was able to sell his short-stories to A.R. Kardar, who also offered Chetan to act as hero in one of the films. Sajjan and Mahipal, who were poets and did write a few songs for films, later drifted into the field of acting.

Bimal Roy, who made a number of the stories of Saratchandra into films, also picked up Chandradhar Sharma Guleri's unforgetable short-story 'Usney Kaha Tha' and transformed it into a film under the same name. In the seventies two different types of Hindi writers were attracted to this medium. One was a popular novelist Gulshan Nanda, and the other was the many-splendoured writer Kamleshwar. Both of them have made their mark in the Hindi cinema. A number of films based on their novels have been made and proved successful. Dharamvir Bharati's novel Gunahon ka Devata was also mounted on Hindi screen. The same director also attempted a film 'Ek Sarak, Sattavan Galiyan,' based on a novel by Kamleshwar earlier. This novel was filmed as 'Badnam Basti'.

Some noteworthy Hindi poets were also invited by various film producers to write lyrics, Among them Niraj and Santoshanand deserve special mention. Meanwhile, poets like Indivar, Anjan, Virendra Mishra and others have contributed their mite to the Hindi cinema.

Cinema has played, and continues to play, a major role in the spread of Hindi to the farthest corners of the country and Hindi writers and poets are actively engaged in this task. It has also contributed many a typical phrase to new Hindi vocabulary commonly used by our new writers. These phrases have a blending of Marathi, Gujarati, Portuguese and the local dialects. The cinema has lent colourfulness and variety to the expressions of Hindi and these localised forms of Hindi have also filtered into numerous novels and short-stories with Bombay as their locale.

V.T.

CINEMA (Kannada). The Kannada cinema which recently celebrated its golden jubilee, made its first appearance soon after the advent of the motion picture in India during the early twenties.

The point of immediate relevance here is the relation between the Kannada literary world and the cinema. There is hardly any author of note whose story or novel has not been made into a picture at one time or another and it is not a coincidence that almost all the pictures that have won national recognition and even international recognition have been based on works known for their literary excellence of one kind or another. Puttanna Kanagal initiated this new approach in the choice of stories for pictures. The number of stories and novels so picturised is legion. A few prominent names and titles could be mentioned. Krishnamurthy Purnik's Dhar- madevata and Kulavadhu, Tarasu's Chandavalliya Tota, Chakratirth, Nagara Havu and Hamsa Gite, A.N. Krishna Rao's Sandhyaraga, all became immensely popular. In this none could beat Belli Moda, Hannele Chiguridaga and Kankana, all based on the novels of the late Triveni. It is remarkable that everyone of the pictures based on her novels won either a regional or a national award. Not less popular have been other women authors like M.K. Indira (Gejje Pooje), Aryamba Pattabhi (Kappu Bilupu), Mangala Satyan (Bhagya Jyothi) and Devaki Murthy (Upasane).

Other prominent authors whose novels were picturised during the seventies were Chaduranga (Sarvamangala and Uyyale), Inamdar (Mukti), Poornachandra Tejaswi (Abachurina Post Office), V. Sitaramiah (Shrishaila Shikhara), A.N. Moorthy Rao (Asadhabhuti), Raobahadur (Paduvara Hali Pandavaru), Bharatisuta (Edakallu Guddada Mele), Gorur (Boothayyana Maga Ayyu), T.K. Rama Rao (Bangarada Manushya), Aswattha (Maryada Mahalu) and so on. This tendency of taking up stories of recognised merit for filming worked well for some time to mutual advantage. While it enriched the appeal of the picture and gave it an added prestige and popularity, it brought to the author a good deal of publicity and some monetary advantage. But at the same time it encouraged certain writers to construct novels and stories with an eye to having them accepted for making films so that fiction-writing with contrived plots and sentimental appeal proliferated to the detriment of the dignity of the novel as a serious literary form of art.

That was the situation during the early seventies but as the decade wore on, the cost of production escalated, bringing about two clearly divergent trends. While some directors sought a sort of a compromise between good stories on the one hand and prospects of commercial success on the other, there came up some others who relied on the assured quality of a recognised story and the artistry of its presentation in the celluloid medium. This younger generation of directors. like Karnad, B.V. Karanth, Lankesh and Kambar, started the vogue of what has come to be regarded as the new wave in picture making. A typical instance of the first trend would be Kanagal's 'Kathasangama' which combines three stories, the second was initiated by Pattabhirama Reddy's film version of U.R. Anantha Murthy's well known novel Samskara. This second trend has claimed some very remarkable achievements. Bhairappa's novel, Vamsa Vriksha, filmed by B.V. Karanth and Karnad won nationl recognition for the directors. The same author's Tabaliyu Neenade Magane directed by the former turned out to be a great success as did Sri Krishna Alanashalli's Kadu under Karnad's direction and earned national honours. Karanth's Chomana Dudi filmed by B.V. Karanth won national and international recognition. Sankalpa directed by Nanjaraje Urs, Kankana by Prasad, Pallavi by Lankesh, Kanakambara based on Chittal's story 'Abolin' directed by Kshirasagara all helped to confirm the new trend and offered some relief to the intelligent sections of the audience from the stereotyped artificialities of the commercials.

In spite of these spectacular achievements the trend represents an exception rather than the rule. Films continued to be made in large numbers during the current decade and though some of them achieved some kind of a comment on contemporary social mores, the emphasis still tends towards commercial success. This is only natural in view of the ever–rising costs of production. The literary connection which was prominent during the preceding decade appears to be receding into the background. The enormous demand for entertainment by large masses of people seems to determine the quality of the supply which finds it difficult to remain uninfluenced by the sex, cruelty and violence of the purely commercial big-budget Hindi films. Despite these considerations the new trend in Kannada film-making during the last decade and half has given ample evidence of its potentialities for really good cinema of artistic worth, social relevance and educative value. It has also proved that it is possible to make good pictures on compartively modest budgets by concentrating on outdoor, on the spot shooting and avoiding spectacular sets and expensive stars. The Information Department of the Karnataka Government has launched a scheme of making short feature films about well known authors, artists and other prominent personalities of Karnataka. Pictures have already been made about DVG, Kuvempu, Bendre, Gubbi Veeranna and Modi. These supplement the newsreels which continue to be regularly produced by the Films Division of the Government both at the Central and the State levels.

V.M.I.

CINEMA (Malayalam). The first movie in Malayalam came out in 1928. J.C. Daniel's Vigathakumaran was a silent film. Efforts to make a sound film (Talkies) started and as a result the film Balan came out in 1938.

Unlike the films in other languages which started with mythological, historical and detective stories Malayalam cinema presented social themes right from the start. But the social exposition was not perhaps realistic and artistic. They were full of over dramatisation, sentimentalism and artificiality, traits which run counter to realism.

Visappinte Vili which went to the screen in 1951 broke all the previous box office records.

In the early 1950's a few promising film ventures created a minor revolution in the otherwise inert milieu of Malayalam film making. One of them was Neelakkuyil. (1954), a film based on the screen-play by the noted Malayalam short story writer and novelist, Uroob. Neelakkuyil was closer to life than any other Malayalam film that had appeared till then. It proved that characters for the cinema could be drawn not only from the high caste and the highly placed ones in society but also from the lowly placed and the low caste.

Following Neelakkuyil there appeared the Newspaper Boy. This has been hailed as the first realistic film in Malayalam. It discarded the star system altogether. Suitable acting talents were handpicked and cast in difficult roles. The plot structure was different from that of the run-of-the mill type. Thus it was the forerunner of the artistic film in Malayalam. To laud it as a faultless film however, would be misleading. One has to remember that it was in the same year that the classic Bengali film Pather Panchali came to the theatre.

A change in the Malayalam cinema came about in the sixties. During this period film-makers gave up the habit of making films with themes borrowed from other language films and the so-called 'company-stories'. Attempts were made to give film forms to literary works by well-established writers in Malayalam. Thus one sees the first qualitative change. Malayalam cinema was inextricably linked with the literature in the language. In the Malayalam films of this time one could see all the positive and negative features in treating a literary work to its film version. If the writer of the film script lacked cinematic sense the script had defects. Thus almost all the films of the period were increasingly subject to these drawbacks. Very often what attracted the producer was not the excellence of the original work but its popularity. The directors by themselves were not competent to write the screen play either. Hence it became the monopoly of one or two regular screen play writers. What the writers did was not to make the literary work suitable for the screen but to cut it short so that it might fill two hours of screening time. Some sprightly dialogues were added to it in the bargain. The directors showed no more originality than transforming the screen play into a series of medium shots with songs and comic scenes interspersed wherever they thought them fit. These characteristics which were patent when a novel like Rantitangazhi was filmed could be seen in all other film adaptations of this period. Almost all the reputed films of this category were subject to these defects.

Among the directors including those who gave the medium of celluloid film to literary works were K.T. Sethu Madhvan, Ramu Kariat, Vincent and P. Bhaskaran who came more prominently into the limelight. Sethu Madhavan was the one who was closest to the language of the films. Most of his well known films like Odayil Ninnu, Oru Penninte Kadha, Anubhavangal Palichakal and Ara Nazhika Neram were based on popular novels. A number of defects could be found in these films like an excessive concern with formula, lack of concentrated attention to details, the absence of an individual style in the adaptation, etc. but they were all films worth watching.

Though Sethu Madhavan was more popular and more artistically relevant than others, it was Ramu Kariat who dominated the scene as an 'acharya'. The bagging of the National Award for Chemmeen helped him to that status. The film Chemmeen is a weak cinematic representation of the original novel. Its director was at best a good co-ordinator. Even then the film attracted a measure of popular notice, the sole reason being the sympathetic response by the theme of the novel. That Kariat could not repeat the success in his later films further proves the point.

Bhargavi Nilayam by Vincent and Iruttinte Atmavu by P. Bhaskaran were also films which came to be rated high. These films too had their literary connection. One may say generally that these directors could achieve their success with a good deal of support from the writers. But this literary connection did not help incompetent directors. They just destroyed the literary works. The films based on great literary works like Balyakala Sakhi, Karuna and Ramanan prove this.

Viewed in this manner, the first phase of transition in Malayalam cinema was not entirely satisfying. But due to the films which had literary connections Malayalam cinema left Tamil and Hindi films way behind. The reflection of social consciousness in the Malayalam cinema was also the result of its literary connections. Even where the film is a poor version, the social atmosphere depicted in the original work is naturally reflected in it.

Towards the end of the sixties there appeared the most notable Malayalam film based on a literary work, Oalavum-Theeravum. A neatly executed film, its director was P.N. Menon. But he could stand distinctly apart from his compeers in the field only in one more film, Kuttiyetathi. Both these films paved the way to the new cinema movement of the early seventies.

Menon's essential contribution was that he did away with the staginess which had become an inseparable element in Malayalam films. In the composition of shots the influence of the stage was no longer there; it all acquired a new 'filmi' character. The use of music was only an artistic compulsion. Stars were not allowed to reign over the production. In other words, Menon made an effective move against the star system. But with the plus points there were some minus points too. One of them was the use of superficial symbols. As minus traits got the better of him, Menon gradually went out of the scene.

Adoor Gopalakrishnan's Swayamvaram was released during the early seventies. It was then that Malayalam film goers had the feeling of being witnesses to true cinema. Swayamvaram heralded the second phase in the development of Malayalam cinema, a more illuminating phase than the first one. But it would be preposterous to describe it as the last word or as a classic. It was the same old love story without any freshness added. The development of the story lacked credibility. Blindly following the neo-realistic style, the film was ripe with sentimentalism which fatally affected its novelty and excellence.

The popularity of even a film like Olavum Theeravum depended on its story. But Swayamvaram laid its emphasis on the cinema rather than the story. So far as Malayalam cinema was concerned it was an inevitable development.

The impulses aroused by Swayamvaram were more important than the film itself. It helped film-goers to acquire a new awareness about the art of the cinema.

Swayamvaram was closely followed in its heels by Utharayanam (Aravindan). To a small extent Utharayanam was influenced by Swayamvaram. But with his second film Kanchanaseetha, Aravindan got out of the realistic cinema and travelled far apart. This gave Malayalam cinema an opportunity to make some experiments with new forms.

Aravindan's films are remarkable for their visual appeal. They are like good paintings at the expense of the auditory appeal. Another characteristic of his art is its variety. Each of his films deals with a different theme. Of all his films Thampu is the most perceptive.

In the first half of the seventies a few well-meaning and cinema-conscious group of artists gave Malayalam a new crop of notable films. A.P. Kumaran's Atithi, K.G. George's Swapnadanam and G.S. Panikkar's Ekakini are examples. Aswathamavu (K.R. Mohanan) and Kabini Nadi Chuvannappol (P.A. Becker), may also be included in this group.

But the second half of the seventies marked a decline in what has been described as the art film movement. Most of the new directors bored the viewers by their lifeless imitations.

Again Adoor Gopalakrishnan went ahead and made Elipathayam. It is a film which bears the stamp of the director's personality. Gopalakrishnan depicts the breaking up of a certain social set up through a highly artistic and evocative suggestiveness.

Perhaps in no other Indian language is film making so varied as in Malayalam.

V.

CLASSICISM (Hindi) The word, 'Classicism', originally attributed to old Greek and Roman literary works which conformed to certain standards, later on acquired a wider meaning to include all works of literary excellence and sublime content. In its most comprehensive sense, classicism gives expression to that dimension of life which lays emphasis on the ingredients of community, universality, invariability and tradition as against the elements of individuality, topicality, change and experiment. At one time, romanticism and classicism were considered to be opposed to each other but later, in a more balanced thinking, they came to be recognised as two approaches complementary to each other.

Though Hindi can boast of a long and consistent tradition of poetics, the modern form of criticism, which aspires for a profound and comprehensive assesment and evolution of literary theories as well as literary creative masterpieces, is comparatively of a recent origin. In their endeavours for such an assesment, the Hindi critics along with the classical Indian standards of poetics, also adopted the western critical concepts and mysticism, romanticism, idealism, realism, etc., were widely and variedly discussed in details in a theoretical manner as well as in corelation with the creative works of Hindi. It is surprising, however, that classicism did not form a topic of such wide discussion and has been referred to only casually and scarcely in the course of practical criticism pertaining to creative works.

While the Indian languages had a tradition of classical works in the earliest masterpiece of Valmiki and later on of Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti and Magh, the earliest form of classical tradition in Hindi is reflected in the Ramcharit manas of Tulsidas. The poetry of the 'Riti' era would also fall into the category of classical literature but it was Bharatendu who salvaged Hindi poetry from its limited and narrow confines, relinked its tapering current with the wide and varied stream of life to firmly re-establish its classical approach. This classical stream has ever since formed an ingredient of its literary endeavour. Leading Hindi luminaries like Bharatendu Harishchandra, Ayodlaya Singh Hari Audh, Maithilisharan Gupta, Prasad, Suryakant Tripathi Nirala, Jayshankar Premchand, Bhagwaticharan Varma, Yashpal, Amritlal Nagar and others belong to this category of creative writers whose literary works cherish lofty and dignified values of life through the portrayal of its various social aspects.

It was the Indian renaissance that richly contributed to the moulding of the modern Hindi literary consciousness. The Indian mind was naturally drawn to its rich, great and unbroken tradition of ages on its contact with the western culture and civilization and the modern Indian intellectuals made a deep probe of this rich tradition to discover such time-honoured and lofty values as could inspire the Indian people into upward development. In the course of this vast effort emerged the sublime values represented by Neo-Vedanta, Universalism, the theory of Karma, the Vaishnava faith, non-violence and truth which have been a perpetual source of inspiration to the Hindi litterateur. With the withering away of the Chhayavad movement in Hindi this classical approach also started drying up. Even so the classical sentiment continued to find expression in the later poets like Ramdhari Dinkar.

Some Anglicised Hindi scholars recognised the Chhayavad movement of Hindi literature, though erroneously, as comparable to Western Romanticism and consequently saw it as a reaction to the poetic trends of the Dwivedi era. These scholars lacked proper awareness of the Indian tradition and identity hence the illusory comparison. The truth is that right from Bharatendu's Satya Harishchandra (drama) down to Prasad's Kamayani epic poetry and Premchand's Rang Bhumi (novel) the entire course of literature forms an organic whole which manifests a classical sentiment inspired by traditional Indian philosophies and values. It gives a forceful expression to the deep sense of universal good. The Radha of Ayodhya Singh Upadhyaya 'Hari Audh's', Priya Pravas, The Yashodhara of Maithilisharan Gupta's Yashodhara and the Sharddha of Prasad's Kamayani are all made up of basically similar classical sentiment and inspiration.

In the post-Premchand fiction, the classical tradition finds a yet more forceful expression but the classical strain starts diminishing in the post-Chhayavad era in poetry. The importance of the moment and the individual came to be recognised with even greater emphasis. In the post-forties, however, we find a more pronounced portrayal of the disintegration of classical values in poetry as well as in fiction. This manifestation of disintegration, however, is not an end in itself but reflects that urgent social aspiration which assumes a more dominant role than the search and assertion of the values of social welfare. Political concepts Progressivism and Reaction came to be more and more utilized in Hindi critical writings as a result of Marxist influence. Along with that literary criticism also tended to revolve round the concepts of idealism and realism.

T.N.B.

CLASSICISM (Kannada) Classicism is a term hard to define, but it can broadly be described as a tendency on the part of writers and artists to admire and therefore emulate the qualities and values they recognise in earlier works and which by virtue of their recurring relevance have crystallised into a tradition of accepted excellence. This tendency has mainfested itself in the history of all literatures and the fine arts generally. For a variety of reasons the literary genius of a people does not always show itself at a constant level of creative excellence and so during periods of comparative decline the high quality of past achievements attracts imitation. Even at other times, it is possible that the achievement of the masters so completely overwhelms writers of a succeeding age that they equate all excellance with their achievement and come to believe that there is nothing to do but imitate the manner and methods of the earlier masters. Classicism as a tendency therefore, originates in a desire to emulate past excellence and such a tendency continues to hold sway until it is challenged and gradually replaced by the success of new experiments.

The hundred and fifty years following the middle of the tenth century can aptly be described as the classical age of Kannada literature. It was the age of the three great poets, Pampa, Ranna and Ponna. The works which these poets produced, are of not only great and lasting merit by themselves, but they also established patterns of form and standards of excellence in poetry which influenced future writing for centuries. Even when the 'Champu' form declined and 'shatpadi' came into vogue, the writing of poetry retained the standards and the outlook of the earlier masters. They differed in their faiths as they differed in the choice of their subjects and the emphasis they implied in their treatment, but poetry considered as an art had to answer to certain expectations related to form and structure, to language and the attitude of the writer to his subject. The metrical rules had to be strictly obeyed, the language had to have a certain elevation separating it from its normal usage in daily life and a certain objectivity in treatment and distance from the narrative had to be maintained by the poet. All this was intended to ensure the composition of a dignified aloofness from the common and the mundane.

The classical temper insists on purity of form, an objective point of view, decorum both in the choice of subject and manner of treatment, order and clarity, all together contributing to an effectiveness of appeal and good taste. That poets in Kannada right down to the close of the nineteenth century could not think of poetry in any form other than the one prescribed by the classical tradition is an indication of how strong the influence of classicism can be. Even when Muddana wanted to deviate from the earlier manner, he could not deviate from the accepted verse forms when he chose to write in verse. His irrepressible desire for a change led him to compose his Ramasvamedham in prose, an effort in which the use of the prose had to be defended. His desire for anonymity was an indirect admission of the tremendous pressure which the classical tradition exerted on those who wanted to strike new paths. When during the early years of the present century poets attracted by different kinds of poetry from the West wanted to translate, they could not easily rid themselves of the shackles of metre and rhyme. Panje refused to do away with the second letter rhyme and Govind Pai rejected it after a good deal of hesistation and thought.

Classicism started losing its hold on Kannada poets when the literary renaissance of the early decades of this century opened new avenues of feeling and new modes of expression. The birth and growing popularity of lyrical poetry and the increasing emphasis which fell on the subjective element in poetry called for newer metrical forms and these innovations gradually put an end to the rigidities of the classical tradition. The devaluation of classicism which started with the growth and popularity of these modern trends in poetry was more or less completed when during the middle years of this century the new experiments in poetry threw metre, music and structural symmetry to the winds and rejected all inhibitions in the choice of subjects for poetry.

While modern forms of poetry like the lyric and the short narrative poem have stood in opposition to the requirements of classical tradition, older forms like the epic, when attempted even in modern times, have invoked and adhered to the standards and modes characteristic of classicism. Kuvempu's Ramayana Darsanam and Gokak's Bharata Sindhurashmi are fully classical in form, content, approach and appeal. They remind the reader of the great compositions of an earlier age and share with them the characteristic features of classicism detailed earlier.

V.M.I.

CLASSICISM (Malayalam) in the context of Malayalam literature may be loosely defined as the observance of a set of rules in literary compositions. In the medieval period there were models of Pattu, Manipravala, Champu, Attakkatha, and Sandesakavya. All these literary genres followed some literary or linguistic rules and so they may be called classics of Malayalam literature. These models have been followed later by a number of writers.

Pattu strictly contained only Dravidian sounds and was written in non-Sanskritic metres. Manipravala was a happy blending of Malayalam and Sanskrit and inflected Sanskrit words were a must in the composition. The Champu form was copied from Sanskrit literature with its own rule of composition. Sandesakavyas also had rules of composition and they were also borrowed from Sanskrit literature. Attakkathas form a native literary tradition and are used for staging Kathakali. Nalacharita of Unnayi Varier is the best among the works.

The Pattu school developed from Rama Charita to Niranam poets and Ezhuthacchan. Ezhuthacchan was a constant source of influence for later poets and even now the influence persists. Maturity of language, thought and imitativeness are there in the works of Ezhuthacchan, which are the essentials of a classic according to a modern observation.

Another classic literary form, Mahakavyas, made its appearance by the last lap of the 19th century. Ramachandravilasam by Azhakathu Padmanabha Kurup was the first Mahakavya produced in Malayalam. Later, more than two dozen Mahakavyas appeared, of which Umakeralam by Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Rukmangada Charitam by Panthalam Kerala Varma and Chitrayogam by Vallatol Naryana Menon are important.

P.V.V.P.

CLASSICISM (Marathi) The literature in Marathi, from its very beginnings upto the emergence of modern ethos, during the 19th and early 20th centuries laboured more or less under the influence of the classical norms. The upper class Hindu mind was then laden with the convention as laid down in ancient Indian rhetorics and poetics. So the very first of the literary exercises of the Mahanubhava Pandits were almost all classical in their descriptive passages as also in their usage of figurative conceits. Though the vehicle of many of these writers was the 'Ovi', as emerged not from the classical measures or metres, but from the living traditions of folk-lore, yet they followed the classical patterns of descriptive and narrative poetry. The major bulk of medieval literature was devotional in character and not only the upper class Brahmins, but the myriads from lower strata of society also sang and chanted praises of God (in different forms) with great fervour and enthusiasm that was more romantic in spirit and happily naive in character as the Abhangas and Padas (mostly unsanskritic in their nature) definitely show. Still where the longer narratives were concerned, or even where the philosophical or theological treatises were concerned, the poets of the medieval period turned to the classical ways and means. The songs in both the Mahanubhava and Warakari cults were as a rule free from this but where they were part of rituals like (1) Artikya or Arati, performed twice or thrice a day (2) the puja ceremony, or (3) the Pratisthapana of a deity, these songs were generally conventional and stylized. Narrative poems like Narendra's Rukmini Swayamvara or Bhaskar's Shishupalavadha, both following Mahanubhava Pantha or cult are romantic in spirit but the treatment of the story element is Puranic in tradition and conventional-classical in manner and style. Even Choubha's (Chobha) Usha-harana which is not a Mahanubhava work is of the same type. All these belong to the 13th and 14th centuries of the Christian era. Ekanath, wrote Rukmini Swayamvara and Bhavartha Ramayana, and these poems follow the Puranic pattern, yet they do not impress us to be classical, conventional and stylized in any way. The abandon in its spirit and the so called 'bookish' (Granthika) measure of its narration are characteristic of Ekanatha himself, who flourished in 16th century. Jnaneshvara's Jnanneshvari or Ekanath's Ekadasha Skandha popularly called Ekanathi Bhagavata use conventional manner of occasional description and the embelishing of explanatory figures of speech follow the modes, laid down by the old rhetorics or poetics. But the vehicle is the popular 'Ovi' Other devotional poets used episodes from the epics and Puranas but the measure or verse used by them was Ovi. The significant show of classicism is mainly seen in the so called 'Pandit poets', who along with matter, use the classical manner in their narrative poems. The case of the Mahanubhava poet Dimbha Krishnamuni is peculiar. First he wrote his long narrative poem 'Rukmini Swayamvara' in 16th century or there about. He used the usual episode for his poem, but employed Sanskritised metres or measures, which were and still are unknown to Sanskrta prosodists like Pingala. No other poet has shown knowledge of these newly - employed metres. Mukteshwara the poet renowned for his epic narrative has employed the Ovi measure, known after his own maternal grand father Ekanath, namely the Ekanathi Ovi, still he has used the classical metres in other writings and thus is more classical in the treatment of his subject matter. Then followed a long line of Pandit-poets like Ananda-Tanaya, Raghunath Pandit, Vitthal Borkar, Nageha Samaraj and especially the redoubtable Waman Pandit along with others, that show definite learnings towards classicism. They employed the classical Sanskrit metres and were true representatives of the classical. At the fag end of the 18th century Moropant appeared on the horizon with the tremendous verve at writing a great variety of poems. The renderings of the whole of the Mahabharata and the many types of Ramayanas along with the famous Kekavali both in the Sanskrit slokas as in the indigenous Arya (Giti of the prosody-pandits) measure-all these do speak of classical influence.

Almost all the poets of pre-Keshavasuta days i.e. those who were influenced by both the classics of old and the new awakening of the mid-nineteenth century-poets like Kirtikar and Kunte or Tembhe, Mogre, Agashe and Palande—were wrapped in classicism in style and the manner of expression. The so called 'Romances' or imaginary tales like 'Muktamala' (by L.M. Halbe) and 'Manjughosha' (by N.S. Risbud) were a curious mixture of the classical style of Kadambari of Banabhatta and the free, romantic spirit of imagination. Even after the rise of modernism in poetry, started by Keshavasuta, classicism lingered as we come across it in Lele Shastri's poems or in the pre-Keshavasuta Shastri writers like Krishna Shastri Chiplunkar and others. But the attempt at perfection of style, as in Chandrashekhar Gorhe, is sufficiently free in spirit and even the prose of the post-Vishnushastri. days was free from age old cliches of classical prose. The 20th century writing, both prose and verse, slowly freed itself from the bondages of the classical matter and manner. And the present day writing is almost surrealistic especially in poetry and occasionally in prose. The spirit of interpretation and invention has brought about a complete revolution in the writings of the new generation and classicism remains merely historically important.

S.S.B.

CLASSICISM (Punjabi). The dictionary meaning of classic is of the first class, of acknowledged excellence. The term was used in European literature and art for standard ancient Latin and Greek literature, art and culture. In the modern Indian languages such as Punjabi, most of the literature before the advent of the British, in its earlier period, that is the 19th century, had left behind classicism, first for romanticism and then realism and other later fashions. For instance, while poetry of the Riti style would approximate to the classical style of Europe, literature of the Bhakti tradition would be found to be more akin to the romantic style. But for its religious and moral discipline as well as period, it could be considered rightly a variety of the classical style. For whereas it revolts against the tradition set by Brahmanism, it yet subordinates the individual to society and class, and prominent features of western romanticism are missing in it. Broadly speaking, in the Indian languages, literature or art that follows a set tradition to tradition, and also belongs to antiquity which in India extends really upto the advent of British rule and to a certain extent is a continuation even in the British period of the old tradition, may be called classical. Thus in Punjabi literature we would designate all the three pre-British traditions, Gurmat (the Sikh religious tradition as embodied in the Guru Granth and other subsidiary works) is one of the classical traditions. It includes the work of Sheikh Farid not only because it is older than Gurubani and included in the Guru Granth but because of its formal and thematic discipline which is really akin to that of Gurubani, although Sheikh Farid belonged to a Sufi school.

The second classical tradition in Punjabi is the Sufi tradition starting with Shah Husain and coming through Ali Haider, Bull-e-Shah, Wajid upto Ghulam Rasul and Hadayat ul-Lah of the second half of the 19th century.

The third is embodied in the Kissas (romances of love and war). They are romantic only in their subject, which also is indeed sub-ordinated to spiritual platonic limitations, but are otherwise traditional in their ethical outlook, and literary form. This tradition starts so far as love romances are concerned with Damodar's kissa or Hir of the early 17th century and comes upto Fazal Shah's Sohni Mahival towards the end of the 19th century. In its other aspect also it starts really with Pilu's Mirza Sahiban, contemporaneous with Damodar, though some lays and ballads of war are available in parts which may be of a time about a century earlier. This genre degenerated in the 19th century to lays of heroism of robbers and outlaws, like Dulla Bhatti and Jiona Maur and many others upto the end of the 19th century. And even in the present age popular movements against British rule have been celebrated through these Vars in major part by popular accounts of Sikh history like the works of Kartar Singh Kalsawalia.

S.S.S.

CLASSICISM (Tamil). Classicism can be defined both in its formal aspects and with regard to its content. Both definitions can be considered valid, and taking a look at Tamil writing in the contemporary period, both in its formal aspect and in content should be gainful.

Indian literature, and in particular Tamil literature, has no exact division of the classics. In a loose sense we tend to accept whatever has survived from antiquity as a classic. The sum total of the classics suggests some thematic constraints as well as formal constraints.

The formal constraints are obviously more evident in verse than in prose, where the forms are comparatively of late origin. Formal verse, in the hands of uninspired practitioners, has deteriorated into a sort of intelligence test, filling in the blanks, and conforming to rules laid down as long ago as Tolkappiar and back. The result has been, in the modern period, a tendency to revolt against the classical and formal in so far as scansion, meter, rhyme and metaphorical order are concerned. The classic formulation of metaphor and other figures as ornaments no longer pleases the modern poet who wants to see metaphor and other such figures of speech as a specific consistent part, and not an appendix to poetry. So the major attempt at poetry in the contemporary period has been away from classicism, except that the form of the Sangam short lyrics at their best seem to suggest a contemporaneity and so can be considered modern, though it is recognised as classical. This is a dichotomy which most poets get over by modernising the content and keeping the form. Classicism might be said to prevail largely in this matter.

The other aspect, the theme, content or subject of a poem or a work of art, is and can be no longer dictated to by those concerns that Tolkappiyam or the later grammarians set out to establish. So classicism in prose is only a sort of going back to a reactionary past, it is a reverting to noncreativity. Prose has by its very modernity outgrown classicism and the works of poetry that are of any significance are wholly nonclassical in temper though still controlled by a verse form that is discernible. And the best of the new poets tend to discard the classical. Pichamurthy tried to compromise, being modern in form and classical in content, and the effect was a heady mixture when it was successful. Formal classicism has lost the day, as far as can be ascertained.

K.N.S.

CLASSICISM (Telugu). Telugu literature continued to be classical until the middle of the 19th century. The impact of western education after the establishment of the universities in India, helped to put an end to the unbroken sway of classical authority and brought new winds of change. With reference to Telugu literature, classicism implies strict adherance to traditional pattern, to grammar and rhetoric. The translation of The Mahabharata by Nannaya, Tikkana and Errana served as a model of evaluation for the poets of succeeding generations. Reverence for the Vedas, belief in caste system, faith in fate and rebirth regulated the thought process of all the classical poets. Their poetic composition faithfully followed all the rules laid down by ancient grammarains and the rhetoricians, without the slightest deviation.

Though it was a translation of the Sanskrit text, Bhagavatam by Potana displayed the spirit of innovation by deviating at places from the established rules of grammar and rhetoric. Free play of imagination is noticed in every passage where the poet is lifted into a mood of exaltation inspired by ardent devotion. While the classical poets composed their poems with their wits, some of the poems of Potana spring from the heart like lyrical outbursts. Hence the romantic poets regarded Potana as an inspiring example of the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings.

During the 'prabandha' period (10th century) poets revelled in verbal gymnastics, rhetorical flourishes and intellectual fireworks. In spite of imaginative treatment of small episodes chosen from the Puranas, the poets of that period did not have to break the rules of classical composition. The few works in prose which were written during that period, were as heavy and rhetorical as poems.

Though classical in technique, the works of Kandukuri Veeresalingam revealed modernity in thought-content. His prose was direct, forceful and purposive though it was grammatical. Chinnaya Suri wrote Panchatantra in prose and set up a model for the traditionalist who scrupulously followed all the rules and restraints laid down by grammarians.

The credit goes to Gidugu Ramamurti Pantulu who advocated the use of prose spoken by the educated class (shishta vyavaharika) as a medium of expression in literary compositions. He pleaded for the development of prose style which approximated to the spoken word. He discarded the artificial and pedantic prose used by writers till then and paved the way for the emergence and development of modern Telugu prose, which is easy, graceful, with a natural hue, free of any vulgarity. The shackles of classicism were broken in the field of prose journals. Cinema and the radio gave an impetus to the development of prose in the right direction. Sripada Subrahmanya Sastry and Chelam in the field of fiction, Narla in the field of journalism, Samudrala Raghavacharya and Tapi Dharma Rao in the field of cinema have contributed to the healthy trend of creating the spoken word to the standard of literary recognition.

The significant breakthrough came with the advent of the romantic movement in Telugu poetry. The high priest of the movement Devulapalli Krishna Sastry declared that there can be no song when the spirit is fettered. Stifling rules of rhetoric and stale poetic conventions which marked classical literature were thrown to the winds. Unlike the classical poets, the romantics held that pure poetry sprang from the impassioned heart and not from dazzling wit or sharp intellect. Poetry was regarded as an expression of the feelings and emotions, dreams and aspirations pulsating in the human heart, rather than as an exercise and display of intellectual flourishes.

Classicism in Telugu literature led to a veneration of the past without recognising the achievements of the present and the promise of the future. It created a nostalgia for the past which has vanished beyond recall. It has also encouraged deep attachment for the status quo which views all signs of change with suspicion and doubt. Classicism also encouraged stereotyped imitation of ancient models. Only during the present century, attempts at originality have been made in the different literary forms, poetry, fiction and drama in particular, where the influence of western literature encouraged the writers to depart from the beaten track of tradition. However, classicism is not devoid of its own merits with reference to Telugu literature. Classicism imposed upon the poet the virtues of restraint, elevation and economy of expression. Classical poets could withstand the test of time when they expressed in memorable words certain values and ideals which have an abiding quality.

C.N.S

COLLEGE OF FORT WILLIAM (Bengali). The College of Fort William was founded in 1800 in Calcutta by Lord Wellesley, the then Governor General of India with the express purpose for the training and general education of the young British Civilians. In a letter of 10th July 1800 Wellesley presented the plan of the College to the Directors of the East India Company. The College was formally founded on 18th August 1800, on which day the statutes of the College were framed but the 4th of May was decided to be recognized as its day of foundation, it being the first anniversary of the Victory of British arms at Seringapatnam against Tipu Sultan.

Wellesley wanted the Insitution to give not only a general education to the young civilians who used to come to India at a very early age without much education and almost without any administrative experience, but also to impart instruction in the languages, laws and usages and customs of India "together with such other branches of knowledge as are requisite to qualify them for their several stations". Wellesley proposed that their education "should be founded in a general knowledge of those branches of literature and science which form the basis of the education of persons destined to similar occupations in Europe" and "to this foundation should be added an initmate acquaintance with the history, languages, customs and the manners of the peoples of India", and of course, "with the political and commercial interests and relations of Great Britain".

The College had two establishments: European and Native. Only Europeans were given the designations of Professors and Teachers, while native scholars were known as Munshis of different categories. The College in its early years made arrangement for instructions in Laws and Regulations of British Government in India, Greek and Latin and a few Modern European languages, Mathematics, along with several Oriental languages both classical and modern. Among its professors at the initial stage of its history were G.H. Barlow (Law), N.B. Edmonstone (Persian), Lt. John Baillie (Arabic), John Gilchrist (Hindustani), C. Buchanon (Greek & Latin) and H.T. Colebrooke (Sanskrit). Among the teachers who rose to fame later most renowned was William Carey (Sanskrit and Bengali); Carey became a professor in 1807

The Indian establishment consisted of four departments: Arabic, Persian, Hindustani and Sanskrit and Bengali. Hindustani department concentrated on Urdu, that being the most prestigious vernacular of the time, and Hindi was not taught very seriously in the beginning. Several years later, however, Hindi received more attention and students were encouraged to learn that language. Courses were also offered in several other Indian languages, particularly in Marathi and Tamil and Telugu though no separate departments existed for these languages. Departments of Hindustani and of Persian were the most popular and active in the College. All the departments, however, had very able and talented scholars in their faculty, most well known among them were Mahammad Aslam (Arabic), Allah Dad (Persian), Tarinicharan Mitra (Urdu), Mir Amman (Urdu), Lallujilal (Hindi), and Mrityunjay Vidyalankar (Sanskrit and Bengali). Iswarchandra Vidyasagar also taught in the College for some time.

Though the College started with very ambitious projects and elaborate plans, it was soon reduced primarily to a language teaching insititution, and its programmes of teaching and publication suffered heavily because of the cynical and to some extent antagonistic attitude of the Court of Directors. In 1802 the Court of Directors ordered for its immediate abolition but mainly through the efforts and persuasions of Wellesley it survived, but by 1806 the College had to abandon most of its plans. It continued its existence through various odds till 1830 when all the posts of Professors and Teachers were abolished and it functioned with a skeleton staff primarily as an examination centre. It limped till 1854 when it was finally abolished. During its active career of nearly thirty years it passed through various stages of rough weather; it faced a series of financial and adminstrative problems, chronic problems of student indiscipline and inter-departmental rivalry and fierce criticism from the Court of Directors. But it had a few moments of glorious existence which made it a significant institution in the nineteenth century India. The College gave tremendous impetus to the growth of text books in different Indian languages and produced a large quantity of pedagogical works of varying nature. Some of its teachers wrote grammars and prepared lexicons and compiled anthologies for some languages for the first time which remained as sources of inspiration for the Indian scholars for a long time to come.

The College published about 20 books in Arabic, 24 in Sanskrit, 18 in Persian, 37 in Urdu, 18 in Bengali and at least 6 in Marathi. It also published books in Burmese, Chinese, Kannada, Oriya, Telugu and Punjabi. It also took interest in Pushtu, Nepali and Turkish. The general standard of the publication was not very high, nonetheless it made a significant contribution to the growth of linguistic studies in India. Unlike the Asiatic Society of Bengal, whose main interest was on the classical languages and on the antiquities of India, the College of Fort William focused its attention on the modern and living languages of the country without neglecting the older speeches. The College published important Sanskrit grammars such as Mugdhabodh (1807), Siddhanta Kaumudi (1812), legal works such as Mitaksara (1812), Manusamhita (1813) and also literary texts like Gitagobinda (1809) and religious works like the Bhagavadgita (1809). Some of its publications in Arabic, particularly the Arabic Syntax (1801), by John Bailley, Mutu-Khub-ul Laghat (1808), a lexicon based on the famous Arabic dictionary Qamus; the History of Timur (1818) written by Ahmad bin Muhammad of Damascus, and revised by Sheikh Ahmad, received scholarly attention in the early nineteenth century. Teachers of Persian not only wrote grammars and prepared anthologies for the use of the students but took great interest in Persian literature. Sikandarnama of Nizami was published by the College in 1812 and the Shahnama in 1811, part of which was translated into English by James Atkinson, a teacher of Arabic and Persian. The Oriental Fabulist (1803), a multi-lingual work including Arabic, Persian, Sanskrit, Bengali, Hindi, Urdu, prepared by John Gilchrist, is one of the most interesting publications of the teachers of the College. These books deserve particular mention, because they are important documents in the history of prose in Bengali, Hindi and Urdu. Ramram Basu's Raja Pratapaditya Charitra (1801) is the first narrative work in Bengali prose and Lallujilal's Prem Sagar (1810), a translation of the twenty chapters of the Bhagavata into Hindi prose, is one of the earliest specimens of literary prose in Hindi. Apart from the publications which had some effect on the academic life of the Indians, the College encouraged scholars and writers by giving them patronage. The College rewarded Nihalchand, Kundanlal, Tatoram, to name a few , for their poetic compositions in Urdu and bought copies of learned works published by scholars who had no connection with the institution; Raja Rammohan Roy was one such person to receive the patronage of the College. The College of Fort William acted as a centre of patronage of Oriental learning. It also acted as a liaison between several institutions such as the Serampore Mission, Asiatic Society, Calcutta Madrasa and the School Book Society. Its greatest contribution is towards the growth of prose in various Indian languages, particularly Urdu, Hindi and Bengali and towards the modernization of Indian literary scholarship.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. Buchanan, The College of Fort William (London 1805)., Sisirkumar Das, Sahibs and Munshis, An Account of the College of Fort William (Delhi, 1978)., T. Roebuck, The Annals of the College of Fort William (Calcutta, 1819).

S.D.

COMEDY (Gujarati) as a literary genre in Gujarati was developed due to the influence of Western literature. The first comedy in Gujarati was written by Navalram Pandya in 1867. It was an adaptation of Mock Doctor by French writer Moliere. The author has successfuily tried to transform the manners and customs and mode of life of Europe into those of Gujarat and brought out the humour and wit of the original in a masterly way. If the author had not said that the work was an adaptation, everybody would have acclaimed it as an original comedy of Gujarati. Two years later in 1869 Dalpatram wrote Mithyabhiman (False pride) which is the first original comedy in Gujarati. It depicts the humorous situations created by the hero Jivram who is a night blind, but wants to hide the fact of which everybody is aware. The comedy is in Bhavai (Gujarati folk theatre) style and hence the humour is not subtle, but enjoyable.

For a long duration of time no comedy worth the name was available. In the third decade of the twentieth century, Kanaiyalal Munshi in his Samajik Natako (Social plays, 1927) has given three comedies. Be kharab Jan (two bad men), Vavashetnun Swatantrata (The Independence of Vava Sheth) and Agnon Kit (Obedient). All three comedies are based on the conflict between the parents and their sons and daughters who adopt the path of confrontation.which create humorous situations. Munshi's other three comedies. Kakani Shashi (Uncles's Shashi, 1927), Brahmacharyashram (Settlements of Celibates, 1932) and Chhiye Tej Theek (We are better than what we are, 1948). The first play has women's struggle for liberty from the oppression of men as a theme. The second deals with the cracking down of vow of celibacy on seeing a beauty and the plot of the third play is about the manlike behaviour of female and female-like behaviour of man. In all these comedies the humour is well maintained.

Chandravadan Mehta's two comedies Mungi stree (Dumb woman, 1937) and Dedkani Panchsheri (Pride of Small Men, 1938) are worth mentioning. The former deals with a woman who was dumb, and her husband insisted the doctor treated her and restored her speech. Then the woman consistantly goes on prattling and the husband requests the doctor to turn her dumb again. The latter is based on the erratic behaviour and mannerisms of the contemporary Gujarati writers. Chandravadhan being one of the first rank playwrights, both the comedies are presented in an artistic manner.

Yashodhar Metha's Ghelo Babal (Mad Babul, 1957)

depicts the crazy adventures of a teenager who becomes a laughing stock of everybody. The plot is well developed and the presentation is realistic.

Chunilal Madia's is his Ranlo Robbinhood (1963) has exposed the triviality and dubious methods of the politicians in a humorous way.

We find numerous comedies in one act plays. Jayanti Dalal in his plays like Soyanun Nakun (the whole of the needle), Karsandas Manek in his plays like Khuda Hapis (Good bye), Nansukhlal Jhaveri in his plays like Govinda Ala (Servant has returned), Rambha Gandhi in her plays like Rojni Ramayan (daily affair), Jyotindra Davo in plays like Ispahan No Kavi (Poet of Isphan) have displayed their skill in portraying comic situations.

C.M.

COMMENTARIES (Hindi), which form part of a great tradition of the medieval literature, are generally available in Brajbhasha prose. Since the 'Khari boli' prose had not developed until then, the commentaries of this kind could not develop in an adequate measure. However, some commendable efforts were made by a few competent commentators.

The growth of commentaries during the medieval age could generally be attributed to four books viz. (1) Ramcharitmanas, (2) Bihari Satsai, (3) Kavipriya and (4) Rasikpriya. The largest number of commentaries are available on Bihari Satsai. Babu Jagannath Das 'Ratnakar' mentions twenty commentaries on Bihari. Most of these commentaries are available in manuscript form while some of them have been only referred to and are not physically verifiable. For example, the commentary on Bihari Satsai by Sardar Kavi is not available now. One of its copies was included in the collection by Ratnakar but it was eaten by termites and no other is now available. Some major commentaries on Bihari Satsai have been very popular. They include Anwar Chandrika Tika, Shri Krishna Lal's Tika, Panta Niwasi Karna Kavi's Sahitya-Chandrika Tika, Iswi Khan's Rasachandrika, Surati Mishra's Amar Chandrika, Hari Charan Das's Hari Prakash Tika, Takur Kavi's Satsaiya Varnanasanrti Tika and Sardar Kavi's Tika. Following Bihari, commentaries on Keshav's Kavipriya and Rasikpriya were undertaken. Some commentaries on Ram Chandrika are also available but in Brajbhasha prose only a solitary commentary by Janaki Prasad has been discovered, which was written by him in 1815 On Kavipriya there are two commentaries in Brajbhasha prose : one by Haricharan Das, which was written in 1778 and published by Munshi Naval Kishore of Lucknow. The second commentary is by Lachman Rai entitled 'Lachman Chandrika Tika' which was written in 1816. This commentary remains unpublished to this day. Among the commentaries of Rasikpriya, Jorawar prakash written by Surati Mishra is regarded as a good one. This is unpublished so far; its unpublished hand-written copies are available in various libraries. The commentary on Rasikpriya by Sardar is also available at some places. One of its editions was brought out by Nawal Kishore Press, Lucknow and the other by Venkateshwar Press, Bombay. Following Keshav, commentaries on Ramacharitamanas were also written. Among the old commentaries on Ramacharitamanas may be mentioned the one by Ishwari Narayan Singh of Kashi and the other by Mahant Ram Charan of Ayodhya. Of late commentary on Mati Ram's Lalit Lalam written by Gulab Rai has also been discovered. It has been printed by Bharat Jeewan Press, Kashi. Along with Lalit Lalam commentaries on Mati Ram's Rasraj have also been found of which the commentary entitled 'Manohar Prakash' by Hardanji Singhayach (bard) is very famous. This was printed at Rajasthan Yantralay, Ajmer in 1952. In this commentary the language used is Khariboli blended with Brajbhasha.

'Bharatbhushan ki Tika' by Jaswant Singh has also been recently talked of among rhetoricians. Thakur Shiva Singh has prepared a good commentary entitled 'Bhushan Kaumudi'. 'Alamkara Ratnakar' by Dalpati Rai, 'Alamkara Chintamani' by Pratap Sahi and 'Bhushana Chandrika' by Gulab Kavi were also referred to as commentaries on Bhasha Bhushana. Another commentary in Brajbhasha prose entitled 'Balibhadra Prakasha' has also been discovered. The year of publication given there is 1895. The commentary is written in the dialogue form. For example 'Kavyalingalankar Tahan hoi jahan jukti te artha ka samartha kara'. (Balibhadra Prakash, Manuscript).

In the style used in these commentaries, attempt has been made to bring out the element of 'Riti'. For example, besides explanation of 'Vakta' and 'Bodhavya', 'rasa', 'dhwani' 'nayika', 'alamkara', 'shabda', 'shakti' 'kavyadosha', etc., have also been discussed. In the poetry of Bihari and Keshav this tendency for exposition of the poetic genres is generally found. Even Krishna Kavi, who is known for his versified commentaries, does not fail to mention 'vakta' and 'bodhavya'. For example, 'yah nayika ki seenk pahire te sushobha bhai so upama sakhi sakhi prati kahat hai. sakhi nayak son kahati hai nayika hoo so kahe'. (Bihari Satsai Sateek, 1929).

In these commentaries one notices the tendency for explanations. But, by and large, the ordinary 'vritti' style has been taken recourse to. Under this style, emphasis is laid on the meaning of this entire sentence while in 'vyakhya' style the stanzas are explained in parts. The commentaries written in this style, at times, are more unintelligible than the original verse. This is noticeable in Sardar Kavi's 'Rasikpriya' and Janaki Prasad's 'Ramchandrika'. In this commentary written in question-answer style words like 'so kaise hain?' are used. This has been described as 'Kathambhooti' style by Acharya Ram Chandra Shukla. Amongst the modern commentaries on Ramacharitamanas, those by Pandit Jwalaprasad Mishra, Pandit Ramesh Bhatt, Pandit Vijayanand Tripathi deserve special mention. Similarly, among the commentaries on Bihari Satsai Lala Bhagwan Din's 'Bihari Bodhini', Ratnakar's Bihari Ratnakar' and Padma Singh Sharma's 'Bihari Satsai' are better known. Among commentaries in Khariboli, Lala Bhagwan Din's commentaries on Ramchandrika and Kavipriya enjoyed popularity among students and teachers alike. Of the modern commentaries written on Rasikpriya, one by Acharya Vishwanathprasad Mishra and the other by Pandit Lakshminidhi Chaturvedi are famous.

Of late a fine commentary on Padmavat has been written by Vasudevasharan Aggarwal.

In conclusion, the pace at which the commentaries in Hindi grew years ago, has considerably slowed down and the chances of their further growth appear to be almost bleak.

K.

COMMENTARIES (Kannada). The tradition of literary commentaries in Kannada is at least as old as the 11th century when Durgasimha in his Karnataka Banehatantra added a brief but lucid commentary on virtually all verses in Sanskrit he cited in the course of his text. It is in easy Kannada prose and gives the purport of the original Sanskrit verses in an easy and readily intelligible form.

But the tradition of adding a literary commentary on literary texts in Kannada is almost conspicuous by its absence, though the practice of writing commentaries and even auto-commentaries was quite current in the field of non-literary technical texts like grammar, religion,etc. Thus Keshiraja, the famous grammarian of Kannada who wrote the Shabdamanidarpana provides us a full-length commentary or vritti of his own on the cryptic karikas or verse-aphorisms of his treatise on grammar (13th cen tury).

Similarly, in the same century, we find references to Maghanandi's commentary on the Jaina theological work Shastra-sara-samuchchaya; and we have in his Padartha-sara a comprehensive Kannada explanation of all the Sanskrit and Prakrit authoritative citations.

When the Virashaivas started codifying, explicating and compiling the vachanas of the 12th century saints in the Vijaynagar period (15th century), they often subjoined tikas (commentaries) in Kannada because the vachanas which apparently looked like riddles could not be understood without an explanation of their hidden intent or esoteric significance. This is partly literary and semi-religious in inspiration. The best example of this is provided in Lingalila-vilasacharitra of Kallamathada Prabhudevaru. We might give here a specimen:-

Vachana: O Siddhasomanatha! Your devotee is like the liquid produced by heat; like the shadow of fire; like the rain of dew; like the horse-mirage; and like the sound produced by a mountain!

Commentary: The sweat produced in the body by heat is quite unlike the water spring gushing out of the earth. The shade of fire is quite unlike the cool shade of trees. The rain of dew is most unlike the rains we are used to. The mirage-horse is quite different from a real horse. The echoing sound near a mountain is very different from all other sounds. All these are similes which illustrate the fact that saints are totally different from ordinary persons, though they too move about in bodies just like others and though they are already liberated souls.

There is a whole class of vachanas which are riddle-like and called bedagina vachanagalu. These are usually accompanied by detailed explanations by anonymous explicators. We might give here a specimen of Moligeya Marayya's bedagina vachana along with its commentary.

Vachana: A mute bridegroom is taken in procession. The auspicious pitcher and mirror are put behind him! Three gods are seen lamenting in the jaws of death beside him. The bridegroom went back the way he came seeing this bad omen. The marriage remained uncelebrated, O blameless Mallikarjuna!

Commentary: One who is deaf to the guru's precept of knowledge is the soul, metaphorically spoken of here as the bridegroom. Thus he is denied the clarity of spiritual vision and immaculate action which is symbolised here as pitcher and mirror at his back. Since the bound soul is dying to the spiritual enlightenment, his mortal mind, body and spirit are described as lamenting in the jaws of death. When wisdom dawns upon him and he takes to the path of renunciation, the bridal procession takes a backward turn. He attains perfection.

By the end of the 19th century, we find the Mysore rulers encouraging scholars to edit Sanskrit epics like the Ramayana and Mahabharata with Kannada commentaries Mostly these were in the nature of word-to-word meaning in Kannada, resolving sandhis and samasas. Sometimes the gist too would be supplied at the end. But a more ambitious attempt is seen in the work of Pattabhirama Sastri revised by Motaganahalli Subrahmanya Sastri in four volumes of royal size published in the thirties. Here the gist of six commentaries in Sanskrit on the Ramayana (such as Tilaka, Govindarajiya, etc.) are summarised in important places.

Though most of the modern editors of old Kannada classics have given critical and historical introductions and notes on difficult words, a full-fledged commentary is all but rare. We might mention D.L. Narasimhachar's Pampabharatadipike as an exceptional specimen of a literary commentary in Kannada. He gives a complete word-to-word explanation as well as pertinent comments from the scholarly angle. A sumptuous commentary on similar lines is by Tekkunja Gopalakrishna Bhatta on Muddana's Ramasvamedha (20th century).

BIBLIOGRAPHY : M.V. Sitaramiah. Shastra-Sahitya, Bangalore University, Bangalore; 1975. Maghanandi's M.C. Padmanabha Sarma (ed.), Maghanandi's Padarthasara, Kannada Adhyayana Samstha, Mysore, 1969.

K.Kr.

COMMENTARIES (Malayalam). The earliest known commentary is the Bhasha Kautaliyam. The next is a group of works known as Attaprakarams.

Kerala has made great progress in Sanskrit studies since the 9th century A.D. A number of original works on Sastras and various aspects of literature were contributed by Namboodiri Brahmins and others. The commentaries on these and on Sanskrit works by scholars and poets in other parts of India are also available. Some of these are in Sanskrit itself. From the 14th century onwards we finds them in an increasing number in Malayalam.

One of the earliest during this period was Tattvamasi Vyakhyanam (a commentary on Tattvamasi). Trivandrum Oriental Manuscripts Library has published it (1929), the Editor being K. Sambasiva Sastri. Since then each century has produced some outstanding commentary on Sanskrit works. The Saundaryalahari of Sankaracharya, the astrological treatise Horasastra, and the basic book on Indian medicine the Ashtangahridaya are some of the many books on which early commentaries exist. Only a few of them have been printed.

Some original works in Malayalam have also been commented on. Most of them belong to the 'Manipravalam' period. The Unnuneelisandesam, for example, is one such with several commentaries in modern lines. The notable commentators are Attoor Krishna Pisharady (1923), Tampat Sankara Menon (1948), M.R. Velu Pillai Sastry (1949), Suranad Kunjan Pillai (1955), T.S. Bhattathirippad (1967) and P. Damodaran Pillai (1967). Another 'manipravala' work, Chandrotsavam has also had more than one commentator. The first was K. Sankara Menon (1922). Elankulam Kunjan Pillai (Kottayam, (1962), K.K. Raja (Trichur) and Neelakantan Bhattathirippad (Trichur, 1967) are the other commentators.

Another Malayalam work widely commented upon by modern scholars is the Nalacharitam. It is an important Kathakali text. A.R. Rajaraja Varma (1938), M.H. Sastri (1943), Desamangalathu Rama Varyar (1945), M.R. Velu Pillai Sastri (1948), K.K. Raja (1950), A.D. Hari Sarma (1957) and Elankulam Kunjan Pillai (1962) are the commentators.

The Lilathilakam is a 14th century work in Sanskrit on the grammar of 'manipravala' Malayalam. Suranad Kunjan Pillai (1946), Attoor Krishna Pisharady (4th Ed. Trichur, 1954) and Elankulam Kunjan Pillai (Trivandrum, 1955) have published their commentaries on it.

Commentaries have occasionally appreared on early Tamil texts. The Thirukkural (Revered Sayings) of Tiruvalluvar has been commented on by Vatayattukotta Parameswaran Pillai (Quilon, 1926). Thiruvallam Bhaskaran Nair is another scholar who interpreted Tamil texts in Malayalam. His commentary on the Tamil text Ozhuvilotukkam, a book on Saiva philosophy, has been published with a commentary by him (Trivandrum, 1965). Commentaries in Sanskrit, Tamil and Malayalam on the works of Sri Narayana Guru have been written by G. Balakrishnan Nair, Vidyananda Swamikal, Narayana Thirtha and others.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala Sahitya Charitram, Vols. I to V.

K.R.P.

COMMENTARIES (Pali). Pali Commentaries or Atthakathas are the oral exegetical traditions handed down among the Buddhist Sthaviras. Unlike the Sanskrit Bhashyas, which deal with the exegesis of the theme commented upon as well as new ideas innovated thereon, the atthakathas are the textual commentaries on the Pali canonical or non-canonical works, also known as tika works, and are religious and elucidative in character. Sub-commentaries (or anutikas) are also categorised as atthakathas.

Of the various Pali commentators Buddhadatta, Buddhaghosha and Dhammapala may be mentioned as the foremost who contributed to the Pali commentaries known as atthakathas.

Buddhadatta (4th-5th century A.D.), a native of Uragapura (Uraipura) in the Chola country, went to Simhala to study Buddhist Pali Agamas and their exegetical tradition supposed to have been collected by Malinda (Mahinda), brother of Ashoka, the great Mauryan Emperor. The main works composed by him are (i) Uttaravinichchhaya (in 31 chapters) comprising 3183 verses, (ii) Vinayavinichchhaya (in 23 chapters) comprising 969 verses. Both these works are the summaries (in poems) of the Samatapasadika of Buddhaghosha, a commentary on the Vinayapitaka. (iii) Abhidhammavatara and (iv) Ruparupavibhaga are compendia–works and deal with the Abhidhamma categories under the subdivisions chitta, chetasika, rupa, nibbana and rupa, arupa, chitta and chetasika respectively.

Buddhaghosha (5th century A.D.), the disciple of Mahasthavira Revata, is the greatest name in the history of Buddhist (Pali) non-canonical literature, who went to Sri Lanka during the reign of the Ceylonese king Mahanama at the instance of his preceptor to study, summarise and translate the extant Pali exegetical tradition there and write an elaborate compendium of Buddhist Abhidhamma philosophy under the title Visuddhimagga and 16 atthakathas on the various portions of Tripitaka as well as on the Jatakas. His commentary works are—Samantapasiadika (on Vinayapitaka), Kankhavitarani (on Patimokkha) Sumangalavilasini (on Dighanikaya), Papanchasudani (on Majjlimanikaya), Saratthapakasini (on Samyuttanikaya), Manorathapurani (on Anguttaranikaya), Paramathajotika (on the Khuddakapatha and Suttanipata of Khuddakanikaya), Atthasalini (on the Dhammasangani), Sammohavinodani (on the Vibhanga), Panchappakaranatthakatha (on the various portions of the Abhidhammapitaka excepting Dhammasangani and Vibhanga), Jatakatthavannana (on the Jatakas), Dhammapadatthakatha (on Dhammapada)) and Nanodaya and Pitakattayalakkanagandha. The last two works, which are no more extant, are short elucidative commentaries on the entire Pali Tipitakas.

Dhammapala flourished in South India in the time subsequent to the advent of Buddhaghosha and Buddhadatta who were contemporaries. He was a resident of Kanchi and is credited with the authorship of Mahatika (a commentary on the Visuddhimagga). Linatthapakasani (on Nettippakarana), Linatthappakasani (on the Atthakathas on the first four Nikayas), Jatakatthakatha (on the Jatakas) and Madhuratthavilasini (a sub-commentary on the Abhidhamma Atthakatha).

Except for these three noted commentators, Chulladhammapala, a disciple of Ananda, Upasena (author of Saddhammapajjotika on Niddesa), Kassapa (author of Mahavichchhedani or Vimatichchhedani), Mahanaman (author of Saddhammappakasani, a commentary on the Patisambhidhamagga), Vajirabuddhi (author of Vajirabuddhi, a commentary on the Samantapasadika), Khema (author of the Khemappakarana), Anuruddha (author of the Abhidhammatthakatha), Sariputta (a sub-commentator on the atthakathas of Buddhaghosha), Sangharakkhita, Buddhanaga, Vachissara, Sumangala, Saddhammajotipala, Dhammakitti, Buddharakkhita and Medhankara are also noteworthy.

During the 20th century, Pandita Dharmananda Koshambi may be mentioned as a leading Pali commentator whose commentaries on the Abhidhammatthasangaho of Anuruddha and Visuddhimaggo of Buddhaghosha are well known.

In short, the Pali commentaries could be grouped under the following three categories:
(a) the general attakathas containing the philosophical and theological commentaries on the various Pali texts, as well as the compendia, e.g., the atthakathas of Buddhaghosha and Dhammapala, enumerated above;
(b) commentaries on the Vinaya texts containing the code of conduct and pitfalls and illustrations of moral code prescribed for the Bhikkhus and the laity, e.g., the Samantapasadika of Buddhaghosha;
(c) commentary on the Jatakas prefixed with the Nidanakatha which deals with the elucidation of the previous births of the Buddha which grew in course of time into a legendary form and had a wide-ranging impact on the subsequent Buddhist literature containing the life of the Buddha, e.g., the Jatakatthavannana of Buddhaghosha and Jatakatthakatha of Dhammapala;
(d) sub-commentaries are known as anutikas. This class also comprehends the summaries of works grouped under (a) and (b); e.g. the Uttaravinichchhaya and Vinayavinichchhaya of Buddhadatta, Linatthappakasani (on the atthakathas) by Dhammapala and many other works, such as Uttaralinatthadipani and Vinayasaratthadipani by Vachissara Swamin on the above two works of Buddhadatta; and
(e) compendia, which deal with a presentation of the general theme of the philosophy of the Abhidhamma and other aspects of the Buddhist thought, such as, Visuddhimagga of Buddhaghosha, Abhidhammavatara and Ruparupavibhanga of Buddhadatta, Abhidhammatthasangaho of Anuruddha, Sachchasankhepa of Dhammapala, Namarupaparichchheda of Anuruddha, Namarupasamasa of Khemacharya, Suttasangaha, Khuddakasikkha and several other compendium works found in Burma and in Ceylon.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : B.C. Law, History of Pali Literature (2 Vols.) New Delhi, 1982., Bharat Singh Upadhaya, Pali Sahitya Ka Itihasa., M. Winternitz, A History of Indian Literature Vol. II, Calcutta 1933.,S.C. Banerji, An Introduction to Pali Literature, Calcutta, 1964.

K.S.

COMMENTARIES (Prakrit). Most of the commentaries in Prakrit are on Jaina canonical literature (agamas or Sutras) and are classified mainly under the following categories.

1. Niryukti (or Nijjutti) is an abstraction of the established principles of the Sutra literature and is mostly composed in metrical form supported by some illustrative parables and examples. This is mostly very compact in nature and needs further elucidation. Most of the literature falling in this class had been composed before 6th-7th century A.D. and had got mixed with other types of commentaries like the Bhashya. Niryukti literature, though mainly theological in nature contains simple but graceful lyrical verses depicting ascetic ideal and commonplace joy and sorrow, as also a good assortment of epigrams. The main Niryuktis are Acharanganiryukti; Sutrakritanganiryukti; Avashyakaniryukti; Uttaradhyayananiryukti; Dashavaikalikaniryukti.

2. Bhashya (Bhasha), literally meaning, is speaking out or explanation, and is focussed on giving corroborative material from old legends, popular belief and ascetic tradition. This again is mostly in metrical form. This class of literature throws light on the historical evolution of the Jaina ascetic tradition. The most important Bhashyas are: Nishithabhashya (which has a good assortment of fancy tales in a lighter vein and thus is of great importance for the history of the Indian fiction form), Vyavaharabhashya which throws light on regional customs and ways of life and on the life style of the different types of ascetics Brihatkalpabhashya (mostly in defence of Jaina tenets and codes of conduct for ascetics) and Oghaniryuktibhashya.

3. Churni (Chunni) written in prose in an elaborate exposition of the text of the Sutras, Niryuktis and some of the Bhashyas; they are mostly in Prakrit, but some have been written in Sanskrit-loaded Prakrit. This class of literature is very vast and is a rich source of information relating to social life, trade and commerce, law and order, communications and transport and daily life of people in general. The prose whenever it presents a parable or a description of a scene is crisp and racy in style. The most important churnis are: Acharangachurni, Sutrakritangachurni, Nishithavisheshachurni, Uttaradhyayanachurni and Avashyakachurni.

4. Tika (Teka) is usually a word by word paraphrase type commentary but it also adds at times further illustrations and elucidations by way of tales or maxims and it is that part which has a literary relevance. Most of the Tikas are in Sanskrit, the aim being to make Jaina thought and Jaina precepts an integral part of the Indian scholastic tradition. Only some Tikas are in Prakrit and they contain a large number of fables and tales. Some of them are Jaina adaptations of epic and Puranic legends and Buddhist Jatakas, but there are a large number of tales which have no other source.

The dates of the Churni and Tika literature are between the 6th century and 13th century. The overall literary importance of this class of literature, to quote Winternitz, "lies in their serving as a depository of very many ancient historical or semi-historical traditions on the one hand, and of a great mass of popular narrative themes on the other". Furthermore this literature is also important from the point of view of growth of the Indian fiction in prose.

The important commentators are chronologically arranged as follows:

1. Bhadrabahu (different from Bhadrabahu, the author of one of the Kalpasutras dating 4th century before Christ) belonging to the 1st century BC is traditionally accepted as the author of the Niryuktis.

2. Sanghadasa Gani (different from a later author of the same name to whom is ascribed Vasudevahindi) is said to be the author of Nishithabrihatkalpa and Vyavaharabhashya is an older contemporary of Haribhadra Suri 8th century.

3. Jinabhadra Gani or Jinadasa Gani (7th-8th century) said to be the teacher of Haribhadra Suri, wrote Jitakalpabhashya, and some minor Bhashyas as well as Churnis on most of the important canonical texts such as Acharanga, Sutrakritanga and on Nishitha and Avashyakabhashya. He was a versatile talent and has been highly praised by the Jaina acharyas.

4. Haribhadra Suri (8th century) was a prolific writer in Sanskrit as well as in Prakrit. He was not a mere commentator but also a great thinker and wrote in Sanskrit systematic treatises and philosophical works. He is equally accomplished in prose and poetry. His commentaries on the two important Sutras, Avashyaka and Dashavaialika, and on the Churnis (the works of his master) are crudite.

5. Shilanka or Shilacharya (9th century) wrote commentaries on the first two canonical books Acharangasutra and Sutrakritanga and his re-creations of the Prakrit Jaina lore in Sanskrit are significant contributions.

6. Nemichandra Suri (10th-11th century) teacher of the minister Chamundaraya in southern India wrote commentaries on Uttaradhyayanasutra. Besides this he wrote an independent treatise, Gommatasara.

7. Shanti Suri or Shantichandra Suri (11th century) wrote commentaries on Uttaradhyayanasutra.

8. Devendra Gani (11th century) alongwith Shanti Suri wrote a commentary on Uttarajjhayana.

9. Abhayadeva (11th century) disciple of Jineshvara and 10. Maladhari-Hemachandra Suri (different from the later Hemachandra, the eminent scholar and poet dating 12th century), are two other notable commentators.

V.M.

COMMENTARIES (Sanskrit) form an important section of Sanskrit literature. Many of the original writings in Sanskrit appear in the form of commentaries, as in the case of Shankara's bhasyas on the Prasthanatraya; some of the literary commentaries like those of Abhinavagupta, and Purnasarasvati are written in an ornate style and can be considered as pure literature. Some portions of the Brahmanas themselves are considered as vyakhyanas or commentaries on the mantras (mantravivaranani vyakhyanani). With the development of the Sutra-literature, compressing the basic points in brief aphorisms as a help for memorizing, the need for elaborate explanations in the form of bhashyas or commentaries arose. For many of the sutra texts there are elaborate bhashyas, such as Jaimini on Mimamsa-sutras, Shankara and others on the Brahmasutras, Patanjali on Panini's Ashtadhyayi and Katyayana's Varttika. The Vedangas were preserved in sutra form and had to have detailed commentaries and various Grihyasutras, Srauta-sutras, Dharma-sutras and Sulba-sutras. Depending on the need, different types of commentaries came into existence, viz vritti, varttika, bhasya, vyakhyana, tika and tippana. Full explanation of the basic text is the vritti; corrections and supplements are also included in varttika; the bhasya is more elaborate with examples and counter examples. The probable objections of purvapakshas and their refutations formed an important aspect of philosophical and technical texts. Among first rate writers in Sanskrit there are many commentators namily Shankara, Patanjali, Abhinavagupta, Appayya Dikshita and Purnasarasvati. Many like Mallinatha have written commentaries with the basic purpose of teaching the original texts.

The akanksha (expectancy) type of approach is used in many literary commentaries. The main verb is taken up and explained first; then questions such as 'who did it'?; 'how did he do it'?; 'where was it done'?; 'why was it done'?: and answered by referring to the words in the sentence. This method also explains the significance and importance of every word in the sentence. This is called the Khandanvaya method. The other method followed by commentators, like Mallinatha consists in giving the words of the text in the prose order and explaining them in that order, and is called the Dandanvaya method.

Commentaries are generally in prose; but there are many in metrical form also. Kumarila Bhatta's Shlokavarttika in Mimamsa and Sureshvara's Sambandhavarttika in Vedanta are some of the well known examples. Nilakantha's Niruktavarttika on Yaska's Nirukta, an anonymous Sarvanukramanipadyavivriti on the Sarvanukramani and a metrical commentary on Panini's Atadhyayi are also known.

K.K.R.

COMMENTARIES (Tamil). Like most Indian literatures, Tamil literature too had its early beginnings in classical poetry of a very high order. And the commentators who were equally eminent scholars were the first prose writers in Tamil.

The major works of the early commentators are: Kalaviyal Urai of Iraiyanar, Tolkappiyam Urai of Ilampooranar, works of Cenavarayar, Perasiriyar, Deivachilaiyar, Kalladar, Nacchinarkiniyar, Adiyarkkunallaar and Parimelazhakar. In the next important era, we have Nampillai, Nanjeeyar and Viyagyaana Chakravarti (Emperor of Commentators), Periyavaachaan Pillai, all of whom wrote commentaries on Nalayira Divya Prabandham in Manipravala style. They are masterly expositions unrivalled and unequalled by any other commentary; but they are intelligible only to persons learned in Tamil as well as Sanskrit.

The third epoch commences with the early British period. The important commentators of this era are the famous Editor Thandavaraya Mudaliar (an active participant in the Tamil Sangam of Ellis, a European Collector of Madras), C.W. Damodaram Pillai of Jaffna, Anantarama Iyar, Anavaratavinayakam Pillai and Mahamahopadyaya U.V. Swaminatha Iyer who was called the Erasmus of India in recognition of his exact and careful editing and textual elucidation, complete with glossary and different readings of the texts.

In the post-Swaminatha Aiyar epoch, we must mention some of his contemporaries like the well known Aarumuka Navalar of Jaffna, Thillaiyambur Chandrasekara Kaviraja Pandithar and Bavanantham Pillai. Later on we come across Komateesvaran Pettai Rajagopala Pillai, Visakaperumal Aiyar, Mazhavai Mahalinga Iyer, Mu. Raghava Iyengar and S. Vaiyapuri Pillai.

The commentaries were by the learned, for the learned. Modern commentaries are in simpler style and yet literary.

We find that a great scholar wrote or re-wrote a commentary on Naalayira Divya Prabandham simply by avoiding the Sanskrit words. We are referring to Purushothama Naidu's notes or short commentary published by the University of Madras in the early 1950.

The Tamil University at Tanjavur has created another milestone in the history of the said work by publishing Gnanasundaram's commentary in chaste Tamil.

Variorum editions of many works have come to be published along with the commentaries. One such is the set of Kamba Ramayanam volumes published between 1956 and 1969 by Annamalai University. It is meant for the average reader and the Sandhis (complex words) are split. Earlier editions include one by Murray Rajam, a dedicated philanthropist and scholar. He has also patronised an edition of Sangam classics with meanings of difficult words. Thirukkural has perhaps had more commentaries than any other work. Several scholars of various centuries have given their interpretations. In recent years, M. Varadarajan, V.S.P. Manikkam, Thirukkuralar V. Munuswamy, K. Appadorai and M. Karunanidhi and a host of others have written on the Kural with their particular backgrounds and experiences. The Madurai Kamaraj University has issued a variorum edition. Tholkappiya urai done by Sivalinganar is one of the many commentaries on the earliest Tamil grammar. The International Institute of Tamil Studies, Madras, has come out with a variorum edition.

Thiruvasakam is another work, which is now attracting commentaries, though at one time scholars considered it a crime to attempt such writings on devotional literature.

Thiru Arutpa, the holy outpourings of Vallalar Ramalinga Swamikal of Vadalur, now has an elaborate commentary. The commentator is Avvai Doraiswamy Pillai, considered a specialist in the field. Annamalai University has so far (up to April 1985) published five out of the 10-volume project.

Jnanamritam is a commentary on Saiva Siddhantha works by the erudite scholar Pulavar Ambai Sankaran.

Some Jain works have been edited by Mu. Shanmukam Pillai, who had his early training under Vaiyapuri Pillai.

Many of the Sthala Puranas by Mahavidvan Tirichirapuram Meenakshi Sundaram Pillai and others are currently being reprinted, with commentaries. Anandarangam Pillai's Diary, which is the day-to-day reminiscences of an interpreter (Dubash) of the 17th century French Government in Pondicherry, is a masterpiece of Tamil writing of that era and is a mine of information. The originals are in several volumes and are deposited in Paris. The Government at Pondicherry has published some volumes. There is a move in several academic circles to publish a text faithful to the original.

A major work on the commentators is Urai Aasiriyarkal by Mu Vai Aravindan.

Vagisam Pillai of Chidambaram has printed (in April 1984) Aathi Choodi, an ancient didactic work for children, with the meanings as well.

S.

COMMENTARIES (Telugu). Though Telugu literature has been in existence for more than a thousand years, it did not feel any need for commentaries for the first six and a half centuries. Even if a few commentries surfaced they must have vanished in due course.

The first among the available commentaries are on 'Dwyardhi Kavyas'. There is a geniune need for division of the poem into words, explanation of the meaning and interpretation for many of the components in 'Dwyardhi Kavyas'. Muddaraju Peda Ramana of about 1575 wrote a commentary on Pingali Swana's Raghava Pandaviyam under the title Aadarsani. He defined a 'tika', as one which completely explains the meanings of the original. He promised he would bring out a commentary with double meanings, both in Telugu and Sanskrit with the help of goddess Lakshmi. If Swana had followed six methods, Ramana followed the same six methods in his scholarly commentary. In his book, Ramana quoted 32 Sanskrit works and 9 Telugu works. Though he wrote it in colloquial Telugu, the publisher printed the work in bookish language. Around 1600 one Chitrakavi Venkata Ramana brought out another commentary for Raghava Pandaviyam. This was not printed. He was said to have brought out commentaries on Vasu Charitra and Ahmukha Malyada. Around 1590 Anantayya, son of Chitrakavi Peddana, author of Lakshana Sara Sangraham brought out a commentary on Ramaraja bhushnana dwyardhi Kavya, Harishchandra, Nalopakhyanam under the name Prakashika. He also wrote a book on Vishnu Chittiyan. He considered himself an expert in explaining the difference in the ancient and modern works. Even the commentary he brought out, he did expertly according to his promise, 'vibhuda varyulu pogada' to the praise of the discerning.

Around fifty years ago there was a commentary on a few poems in Andhra Mahabharata. Kallini Venkata Subrahmanya Dikshitalu brought out such commentary on Andhra-Mahabhagavatam. Vavila Kolanu translated the Ramayana and wrote a commentary on it.

Allasani Peddana's Manu Charita was commented upon by Vavilla Ramaswamy Sastry, Thaujanagaram Tevapperumallayya, Anantachaiyulu, and Vemparala Siriyanarayana Sastry. The last was the latest and the most thorough commentary. Nagapudi Kuppusamayya's commentary Parimalam and Dusi Ramamurthy Sastry's Surabhi on Thimmana's Parijatapaharana are both popular and thorough. Likewise Ramarajabhushana's Vasu Charitra has commentaries by Chitrakavi Venkata Ramana Kavi on Juluni Appayya Pandita, under the name Pratipada tika (commentary on every word) on Somanadha Kavi under the name Vidwanmanoranjani, by Thanjanagaram Thevapperumallayya, Mulupaka Butchaiah Sastry and by Sishthu Krishnamurthy Sastry. Srikrishna Deva Raya's Aamuktamalyada has commentaries by Chitrakavi Venkata Ramana Kavi, Gattupalli Srinivasa Kavi, Jogi Jagannatha Raju, under the title Budha Manasthoshini, Gudipati Venkata Kavi under the title Tatparya Bodhini, Vavilla Ramaswamy Sastry under the title Ruchi Vyakhyanam and Vidam Venkata Raya Sastry under the title Sanjivani Vyakhaya. Of them the last is the best and most thorough. Tenali Ramakrishna's Pandu Ranga Mahatmyam has two commentaries by Thenmathan Srirangacharya and by Bulusu Venkata Ramanayya. Srinatha's Sringara Naishadham has two commentaries, by Kettavarapu Venkata Sastry under the title Gudaidha Prakasika and by Vedam under the title Sarvamkasha Vyakhya, both published. The commentary by Vedam is all embracing. Srikalahasti Mahatmayam has Bubusu Venkata Ramanayya's Laghu Tika and Chilukuri Papayya Sastry's commentary. Sunana's Prabhavati Pradyumnai has commentaries by Pinan panda Mallayya Sastry and by Vemparata Suryanarayana Sastry. His Kala Purnodayam has two commentries, one by Ramanujacharyulu, disciple of Chinnaya Suri, and the other by Malladi Suryanarayana Sastry. Gaurana's Harishchandropakhyanam has commentaries by the Pundits under Brown and Tanjangaram Thevapperumallayya and Vedam. Vijaya Vilasami was commented upon by Juluni Appayya Pundit, Vedam, Bulusu and by Thapi Dharma Rao who brought out its many sided excellence under the title Hridayollasam, and by Nori Gurulinga Sastry under the title Tattwabodhini. Allamraja Subrahamanya Kavi's Subhadraparinayam was commented upon by Puranapanda Mallayya Sastry. Krishnarjuna Charitra by the same poet was commented upon by Vikramadeva Verma. Srinatha's Hara-Vilasam has a commentary by Bulusu Venkata Ramanayya.

Vedam Venkaraya Sastry, renowned as Andhra Mallinatha wrote commentaries on many Sanskrit works liked Pushpabana Vilasam, Amarukam, Balhana Charitra, Bhartrihari Subhashitas, Raghuvamsam and Kumarasambhavam (six cantos), on Sri Harsha's Priya Darshika, Panchatantram, Vikramankacharitra, Meghasandesam and many other books. His commentary on Meghasandesam is acclaimed next only to Mallinatha's Sanjivani

Vyakhyas. But his commentary on Chemakura Venkata Kavi's Sarangadhara Charitra was thought to be far from perfect by Dipala Pitchayya Sastry who wrote a great commentary on the same book under the title Jitha Kasi.

There are many commentaries for Chinnaya Suri's Bala Vyakaranam; Guptarthaprakashika Bala Vyakarana, Sarasya Sarvaswa petika, Ramaniyam by Bulusu and many others. There are many more commentaries on Andhrasabda Chintamani by Dwithanthrini Sitarama Kavi; on Proudhavyakaranam by Kumaradeva Pandita, Subodhani and Tattwa Bhodhani by two others on the same book. Spoorti Sri has brought out two excellent commentaries on both Balavyakarana and Proudha Vyakaranam. Vijjhala China Sitarama Sastry wrote a great work Andhravyakarana Samhita Sarvasvani covering all Telugu works on grammar. Likewise, Vedam's commentary on Sahityadarpanam, Sannidhanam's commentary on Kavyalankara Sangraham, Chelamachevla's comprehensive commentary on Andhraprataparudra, Yasobhushanam are among many other commentaries which enriched Telugu literature.

J.V.S.

CONTROVERSIES (Telugu). There is a Sanskrit saying that knowledge grows by rivalry. A disputation is the touchstone of one's scholarship. In Andhra there are some famous disputations with which poets were involved.

Srinath reached Vijayanagar to proclaim the greatness of Telugu poetry in Karnataka. He wished to see the emperor Praudha Devaraya but he could not gain admission into his presence, although he waited for a long time. Then Srinatha sent a message to the emperor. He said that he was Srinatha who came to Vijayanagar to challenge the poets and scholars at his court. But the challenge was not a mere outburst of egotism. He proved to be more than a match, in a disputation that was arranged to meet Dindima Bhattu, the poet-laureate of Praudha Devaraya. He overcame Dimdima Bhattu and was honoured with the title 'Kavisarvabhauma' and 'Kanakabhishekam' (a shower of gold coins).

Tenali Ramakrishna and Ramaraja Bhushana were rival poets. Ramakrishna ridiculed the poetry of Ramaraja Bhushana as artificial, studied and laborious, 'like the fish-basket woven by a basketweaver'. On another occasion, he got the better of Narasaraju, who came with the avowed intention of exposing the faults in Ramakrishna's poetry and then launched a most personal attack on him. He called him an 'ignoramus' who presumed to judge his superiors, warned him against the repetition of such error and rounded off the homily with undisguised abuse.

The two sets of twin poets Tirnpath Venkatesvavahu (Divakarla Tirupati Sobtriand Chellapila Venkata Sastri) and Venkata Ramakrishra Kavalu (Oleti Venkatarana Sastri and Vedula Ramakrishna Sastri), Triupati Venkata Kavulu, the precursors of the modern age in Telugu literature earned a great reputation for their matchless gifts exhibited during the satavadhanams and ashtavadhanams. On one occasion, they entered into controversy with the Poets-laureate of Pithapuram, Ramakrishna Kavulu. It was an interesting passage of arms between the disputants. Ramakrishna Kavulu attacked Tirupathi-Venkata Kavulu in an article called 'Srinkhala', to which the latter gave a rejoinder in another article called 'Srinkhala Thruneekaramu'. Ramakrishna Kavulu resumed their attack in another article called 'Sathaghni', while Tirupati Venkata Kavulu rejected the charges in their article 'Pasupathamu'. Subsequently Ramakrishna Kavulu continued their assault in a poem entitled 'Kokila-Kakamu', to which Tirupathi Venkata Kavulu replied in their 'Giratham' running into three parts. It begins with 'Vasinganna parvam' and runs into 15 parvams on the model of Mahabharatham. Giratham deserves the highest place among all literary controversies in Telugu. It is memorable for its poetical turns of expression and its underlying irony. In spite of this controversy, Chellapilla Venkata Sastry expressed his grief over the death of Venkatarama Sastry, who was one of the group of Ramakrishna Kavulu, prompted by the impulse of the noble teacher for his equally distinguished pupil.

> You departed because you could not stop;
> I stopped because I could not go.
> It seems even Gods have little control over their decisions.
> Then what of poor mortals?

The next encounter of Tirupathi Venkata Kavulu was with Kopparapu brothers. The former sent a challenge to Tirupathi Venkata Kavulu to come and try a bout with them in extempore versification, or in philology or in Satavadhanam. Kopparapu brothers accepted the challenge with an equally bold resolution. They went even a step further and asked Tirupathi Venkata Kavulu to lay a bet on their moustache.

Then Veluri Sivarama Sastry intervened with commendable boldness on the part of a young scholar. He sent word to Kopparapu brothers that he was prepared to meet them on behalf of Tirupathi-Venkata Kavulu. 'It is said that the bells you wear on yourself signify your ability to versify extempore by the hundreds. I shall knock those bells off. I hear that you think no end of your superior faculties at Ashtavadhanam. Come, I shall lick you at both'. But Kopparaju brothers reacted to his defiance more in affectionate forbearance than in anger. They cautioned him against his rashness and told him that where his Gurus were slow to tread, it would be a folly to rush. They advised him that being young, and with a long life before him, he should prepare for a bright future instead of risking duels with poets like him.

These literary disputations thus gave not only pleasure to the scholarly people, but brought to light the ability for versification, the inventiveness and the powers of wit and irony of the disputants.

J.J.K.B.

COOMARASWAMY, ANANDA K. (English; b. 1877, d. 1947)* was born in Colombo of Sri Lankan Tamil parents, Sir Mutu Coomaraswamy and Lady Coomaraswamy, formerly Elizabeth Caly Beeby. The middle letter K stands for Kent, his mother's place in England. His father, Sir Mutu Coomaraswamy was a savant, scholar and statesman in his own right, and popular in the court circles of Queen Victoria, from whose hands he received the honour of Knighthood in 1874. He authored several works and translations in connection with Tamil literature and also relating to Indian and Buddhist philosophy. Sir Mutu Coomaraswamy, who was to have followed his wife and infant son to England, suddenly passed away in Colombo. Ananda Coomaraswamy was brought up by his mother in England. He took the B.Sc. Degree of the University of London in 1900 and later in 1906, qualified for the D.Sc.Degree of the same university. He joined the Mineralogical Survey of Ceylon as its Director, and continued in that capacity till 1906. Ananda spent the period between 1907 and 1917 in India and England and, in October 1917, joined the Boston Museum of Fine Arts in the USA as Keeper of Indian Art, and retired from the service of the Museum in 1947. Taking advantage of his stay in Sri Lanka, where he was working as a mineralogist, he made his debut as an art-critic with the publication of Mediaeval Sinhalese Art in 1908. In his own words, "Mediaeval Sinhalese Art was the art of a people for whom husbandry was the most honourable of all occupations, amongst whom the landless man was a nobody, and whose ploughman spoke as elegantly as courtiers." Verily it is said in the Tirukkural:

> The ploughman is the world's very linchpin.
> As he bears the burden of all those who are out of it.

"The analysis of the iconography of Shiva dancing that Coomaraswamy offered in the title essay in the 'Dance of Shiva' was a pioneering piece of work, improved upon since 1918, but not without acknowledgement of Coomaraswamy's original formation. As for the essays in that collection, Roger Lipsey, in describing them, uses such phrases as "civilized graceful pieces, neither angry in tone nor excessively careful", his ideas being given a summation, not at all dense nor as learned as the second summation of his later years, but extremely attractive and in no way contradictory to what he would later think."

Coomaraswamy was a pioneer in establishing another field of study, that is, Rajput Painting, which is the painting of Rajputana and Bundelkhand and the Punjab Himalayas. Coomaraswamy stresses the importance of distinguishing at a glance pure type of Rajput and Mughal paintings. "Rajput painting is essentially an aristocratic folk art, appealing to all classes alike, static, lyrical and inconceivable apart from the life it reflects. It illustrates every phase of mediaeval Hindi literature and indeed its theme cannot be understood without a thorough knowledge of the Indian epics, the krishna Lila literature, music and erotics. Rajput painting enlarged, becomes a mural frescoe, historically indeed a reduced wall painting. Mughal painting uses soft tonalities and atmospheric effects; Rajput colour suggests enamel or stained glass, and while it may be used to establish the planes, is never blended to produce effects. Rajput outline is interrupted and allusive or fluent and definitive, but always swift and facile. Relief effect is sought and obtained in Mughal painting by means of shading: Rajput colour is always flat, and a night scene is lighted as evenly as one in full sunlight, the conditions being indicated by accessories (such as candles or torches) rather than represented. Thus, in spirit, Mughal painting is modern, Rajput still mediaeval."

Coomaraswamy questioned the contention of a Greek origin of the Buddha image and established firmly that both in matter and spirit, it was Indian. The derisive laughter of Vincent Smith and others "at the many-armed gods and goddesses whose images have no pretensions to beauty and criticism that Indian sculpture properly so-called hardly deserves to be reckoned as art," was silenced by Coomaraswamy, and a metamorphosis in thinking was noticed even during his lifetime. Coomaraswamy pleads: "Let us submit the Indian, Greek or Egyptian figures to recognised standards, and to criticism a little more penetrating than is involved in merely counting heads or arms. All worlds are ideal worlds of one kind or another. It is no crtiticism of a fairy tale to say that in our world we meet no fairies. Nor is it a criticism of an Indian icon to point out that we know no human beings with more than two arms. For those should not air their likes and dislikes in Oriental art who when they speak of art mean mere illustration: for there they will rarely meet with what they seek and the expression of their disappointment becomes wearisome."

Symbolism in art is emphasised by Coomaraswamy again and again in his writings, and this has been handed down to posterity for countless generations. A dancing Nataraja is eternal action, whereas the cosmic sleep of Vishnu or the seated Dakshinamurti or the Buddha denotes eternal rest. The contrast of the stillness of the Buddha and the fluidity of Nataraja representing inaction and action, the two opposites in nature evoke a tender chord in the heart of Coomaraswamy. His observations are illuminating: "If the dancing figure stands for evolution, the everlasting becoming, the yogi-type of the seated Buddha is an equally dramatic stage of withdrawal, of complete independence, of involution. This pose does not represent any sort of mortification of the flesh. That position has been immemorially adopted by Indian thinkers as most convenient for meditation, because the body remains self-supported without effort and on the other hand with a tendency to sleep." He quotes from the Bhagavadgita (VI, 19) that "the likeness of the seated yogi is a lamp in a wild place that flickers not."

Most people know Coomaraswamy as a connoisseur of the arts, art critic and art historian. He had a long association with objects of art right from the first memoir on the Bronzes from Ceylon chiefly in the Colombo Museum, the text of which was written by him. The exhaustive monograph (1914) carried 28 plates. Even the essay, 'Dance of Shiva' one of the 14 essays published under that title, that came out in 1917 from New York, was first published in the Siddhanta Dipika (Vol. XII - July 1912). The Bulletins of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts covering a period of just over a quarter century carry the imprint of Coomaraswamy's erudition. He established his reputation as an art historian with the publication of the History of Indian and Indonesian Art in 1927. Coomaraswamy, in his own inimitable way, says of Indian Art: "The Indian stylistic sequence cannot be interpreted or understood in terms of greater or less 'observation of nature', but in purely aesthetic terms (mass, energy, grace, etc.); not interested in appearance, but in types, designated by selection of essential characters; not in moments of activity. An image is not made to be seen (exhibited), but to be realised; its actuality is psychological not empirical." In his Transformation of Nature in Art, we see Coomaraswamy at the height of his powers - not a height from which he would quickly fall, but rather a plateau that he would securely occupy for the remainder of his career.

The latent philosopher in Coomaraswamy can be spotted in his writings, whether pertaining to art and history or metaphysics. His later writings are weighty and dense vis-a-vis the earlier ones. His scriptural quotations from Indian sources find their echoes in Greek and Latin, and he blossomed into a syncretistic thinker preaching universalism. His writings became more and more important with the passage of time. "The period between 1932-47 corresponding to Coomaraswamy's tenure as a Research Fellow at the Museum of Fine Arts were indisputable. A critical study of his metaphysical writings would reveal the stature of Coomaraswamy as a philosopher. In the words of Whitall N.Perry, "A New Approach to the Vedas marks him as perhaps the finest craftsman of the English language our century has yet seen ....."

A wizard with words, Ananda Coomaraswamy shows his mettle explaining a complex matter and making it understandable. One can easily see these qualities in his English renderings of the Upanishads or in his book Time and Eternity.

The English language was enriched by Coomarswamy's writings on such diverse topics as Indian and Oriental Art and its history, religion and philosophy. "Few if any Asians have written such graceful and well balanced English prose. His wide reading in European literature, and his deep appreciation of western as well as Asian contributed to make him one of the greatest writers on these themes in the whole of the twentieth century," says A.L. Basham of Coomarasway. Coomaraswany wrote over 500 articles and authored a number of works, he was a scholars' scholars' scholar'. He dived deep into the scriptures both of the East and the West, and interpreted India to the world in a manner which few could emulate. He was a reservoir of encyclopaedic knowledge, whose writings are noted for scientific precision, lucidity of thought and clarity of expression. He loved knowledge more than he loved anything else, and was adored as a 'Sage' in the USA, where he spent a sizeble part of his life. Though considered an authority on Indian art, in the ultimate analysis, (though he made no pretensions due to his modesty) Ananda Coomaraswamy would continue to be read as a philosopher in all the continents of the world and revered so.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Roger Lipsey, Coomaraswamy-His Life & Work, (Princeton University Press, 1977); S. Durai Raja Singam, The Life and Writings of Sir Mutu Coomaraswamy (1973); S. Durai Raja Singam, (ed.) Homage to Ananda Coomaraswamy (1952).

K.C.K.

COURT LITERATURE (Hindi) As Human society advanced and its infrastructure for financial, political and social development acquired stability, poetry got divided into two distinct traditions. One was the original tradition which continued to develop without being attached to any specific person cr class, and the other was the tradition of pure literature which got established through its close association with a specific person or context. When the monarchical system became more and more entrenched, one of the poetic forms got attached to it. Thus dawned the style of court literature. The tradition of Sanskrit Literature available today, conforms mostly to the form of courtly literature. Poets like Kalidasa were patronised by the monarchy and their literature can be termed as the literature developed in the royal courts.

The poets that herald the beginning of Hindi literature are all courtly poets. Prithviraj Raso, Hammir Raso and other similar works belong to this category. In the 'Riti Kal', the entire literature was developed and created in the courts. Bhushan, Bihari and Dev were all courtly poets. But these poets, too, gave emotional expression to basic experiences of life. For these poets, the poetic creativity besides being their professional imperative was also an urge of their inner selves. They had all the facilities given by the monarch, yet this literature, though created in the courts, matches well with the standard of pure literature.

A type of courtly poetry was that which was created by panegyrists, bards and minstrels whose sole aim was to please their patron by a variety of encomiums and wordy amusements. Every king or feudal lord had at least one such poet in his Court. Owing to the confinement of the theme to a limited context, these works do not attain a higher level of literary excellence. It is because of this reason that this sort of literature remained linked within the realm of their patrons.

In the development of Hindi poetic tradition, the courtly literature of the Early Period (Adi Kal or Vigata Kal) and of the Riti Kal, made an outstanding contribution. The courtly literature of the Riti Kal, owing to its inherent link with the traditions of Indian poetry, attained a superiority of diction and profundity of experience and sentiment quite spontaneously. There is no doubt that majority of such poets drew their poetic experiences from the goings-on in the feudal milieu, yet on the plane of sentiment and feeling their heroes were capable of influencing even the common man quite naturally. The reason for this is that they were genuine poets and not only the eulogisers of their patrons. Also, it is quite evident that these poets had no direct or relevant contact with the life of the masses. This fact accounts for the lack of social awareness in the works of these poets.

The majority of such courtly poets of the Riti Kal took Rasa to be the essence of all poetry. Their works have vivid descriptions of human emotion, especially of the feeling of love, both of union and separation. But the effect of this sentiment transcends all limits of caste, creed and even time. The king and the lowliest of lowlies, in experiencing a feeling, become one and common sharers of it–all have the same agony and the same ecstasy. It is in this context that the courtly poet transcends the bonds of time and space.

T.N.B.

COURT LITERATURE (Tamil). Poets, who as a class were poor, repaired to the court of a patron and composed poems extolling him, in return for which they were presented with money and precious jewels. As there was no way by which poets and generally writers could make money through their writings before printing was invented, they depended solely upon the patrons for their livelihood. Certainly there were serious defects in the system as poets tended (in the later ages) to extol non-existent qualities in their patrons and vastly exaggerated any little merit they could notice in them. And the patrons in some cases developed a tremendous conceit and treated the poets who came to them as lowly mendicants.

But there were noble patrons too and some spirited independent poets. Valuable poetry came to be composed in the courts of kings and other patrons who not only gave away money and presents but expressed warm appreciation for good poetry which was more valued by the poets. The entire Sangam work pertaining to the Ten Decades belonged to this variety. Many of the poems included in the celebrated Purananuru likewise were composed in the courts of kings. In one of them a poet proudly asserts, "Our tongue will not sing of worthless kings: it will not compose ballads around feats that in truth were not accomplished'." If kings did not treat them properly, or if they did not give them the respect due to them, they refused to accept the largesse offered and they composed poems deriding the uncultured patron and walked out.

During Sangam days, there were intrepid poets who could point an accusing finger at the wrongs perpetrated by tyrannical monarchs. But it must also be noted that these all-powerful rulers who could have ordered them to be beheaded listened to their words of wholesome advice and set right the wrongs done earlier. It was a case of nobility begetting nobility. Thus when the people found some laws of the king working against them, they approached a poet who took up their case, pleaded with the king and had the wrong righted.

Some poets made their patrons almost as famous as themselves: Kapilar and Pari, Avvai and Athiyaman, Aay Andiran and Mudamosi are thus remembered together. On account of the fame that the king acquired through such panegyrics, a king who set out to battle with his foes swore that if he did not defeat them, poets would not adorn his court and panegyrise his exploits. It was considered a great deprivation for kings and rich people not to have poets in their courts to sing of their valour in war and their munificence in peace.

The tradition of court poets continued long after the Sangam Age, though the calibre of both the patron and the poet fell sadly and the evils of the system came to the forefront. Sundaramurty Nayanar, the celebrated Shaiva hymnist, compared the run of patrons who were not moved to give even if poets showered undeserved praise on them, with Lord Shiva who gives unasked and gives overwhelmingly. Kamban, the greatest of Tamil poets, was patronised by Sadayappa Vallal and Villiputurar by Vakkapakai Varapatiatkondan. Sekkizhar, the author of the lives of Shaiva saints, was the recipient of many benefits from Anapaya Chola.

Among the latter-day patrons, there were Muslim potentates like Sitakkadi (Sheikh Kadir) who patronised a Hindu poet (among others), the rajah of Ettayapuram who patronised Umaruppulavar (Omar), the most celebrated of Tamil Muslim poets, and the heads of Shaiva mutts who were often themselves scholars and even poets.

COURT LITERATURE–TELUGU

In this century the most famous patron-poet pair must surely be Idayalaya Marudappa Tevar and Annamalai Reddiar. In their touching friendship and the reverential regard of the rich patron towards the impecunious poet we see glimmers of the ancient, long-forgotten art of literary patronage.

Today royal courts and literary patronage are dead like the dinosaur; perhaps there is a cause–and–effect relationship between patronage and poetry and poetry of quality may have suffered irreparable damage.

S.V.S.

COURT LITERATURE (Telugu). Telugu literature had the patronage and encouragement of the kings and thus it has flourished since the eleventh century upto the modern age.

The Chalukya king Rajarajendra of Vengi dynasty, who ruled over Andhra with Rajamundry as his capital in the 11th century, patronized the Telugu poet Nannaya in his court. He was the first Telugu king who gave encouragement and asked Nannaya, his court poet, to translate Vyasa's Mahabharata from Sanskrit into Telugu. With the help of Narayanabhattu, another Pandit, a poet and a classmate, Nannaya translated for the first time into Telugu from Sânskrit two and a half cantos i.e., Adi, Sabha and a half of Aranya Parvas of the Mahabharata. It was the first written Telugu Kavya and hence Nannaya is famous as Adikavi (the first poet) in Telugu. Due to the patronage of Rajaraja Narendra, Telugu literature came into existence through his court poet Nannaya.

Nannaya, as he is the first poet, has given to his successors the narrative style, characterisation, and the mode of translation from Sanskrit into Telugu. The period from Nannaya to Srinatha (15th century) is called Anuvadayuga (The Age of Translation).

There was no patronage of kings in the 12th century. This age is called Sivakavi Age because of the Saiva literature around that time. However, King Nannechanda is the author of Kumarasambhavam in Telugu.

Ranganatha Ramayana by the King Gona Buddha Reddy in 'Dwipada Chhandas' is also important.

In the 13th century, Manumasiddhi, a king of Telugu clan with Nellore as his capital, patronised a great Telugu poet, Tikkana. His work Nirvachano Tahararamayana was dedicated to the king of Manumasiddhi. Afterwards with full confidence, he had taken up the task of translating 15 cantos of the Mahabharata beginning with 'Virataparva' to 'Swargarohana parva'. A talented poet, we find fine Telugu idiom and usage in his works. He is famous for his dramatic style.

After the fall of Kakatiya Dynasty which ruled over Andhra, with Orugallu or Warangallu as their capital, the three chieftains who served the Kakatiya kings established three independent, small kingdoms at Hampi-Vijayanagaram, Addanki-Kondaveedu and Rachakond in Telingana and they are called Vijayanagar kings, Reddi kings and Velama kings respectively. These kings patronized poets by having them in their courts. Yerrana was patronised by Pralayavemareddi who ruled Reddi Kingdom from Addanki which was his capital. As a token of respect and regard the Harivamsa rendered into Telugu from Sanskrit was dedicated by Yerrana to Pralaya Vema Reddy. He is also the author of Aranyaparva Sesha (Part of Aranyaparva canto of the Mahabharata left untranslated by Nannaya), Narisimhapuranam and Ramayana. The Ramayana is now missing.

The poets Nannaya, Tikkana and Yerrana, who translated the Mahabharata into Telugu, are called as 'Kavitraya'. Nachana Somanatha a contemporary of Yerrana and the author of Uttara Harivansha was patronized by Bukkaraya the brother of Harihavaraya by donating him Perchikala village. It is revealed by an inscription. These brothers, Harihararaya and Bukkaraya, were responsible for the establishment of Hampi Vijayanagara Kingdom.

The Reddy Kings (Reddy Rajas) who ruled over Konda Veedu, Addanki, Chebrolu and Rajamundry were great scholars and patrons of Telugu literature. Poet Srinatha was patronised by the Reddy kings. He was Educational Officer in their Court. He is the first poet to translate Sanskrit Kavya into Telugu. Prior to that, from Nannaya onwards Telugu poets had translated only Puranas. It is a difficult task to translate Kavyas into Telugu. But Srinatha is successful in this venture and his successors followed him in this respect. Under the patronage of Reddy kings, Srinatha translated Sriharsha's Naishadhiya Kavya, a great Sanskrit Kavya–into Telugu as Sringara Naishadham. His other works are: Kashikandam, Bheema Kandam, Haravilasam, Sivaratri Mahatmyam, Palnati Veera Charitra, and Kreedabhiramam. Maruthrat Charitra, Salivahana Saptasati, Panditharadhya Charitra are also said to be written by him. But they are not the available now. First Srinatha was patronized by the Reddy king Komati Vemareddy of Kondaveedu Kingdom and afterwards by another Reddy king called Veerabhadra Reddy of Rajahmundry. Srinatha dedicated his Kasikandam to Veerabhadra Reddy, Sringara Naishadham to Maidi Singgana, the minister in the court of Peda Komati Vemareddy, Bheemakhandam to Benapudi Annaya Mantri, a minister in the court of Veera Bhadra Reddy. Srinatha also dedicated his Haravilasa to Avachi Thippaya Setti, a Merchant of Scents and a friend of Srinatha. He toured almost all over the country. During his tour, he had been to the Court of Pradhadevaraya, the king of Vijayanagar, where he won fame with Gaudha Dindima Bhatta, the court poet of Pradhadevaraya, and was honoured with Kanakabhisheka. From then on he was called 'Kavisaravabhauma'. He was also honoured by Sarvajna Singabhupati of Rachakonda and by Vimukonda Vallabhamatya. But during his last days he suffered a lot on losing the patronage of Reddy kings after the fall of the Reddy dynasty.

During the Srinatha period, poets were patronized by some chieftains. Gaurana lived in the court of Rachakonda kingdom. But he was a devotee of Siva and he dedicated his Harishchandropakhyana to Srisaila Mallikarjuna and Navamatha Charithra to Mallikarjuna Deva, the Sivabhikshu of Srisailam. Dubagunta Narayanakavi dedicated his work Panchatantra to Basavabhupala, the son of Thammaraja who ruled Udayagiri which was under the control of Gajapathis of Katakam. The poet Pillamrri Pinaveerabhadra lived in the court of Saluv Narasimha Rayalu of Vijayanagar and dedicated his Jamini Bharata to the king. He also translated Kalidasa's play, Abhijnana Sakuntala into Telugu as Sringara Sakuntala and dedicated it to Chillara Vennaya Mantri of Somaraju palle near Nellore. The two poets Nandimallya and Ghanta Singaya dedicated their Varaha Puranam to Thuluva Narasanayaka, the father of the famous Krishna Devaraya of Vijayanagar. They also dedicated another work, their translation of Prabodhachandradaya, to Ananthamathya Gangayya Mantri, the chief minister of Basava Bhupala, who ruled Udayagiri. A Kavya called Nachikothupakhayam of Duggupatti Duggana, the brother-in-law of Srinatha, was also dedicated to him. Vennalakanti Surana was patronized by Raghavareddy, son of Ravuri Basava Bhupala.

Some poets were patronized by ministers and others and poets in turn dedicated their works to them. Jakhana gave his work Vikramarka Charitra in dedication to the Accountant General of Devaraya of Vijayanagar. Madiki Singana dedicated his work Padmapuranothara Khandam to Veligandla Kandane manthri, a relation of Singara and the minister of Muppaya Bhupala of Sabbinadu.

Sri Krishna Devaraya, who ruled, Andhra in the 16th century, was a great patron of Telugu literature. This period is called Rayala Yugamu in Telugu literature. In fact it is a 'Golden Age' of Telugu literature. Rayalayugam is also called the Prabandha period. 'Prabandha' is one of the literary types of Telugu literature. It has its own features unlike earlier puranas and kavyas which are merely translations from Sanskrit. In Prabandha, there must be unity of plot and Sringara must invariably be the main rasa in it. The Prabandha style is entirely different from that of the earlier works.

Krishna Devaraya, himself a poet and author of works like Amukatamalyada or Vishnu Chityamu, patronised Telugu with great love and affection. He extended patronage to eight poets called 'Astadiggajas' and encouraged them to write original prabandhas in Telugu by giving grants in the form of villages (Agraharas, lands and money). Among them Allasamipeddana, the eldest and most respected one, was honoured by Srikrishna Devaraya. Peddana dedicated his great work Manucharitra to his patron king Krishna Devaraya. Another poet Nandi Timmana dedicated his work Parijathapaharana to his king. Dhurjati was the author of Sri Kalahasthi Mahatmyamu and Sri Kalahasthi Sathakam. Madayyagari Mallana wrote Rajasekhara Charitra. Ayyala Raju Ramabhadraudu was the author of Ramabhyudayamu. These five poets among eight adorned the Srikrishna Devaraya's court. About the others nothing is known. It is said that Kandukuri Rudra Kavi the author of Niranakusopakhyana and Sankusala Nrisimhakavi who wrote Kavikarna Rasayanamu were patronized by Krishna Devaraya. It is also said that the famous poets Pingalisurana, Ramaraja Bhushana and Tenali Ramakrishna adorned the court of Krishna Devaraya. But it is not historically correct. Even though these poets come under the 'Rayala Yugamu,' they were younger than the king. Hence it is ruled out that they were in the court of Krishna Devaraya.

Pingali Surana was patronised by Akuveeti Peda Thimmaraju and Nandyala Krishna Raju. He dedicated his works Raghava Pandaveeyamu and Kalapuranodayamu to them respectively. He was also the author of Prabhavathi Pradyumnamu which was dedicated to his father.

Bhattumurthy was patronised by Vijayanagara kings. He was honoured with the title of Ramaraj Bhushana by Aliya Ramaraya who ruled Vijayanagara empire after the death of Krishnadevaraya. He dedicated his famous Prabhandha Vasucharitra to Tirumala Raya, brother of Ramaraya and his Kavyalankara Samgraha to Obaya Narasa Raju, nephew of Ramaraya. Thus, the age of Krishna Devaraya is known as the 'Golden Age', in which original Telugu Prabandhas were written.

Then comes the Dakshinandhra Period in which Raghunatha Raualu, just like Krishnadevarayalu, being himself a great poet, patronized Telugu literature. His court was adorned not only by poets but also by poetesses. During his period, poets were Chemakura Venkata Kavi who wrote Vijayavilasamu and Sarangadhara Charita and Kshetrayya Padakavi who wrote Muvva Gopala Padalu. The Raghunatha Rayulu's son Vijayaraghavanayaka was also a poet and patronized poets and poetesses. Among the prominent poetesses was Rangajamma, author of Mannaradasa Vilasa Prabandhamu.

Kings of Madhura and Gingi also patronised Telugu literature. Later, Maharashtra kings before and after King Sarfoji, gave immense encouragement for the uplift of Telugu Literature.

During 'Ksheena Yuga' (Deccan period 1775-1875), some chiefs and Zamindars who ruled local over villages also patronized Telugu literature to some extent.

S.Ga.

COWASJEE, SAROS (English, b. 1931) was born at Hyderabad and educated at the Universities of Agra and Leeds. After working for two years as an Assistant Editor with the Times of India Press (Bombay), he went to Canada where, since 1971, he has been working as a Professor of English at the University of Regina.

Cowasjee is both a critic and a creative writer. He has published two books on Sean O'casey, an Irish dramatist, and is an internationally known critic of the renowned Indian English novelist Mulk Raj Anand, on whom he has published two books–Coolie: An Assessment (Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1971) and So Many Freedoms (Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1977). The latter discusses Mulk Raj Anand's life and times, and traces the various influences that have shaped his choice and treatment of themes and his fictional art, before passing on to a discussion of Anand's works. His Author to Critic (Calcutta: Writer's Workshop, 1973) containing Anand's letters to him from 1965 to 1971, is useful source-material for the scholar and the critic. Cowasjee has also written Introductions to editions of Anand's novels published by the Bodley Head (London), Cedric Chivers (Bath) and Copp Clark (Toronto), among which mention may be made of his Introduction to Anand's Private Life of an Indian Prince published by the Bodley Head (London) in 1970, which aroused fresh interest in the novelist and helped a better understanding of the novel.

Cowasjee's creative work consists of two collections of stories, the better known of which is Nude Therapy (Delhi: Orient Paperbacks, 1979), which presents delightful vignettes of contemporary Indian life. He also wrote in 1980 a screenplay, The Last of the Maharajas, based on Anand's Private Life of an Indian Prince. Cowasjee has also published two novels, the more popular of which is Goodbye to Elsa (Delhi: Orient Paperbacks, 1975), which in an ironical manner brings out the essential loneliness of man trying to "connect" with his fellow men and, more so, with women other than his wife Elsa.

O.P.M.

CRITICISM (Assamese) The history of literary criticism in Assamese hardly goes back beyond the closing decade of the last century. This means it is an offshoot of the growth of modern literature which owes its inspiration mainly to the impact of the western education and literature. The early Assamese literature prior to the 19th century was primarily motivated by religious feeling for spiritual realisation and consequently the Vaishnava poets and writers did not advocate nor appreciate the unfettered expression of worldly passions and emotions which, according to them, instead of elevating the individual self to the higher path of liberation (mukti), tighten the wordly bondage. In such a literary atmosphere it is too much to expect a genuine interest in literary criticism. But in spite of being religious in content and didactic in motive, the early Assamese literature was a source of entertainment as well as the medium of edification and devotional sublimation. The Vaishnavite saint poets like Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva, though not unfamiliar with Sanskrit poetics, however appear to have tested the merit of contemporary compositions on the touchstone of devotional profundity and sincerity. According to contemporary biographical accounts Shankaradeva adversely criticised the metrical rendering of the Bhagavata by Pitambar Kavi for his undue emphasis on worldly passions at the cost of the devotional. Similarly, he took Ananta Kandali to task for giving more prominence to the description of warfare by reducing the devotional elements to the minimum. From such stray references it could be inferred that the Vaishnavite poets of the medieval period were not totally indifferent to the function of criticism although it did not take a definite literary shape in their hands.

Towards the end of the 19th century the modern Assamese literature initiated by the Christian Missionaries, burst into creative blossoming due to the impact of English literature and Bengal Renaissance on the educated young men of Assam, most of whom received higher education in Calcutta. They organised a literary movement and started publishing a monthly journal named Jonaki (Moonlight) from 1889 and this ushered in a new creative era in Assamese literature. Literary assessment and criticism in the rudimentary form also had its beginning in the pages of periodical magazines including two or three predecessors of Jonaki, published during the last quarter of the 19th century. Of course during this early period of modern creative literature, criticism was mainly confined to reviewing of new books and appreciative assessment of early Assamese literature. Literary criticism did not yet take a definite shape nor did it follow a systematic pattern or method.

The first name to be reckoned with in connection with the development of literary criticism in Assamese is Lakshminath Bezbarua (1864-1938) who during the half a century of his literary career enriched almost all the branches of literature by turning out short stories, dramas, essays, poetry, novel and literary criticism. Bezbarua was not unfamiliar with the trends of literary criticism in the 19th century English literature. He was also conscious of the fact that literature being the mirror of the society must be truly national by reflecting joys, sorrows and aspirations of the community without bringing into focus the baser instincts. He was a romanticist in his attitude and his idea of poetic imagination conformed to the idea of a romantic critic. He attached importance to the national literature. He did not believe in a literature which was not sublime and elevated in style and content. Bezbarua's concept of national literature (Jatiya Sahitya), of the nature of poetic imagination and elevation and purity of style had exercised a considerable influence on a few subsequent critics, notably Dimbeswar Neog.

Besides his occasional book-reviews in his own monthly Banhi (Flute) his notable work dealing with literary criticism is Shankaradeva (1914) where he tried to assess the contribution and quality of the great Vaishnavite Saint-poet's literary works. In fact, it was Bezbarua who for the first time brought to literary focus the poetic quality as well as the religious and social contribution of the 15th century poet of Assam. But acknowledging this pioneering zeal, it must be admitted that Bezbarua's assessment of Shankaradeva as a poet does not reveal his critical insight and objectivity. His assessment is more adulatory than critical.

The person who uplifted the literary criticism from the conventional mode of formal criticism to a higher level was Banikanta Kakati (1894-1952). By profession a teacher of English language and literature of a first grade college and of Gauhati University later, Kakati was not a creative writer but distinguished himself as a scholar, linguist and literary critic. A series of his critical articles on early Assamese literature published mostly in the monthly magazine Chetana in the twenties–articles which were later published in the form of a book Purani Asamiya Sahitya (1940)–eloquently testify to his intimate knowledge of the literary traditions of the West as well as of India. His penetrating intellect, literary insight and comparative knowledge of the western and Indian literary traditions enabled him to arrive at a balanced judgement and reveal the literary beauty, strength and weakness of the writings of early as well as modern writers. His revealing assessment of some of the early Vaishnava writings, drawing frequent parallels from the classical Sanskrit and occasionally from the western literature are still cited as authoritative verdicts. His Sahitya Aru Prem (1948) another slim volume of literary essays deals in a stimulating and scholarly way with some of the classical love episodes occurring frequently in creative literatures of India and Europe. Kakati's evaluation of three modern poets like Raghunath Choudhury, Ambikagiri Ray choudhury and Jatindranath Dowera is marked by judicious temperament, poetic insight and intellectual depth and these appreciations exercised a lasting influence on subsequent discussions on these poets. His diction without being verbose bears the stamp of a balanced mind and scholarly attainment.

Krishnakanta Handiqui a profound scholar of Sanskrit and a few European languages contributed a bunch of critical articles on some aspects of Spanish, Greek and German literatures and thus helped in widening the horizon of critical literature in Assamese.

Dimbeswar Neog (1900-1968) was a prolific writer as a literary historian and critic. He will be remembered by the posterity not for his critical assessment of different aspect of Assamese literature but for his pioneering work in the field of literary history. His two histories of Assamese literature, one a brief and the other an exhaustive account, though occasionally vitiated by his biased analysis, nevertheless contains mass of information revealing his painstaking scholarship with occasional flashes of poetic insight. His expositions of literary works in respect of certain writers are highly appreciative but in the case of other writers for whom he, due to some inexplicable reasons, developed some allergy, he was narrow in his sympathy and miserly in the recognition of their merit. In spite of this failing it must be admitted that Neog made significant contibution to the development of critical assessment in Assamese literature on an academic plane. Kaliram Medhi (1878-1953) will always be remembered for his significant contribution to the study of early Vaishnavite plays, Ankiya-natas of the 16th and 17th centuries and it is due to his painstaking effort that the dramatic and literary qualities of the above category of medieval plays came to the notice of the literary circle. Ratnakanta Barkakati, basically a poet belonging to the tradition of Rabindranath Tagore made a few illuminating contributions to the study of Assamese poetry in the context of the Indian cultural tradition, synthesised by western ideas and thought.

The progress of Assamese literature till the end of the Second World War was tardy and naturally therefore, literary criticism barring the works of Banikanta Kakati, did not reach the high-water mark of subtle and original exposition of literature. Some aspects like the short story, novel, and drama did not receive comprehensive treatment from the critics.

Since independence the tempo of literary output in all branches of literature has considerably increased. Literary criticism has also received adequate attention from the scholars and litterateurs. Rapid development of higher education during the last thirty years and incentive to literary research given by the Universities and established literary and publishing concerns have added momentum to literary research and quest. A number of treatises on theories and schools of literary criticism relating to classical Sanskrit and European literature have come out: Kavya Aru Abhivyanjana (1939) by Birinchikumar Barua, Kavya-Bhumi (1950) by U.K. Sarma, Sahitya Alochana, Sahityakala aru Tar Bichar (1971) by T.N. Goswami, Sahityavidya-Parikrama by T.N. Sarma, Sahitya-Darshan by Manoranjan Shastri and Upama Kalidasasya (1973) by Mukundamadhava Sarma and Sahityar Satya by Hiren Gohain deserve speical mention in addition to a host of other minor works.

Birinchikumar Barua's (1960-1964) first work Kavya aru Abhivyanjana dealing with Indian aesthetics and western trends of criticism including views of Benedetto Croce, could not appeal to the Assamese readers because it lacked lucidity and clarity of exposition. His literary criticism specially dealing with early Assamese prose (Asamiya Katha Sahitya, 1950) is evaluative having an historical approach. Tirthanath Sarma's contribution to the evaluation of early Assamese literature is marked by fresh insight and lucidity of exposition and interpretation. He has also written a few sensitive and stimulating critical essays on modern poets like Raghunath Choudhury and Jatindranath Dowera. His Pancha-Pushpa (five flowers) embodying some of his critical essays is unique from the point of view of exposition and interpretation. Had he been a consistent writer, his stature could have risen to a greater height. By far the most consistent critic in Assamese literature is no doubt Trailokyanath Goswami, a retired teacher of English language and literature of a college in a sub-divisional town. He is equipped, like Banikanta Kakati, with knowledge of Indian as well as western literature and aesthetics. He has shown familiarity with English criticism right from the 18th century down to the present period. His five books dealing with the function of criticism, nature and types of criticism with occasional reference to English, Assamese and Sanskrit works, are important contribution to Assamese literary criticism. His synthetic approach based on knowledge of the two streams of criticism, eastern and western, has enabled him to make assessmet in conformity with the Indian tradition and environment. His Adhunik Asamiya Galpa Sahitya (1965) discusses the development of the short stories in Assamese with reference to the technique, style and content of the stories by different writers since the beginning of the 20th century.

Satyendranath Sarma (b. 1917) has covered almost all aspects of Assamese literature and has published a number of works since the beginning of sixties. He has consistently followed the historical-cum-academic method of approach in his interpretation and evaluation. His two works on Assamese novels, viz, Asamiya Upanyasar Bhumika (1963) and Asamiya Upanyasar Dhara (Trends in Assamese Novels, 1976) have elaborately dealt with the development of novel in Assamese from the last quarter of the 19th century to the recent times. The history of the Assamese drama from the 16th century to the most up-to-date 'absurd drama' is recorded in his Asamiya Natya Sahitya (1971, third edition). It not only gives an account of individual achievements of successive dramatists, but also traces the important trends and movements connected with the dramatic revival. Satyendranath Sarma has also presented a comprehensive account of the epic and narrative poetry in Assamese in which Assamese Kavyas, old and new, have been analysed as an important genre in Assamese literature. Although Sarma, as a critic, has practically touched every aspect of Assamese creative literature, he has followed a set pattern of approach and lacks the penetrating insight and subtlety of Banikanta Kakati's writings. Maheswar Neog (b. 1918) has edited several early Assamese manuscripts with critical apparatuses and is credited with an authentic history of Assamese literature. His achievement principally lies in unfolding the wealth of the Vaishnavite literature. Among the older generation of critics, contribution of Bhabananda Dutta (1919-1959), Praphulladatta Goswami, Atulchandra Barua (b. 1919) and Hem Barua (1916-1977) deserve notice. The two posthumous works of Bhabananda Dutta, viz. Asamiya Kavitar Kahini and Drishti Aru Darshan, set a new trend in criticism by relating creative works with the Marxian social analysis. Prafulladatta Goswami's name is mainly connected with his deep interest in bringing into focus the value of studying folk literature and culture for determining the social ethos of the Assamese community. Hem Barua's writings helped familiarising Assamese readers with some of the new ideas and trends of the European literatures of the 20th century. He will however be better remembered for the leading role he played in ushering in modern technique in Assamese poetry.

Assamese poetry had undergone a great change in technique, presentation and content during the fifties, though its beginning was made a few years earlier. Changes in themes and presentation also took place in respect of the drama and the novel. The new upsurge demanded new approach to interpretation and this could be noticed with the emergence of a few new critics in the sixties and seventies. Homen Bargohain (b. 1931), a poet and novelist of repute and also a journalist of standing has been able to impress as a literary critic also. Being endowed with a sharp intellect, clarity of thought and uninhibited mind, Bargohain has written a few illuminating assessments on some aspects of Assamese poetry and short stories in the context of the modern development in the world literature. Mohendra Bora's contributions mainly consist of his threadbare analysis of Assamese metre.

Two most promising critics of the younger generation are Hiren Gohain (1939) and Bhaben Barua (1941), both working as teachers of English literature at the University level. Both are poets with modern sense and sensibility. Gohain started to write towards the beginning of the sixties and immediately exhibited his familiarity with the trends and ideas of the contemporary intellectual and literary world. He is also gifted with a receptive aesthetic temperament. Gohain is probably the principal propagandist for using the yardstick of the Marxian system of literary evaluation. His earlier writings of the mid-sixties now embodied in Sahityar Satya (1970), do not however project the Marxian tendency of evaluation; they reveal rather an awareness of liberal and humanist values. But his writings since the later part of the sixties had undergone a shift in emphasis. The Marxist doctrine began to colour his views in his quest for social realities in the writings of some writers and poets. These are incorporated in Sahitya Aru Chetana (1976). It must be admitted that Gohain opened a new vista of literary criticism by relating it to social development from the socialistic viewpoint.

Bhaben Barua the other important critic of the younger generation owes a great deal to modern European critics like F.R. Leavis, Allan Tate , I.A. Richards and Empson for the development of his critical method and approach. It was Bhaben Barua who boldly pointed out the infirmity and irresponsibility of some of the modern poetical compositions which have so long masqueraded as modern poetry. Barua, though considerably influenced by the western critics, is not unaware of the Indian schools of aesthetics. Although he has not yet turned out any book incorporating his assessment and findings on different aspects of literature or on individual writers, his scattered articles bear the stamp of the process of sustained analysis of a sensitive mind. Barua has also familiarised Assamese readers with some of the important poetical traditions of the world, such as the Haiku poetry of Japan, symbolism of Latin American poetry and important schools of the European literature.

A batch of young writers, mostly college teachers, have also come to the literary lime-light by their critical writings during the last two decades. Shashi Sarma, Shailen Bharali, Nagen Saikia, Hemanta Sarma, Govinda prasad Sarma, to name a few have made contribution to the periodicals but usually these are mostly of academic nature without conforming to any definite school or method of criticism. Compared to Bengali or Hindi, Assamese literary criticism cannot be said to have attained a high standard of achievement, or a healthy critical tradition, or a sustained method of criticism based on poetic insight; nor has a philosophical understanding been firmly established. This is mainly due to the fact that really good literature likely to withstand the onslaught of time is still very much limited in Assamese. The quality of literary criticism is not unrelated to the standard attained by the literature. Even then it must be admitted that during the last one hundred years of its development literary criticism in Assamese in spite of its slow growth, not only attained girth but some depth as well especially since the dawn of independence.

S.S.

CRITICISM (Bengali) A noticeable feature of Indian criticism today, is that there is on it a joint impact of traditional Sanskrit concepts, terminology and norms on the one hand and European terminology and norms on the other.

As the impact of European criticism on the Bengali language and literature deepened and widened, Bengali criticism split into two patterns: the romantic pattern (in which the critic is energised by the perception of his individual soul) and the classical pattern (in which the critic is guided by the authority of Rules).

Literary criticism is an integral element of Bengal's nineteenth century culture, a culture that was the product of the impact of the West on the people. It took the impact several decades to bear fruits. A European historian of Bengali literature, Dusan Zbavital, says, "Literary criticism of any kind was absent in pre-modern critical literature." In Bengali criticism of today, we continue to come across terms of classical Sanskrit aesthetics, such as Rasa, Vyanjana, Upama, Rupak, Shlesh and so on. Frequently in Bengali criticism we have references to the classical Sanskrit concept of "Rasaswadah Brahmaswada Sahodarah" (the taste of Rasa is fratenal to the taste of Brahma). After the introduction of English education in Calcutta and its neighbourhood during the first three decades of the nineteenth century, European ideas began to influence the traditional Indian outlook. Thus, along with classical critical terminology Indians also began to employ such terms as tragedy, comedy, novel, image, plot, romantic, classical, realistic, etc. A number of new terms (new even in the West), related to Linguistics and recent concepts of Aesthetics and Social philosophy have projected themselves into Bengali criticism. The earliest work of Bengali criticism was possibly Kavi Jibani by Iswar Gupta (containing biographical sketches of a number of poets), which was not published during the author's life time. Iswar Gupta's work was written under the influence of the famous English work, Samuel Jonhson's Lives of the Poets. Iswar Gupta's is not a work of any original judgement but the biographical approach-certainly proved itself a path-finding contribution to Bengali criticism. The celebrated contemporary of Iswar chandra Gupta was his namesake, Iswarchandra Vidyasagar whose contribution to Bengali literature included studies of famous Sanskrit texts, viz. Raghuvamsam, Nisadhacharitam, and Ritusamharam. In creative literature, this learned and sensitive critic praised the beauty of artistic construction, the homogeneity of sound and verbal meaning, the co-existence in literary language of such qualities as simplicity, tenderness, sweetness, vigour, etc.

Among the contemporaries of Iswarchandra Vidyasagar were Rajendralal Mitra and Kaliprasanna Singha, both prominent among the Bengalis of their time, actively engaged in social development, including the advancement of literature. Rajendralal Mitra wrote an elaborate review of Michael Madhusudan Dutt's early poem, Tilottamasambhav Kavya, while Kaliprasanna Singha reviewed Meghanadbadh Kavya. The growing eminence of the poet was matched by the reputations of the two critics. The poet Rangalal Banerjee, Michaels's contemporary, read an essay entitled An Essay Concerning Bengali Poetry before the Bethune Society of Calcutta in 1852; the essay bears the impress of western poetics. Michael too, regarded by many as the greatest poet of the age, was devoted to western poetics. "It is my intention, he wrote in a letter, "to throw off the fetters forged for us by a servile admiration of everything Sanskrit. . . . If I have to write other dramas, you may rest assured I shall not allow myself to be bound by the dicta of Visvanath of the Sahitya Darpan". He has left behind him a number of audacious statements maintaining the superiority of western poetics to the Indian, but except for these striking negatory assertions, he has not left behind any positive structure of poetics.

Bankimchandra Chattopadhyay (1838-1894) started his creative career in the early eighteen fifties. Apart from his creative and speculative writings, Bankimchandra's special area as a critic was practical criticism rather than speculative and theoretical criticism. A firm foundation for his critical ideas and deductions is provided by his reviews of Hemchandra Banerjee's Britra Samhar (The destruction of Britra, the demon) and Nabinchandra Sen's Palashir Yuddha (The Batle of Plassey), as well as of the works of several important Bengali contemporaries (e.g. Iswarchandra Vidyasagar, Iswarchandra Gupta, Pyarichand Mitra, Dinabandhu Mitra). His references to ancient and medieval literatures (both Indian and European) provide a strong foundation for his critical judgements.

Bankimchandra's richest essay in criticism is the one on Bhavabhuti's Uttara Ramacharita. The critic lays stress on the variations in Bhavabhuti's plot from Valmiki's. Whereas the story of Valmiki ends with Sita's self-annihilation through descent into the womb of Mother Earth, the story in Bhavabhuti is wound up when the gods themselves testify to Sita's chastity, the subjects of the kingdom accept the testimony and Sita and Rama are re-united. The crux of Bhavabhuti's drama is the conflict between two opposed forces, "conflict" without which (as Aristotle's Poetics tells us) there can be no drama. It is a conflict between the deep conjugal love of Rama and Sita and the social scandal arising from the kidnapping of Sita. Triumphant over the conflict is the untremulous and resplendent love of Sita for her husband. All around this central theme, we see countless other characters—common men, sages and their wives, the forest-goddess, the earth goddess, the river-goddess, and the divinities who dwell in paradise. The critic Bankimchandra has explicated each scene, commented on the various incidents and personalities and arrived at this conclusion: Rama of the Ramayana is a great hero; by the time Bhavabhuti has been engaged in writing his drama, the times have changed and the standards of heroism have deteriorated.

The change is highly significant. Bankimchandra's interpretation (following Bhavabhuti) is built on a concept of Art which is associated with the French critic, Hippolyte Taine. According to Taine, the art of poetry hangs on three constituent elements: the race, the epoch, the surroundings or putting the matter in different words, the man, the moment, the milieu. This principle of tripartite constituents of critical evaluation Bankimchandra applies to other areas of criticism too, particularly in his treatise, Krishna Charitra. In this work Bankim refers to three traditions in the representation of Krishna; the Krishna of Mahabharata, the Krishna of Shrimad Bhagavata, and then Krishna of the Bengal school of Vaishnavas. Bankim compares and contrasts the Krishna-cult as expressed in Jayadeva and Vidyapati, drawing a discriminating line between the external world (Bahir Prakriti) and the inner world (Antah Prakriti). Bankim has also differentiated between poets of earlier generations and poets of today; the earlier poet had a perception of the world within the limits of their milieu; the poets of today, on the contrary, are widely knowledgeable persons, conscious of history, philosophy, science and spiritual issues; consequently, their intelligence is far-perceiving and so is their poetry. Before Bankim's time, Coleridge had differentiated among Fancy, primary imagination and secondary imagination. We have no evidence that Bankim had read Biographia Literaria, especially the 14th chapter, but we find him discussing the free movements of the imaginative faculty. This faculty, in Bankim's view, mainfests itself best in character-building, e.g. in the presentation of the characters of Uma and Sakuntala. It is possible to find several issues of aesthetic philosophy undiscussed in Bankimchandra but we must remember that criticism was far from his basic concern as a writer. Several features of critical theory entered in his writings, not as any principal concern but as off-shoots of a principal concern. Further, this preoccupation with aesthetic problems was integrally related to his unvarying Indian consciousness.

Among the contemporaries of Bankimchandra who were active participants in critical writing, there were at least a dozen well-known personalities; persons like Rameshchandra Datta, Bhudev Mukhopadhyaya, Chandrasekhar Mukhopadhyaya, Kaliprasanna Ghosh, Saradacharan Mitra, Ramendrasunder Trivedi, Purnachandra Basu, Panchkari Bandyopadhyaya stood out in that age as literary critics. Ramesh Datta, of the Indian Civil Service wrote in both English and Bengali,as a creative writer and also as a critic. In his Literature of Bengali, he has presented critical account of the subject. For an instance of his judicial criticism, we may quote a few sentences: "The lash of Iswar Chandra's satire cuts deep, Dina Bandhu's milder and gentler admonitions inflict no wound. Iswar Chandra is the more powerful satirist. Dina Bandhu is the pleasanter humorist." In Bhudev Mukherjee's essays, we notice examples of what has been called Neo-Hinduism, a socio-intellectual movement.

Chandranath Bose and Akshay Sarkar wrote reviews and critical essays full of zeal for journalese writing and faith in Neo-Hinduism. Kaliprasanna Ghosh of Dacca has left behind him books which testify to his excellent prose style; his critical views follow in the steps of Bankimchan-

dra. An essay by Kaliprasanna Ghosh entitled Natak (Drama) is a very competent critical study of the form and content of drama. Akshay Sarkar wrote, among a number of critical essays, one on Modern Bengali Drama, which tries to disprove the validity of the European concept of poetic justice. Thakurdas Mukhopadhyaya wrote an excellent essay on the poet Biharilal which proves the sensibility of the late 19th century man of letters. Ramendrasundar Trivedi, a learned man, contributed substantially to literary theory and the content of literature. The critics of this period were no less interested in literary genre than in literary theory and specific texts. Thus in Akshay Sarkar's essays we find an intelligent awareness of the nature of dramatic conflict, of the significance of moral elements in drama, of the importance of the sense of nationalism in literature. The critics of this period were concerned as much with the content of literature as with its form. Bipinchandra Pal, a front rank nationalist of the times, wrote about realism as well as idealism; Purnachandra Basu wrote about tragic violence; Saradacharan Mitra wrote thoughtful essays on Michael Madhusudan's Meghnad Badh Kavya; Panchkari Banerjee looked for the expression in literature of the Bengali identity; Priyanath Sen and Kshetranath Bhattacharya were authors of essays that represent their understanding of literary genres; Debendrabijay Basu was one of the earliest among Bengali critics to write about the art of fiction.

Three outstanding personalities among the critics of post-Bankim period were Balendranath Tagore, Haraprasad Shastri and Sureshchandra Samajpati. Balendranath was gifted with delicate literary sensibility which manifests itself in his essays on the Kavis (Minstrel singers) of Bengal. Haraprasad Shastri whose knowledge of Indology was encyclopaedic, was an admirer of Bankimchandra and a competent critic. In one of his essays, he discusses the impact Kalidas, Shakespeare and Byron had on the mind of a Bengali youngman. Sureshchandra Samajpati, a powerful journalist, proved himself to be an impressive critic too.

Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) is chronologically the next author for us to consider. He was only fourteen when almost immediately on the heels of his first publication in print, a poem in the journal Jnanankur, he published his first prose writing, an essay in literary criticism discussing a recently published volume of poems. The creative and critical strains ran almost parallel in Rabindranath. The range and variety of the issues in literary criticism which occupied his mind are indicated (however inadequately) by the titles of the essays which we find in the centenary edition (Vol. XIII) of his works. Thus, under the general heading, language and literature, we have several sectional titles, and under these sectional titles we have specific titles for each of the essays. The arrangement goes thus:

Samalochana (criticism): essays on Meghnad Badh Kavya, De Profundis; Chandidas and Vidyapati; Baul songs, etc.

Prachin Sahitya (literature of the past): essays on the Ramayana, Meghdut, Kumar Sambhav and Shakuntala, Kadamvari Chitra, etc.

Lok Sahitya (folk literature): Rhymes for children, Rustic literature, etc.

Sahitya (literature): The meaning of literature, The judge of literature, world literature, the national literature of Bengal, the historical novel, etc.

Adhunik Sahitya (Modern literature): Bankimchandra, Biharilal, Vidyapati's Radhika, etc.

Rabindranath is so outstanding and many-sided a personality in the world of philosophy in general and literary and aesthetic criticism in particular that only a few broad directions of his thinking can be given here.

We begin with some statements of applied criticism. In every respect, the finest among the essays of applied criticism are the essays on the Ramayana and the Meghdut, Kumar Sambhav and Shakuntala, Kadamvari and that amazingly beautiful essay 'Kavyer Upekshita' in which the poet writes about Shakuntala's two companions-Anusuya and Priyambada- and also about Patralekha in Kadamvari. The incomparable critical sensibility of Rabindranath has discovered in these Sanskrit texts areas of beauty which have so far escaped the attention of Kalidasa-lovers. While writing of Shakuntala, the poet-critic repeatedly thinks of Shakespeare's Miranda. Between the external circumstances of the two works, says Rabindranath, we may find some resemblances, but the relish of the two works is different. Mentioning Goethe's great critical reference to Shakuntala, the poet-critic draws a comparison between the two heroines, point by point, especially referring to the contacts between beauty and purity, simplicity and innocence in both works, ending up with the quintessential statement: "Abhijnana–Shakuntalam is at once paradise lost and paradise regained." A comparable epigram can be found in the essay on the Ramayana: "The Ramayana and the Mahabharata are histories, not histories of current events but histories of perennial values, dealing with domestic, social, international relations, presenting the eternal ideology of Indian life". Or again at the very end of the long essay on Kadamvari, Rabindranath's description of Kadamvari's entrance into the king's court is amazing in its stunning sense of beauty; there enters into the court an old man accompanied by a boy, followed by a youthful woman: each is described in such incomparable words and imagery that no one can differ from the critic's assertion that there is none in Sanskrit literature who is Banabhatta's equal in word painting. In addition to these and several more assessments of Sanskrit literature, Rabindranath has left us several striking reviews of foreign literature; one such review is that of Tennyson's poem De Profundis, written towards the fag end of the poet's life.

An instance of applied criticism of Rabindranath has been controversial. This is his review of Michael Dutt's Meghnad Badh Kavya. Arguing on several grounds, Rabindranath arrives at the crucial question: Can such actions as the killing of unarmed Indrajit by Lakshman or overwhelmed with grief on account of his son's death Ravana's release of the all powerful, destructive shell at Lakshman, can such actions be desirable matters for an epic? Remembering Homer's Iliad, Rabindranath says, I see there is no nobility of action in Meghnad Badh Kavya, there is no narration or description of a noble event, nor is there any noble character". Rabindranath recalls Michael Madhusudan's statement: "I despise Ram and his rabble". Rabindranath finds a lack of the Valmiki spirit in Michael, and arrives at this conclusion: "I have not discussed the separate constitutents of Meghnad Badh Kavya. I have chosen only the poem's roots and its soul's content. I see the work has no life. I see the work is not an epic at all."

This uncompromising condemnation of Meghnad Badh Kavya has been highly controversial in Bengali literature; nevertheless, the accurate nature of Rabindranath's logic can hardly be brushed aside. A valuable feature of Rabindranath's criticism can be found in his deep interest in Lok Sahitya, i.e. Rural literature (what we should prefer to call unsophisticated literature or the common man's literature). Rabindranath collected a large number of common rhymes and nursery rhymes from the countryside, and analysed their cultural and psychological values.

In many of his essays, Rabindranath discusses certain principles of literary creation. We have to remember that Rabindranath's philosophical vision was highly original, multi-dimensional, complex and, more often than not, integrated with his creative energy. In the essay Sahityer Tatparya (the meaning of literature) we are told, "the subject matters of literature are the human heart and the human character; the joy of God's creation wells up from within itself; of that joy the echo is man's own joyous creation". Again, he says in Sahityer Samagri (the constituents of literature): "the chief material of literature is a matter not of knowledge but of emotional experience- . ... Matters of knowledge have to be proved whereas matters of experience have to be evoked. Literature is in the process of converting a personal experience to a universal experience; the matter of literature is not a matter of discovery or imitation, it is creation". Rabindranath does not accept the imitation theory of Aristotle: "Literature is not a mirror of nature. Not only literature but no artistic activity is a precise imitation of Nature. In Nature, we see the actual: in literature and the fine arts even the invisible is vivid before us. ... In true literature we seek to establish our imagination, our joys and sorrows, within not only the present times, but within eternity".

Scores of valuable philosophical utterances can be culled from Rabindranath's essays (especially the essays of the volume Sahitya) and the philosophy of these essays can be correlated to his total philosophy. We can in addition discover rich materials in Rabindranath's works of fiction and drama, materials that present luminous ideas of aesthetics. With Rabindranath criticism is not a bookish affair but a matter of direct and integrated understanding of life. Rabindranath's critical thoughts and his many-sided creative works are facets of an integrated vision of life.

Both Bankimchandra and Rabindranath were interested in journalism as a channel of literary expression. Bankimchandra was the founder-editor or Bangadarshan; of this journal, Rabindranath himself became the editor in after years, and besides, he was closely connected with the distinguished literary group which conducted the journal, Bharati. In many languages, literary journals have been the mouthpieces of literary critics. Among such journals in 20th century, particularly mentionable are Sabuj Patra, Kallol, Kavita, Parichay and Chaturanga. These journals along with others have been responsible for initiating new works by their creative contributions. The symbolic title Sabuj Patra (Green Leaves), edited by Pramatha Chaudhuri, became the organ of a stylistic change and also of fresh literary values and attitudes. Pramatha Chaudhary (whose pen-name was Birbal) was a scholar in English and French and many of his essays introduced French values in Bengali literary assessments. After the award of the the Nobel prize to Rabindranath, Bengali critics began to write critical appreciations of Rabindranath from fresh angles. Ajit Chakrabarti's Rabindranath was an admirable endeavour to appreciate the poet from a wide perspective. Mohit Sen and the famous scholar Kshitimohan Sen interpreted the poet's contribution to Bengali literature from fresh points of view.

Some writers of the Bharati group such as Manilal Ganguli, Satyendranath Datta, Premankur Atarthi, Charu Bandyopadhyay belonged to this group of new critics. Atul Gupta, a major figure of this new school of critics, applied his knowledge of Sanskrit poetics to present a traditional view of the art of literature. As the years passed, a number of powerful works of criticism, concerned primarily with Rabindranath, began to be published; particularly mentionable among these are the works of S.N. Dasgupta, the poet Mohitlal Majumdar (who also wrote an important book of criticism on Michael Madhusudan Dutt), Shashamkamohan Sen, Niharranjan Ray, Pramathanath Bishi, Amulyadhan Mukherjee, Subodhchandra Sengupta (particularly two chapters in his Bangla Samalochana Parichay) and Prabodhchandra Sen. Srikumar Banerjee, in his monumental work, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara, has a valuable long chapter on ter on Rabindranath's novels. Buddhadeva Bose, a fervent admirer of Rabindranath is the author of Rabindranath: Kathasahitya, a work of criticism that is representative of the post-Tagore period of Bengali literature. While a large number of Bengali critics wrote admiringly of the great poet, there were some writers whose attitudes were unfavourable. Chief among these were D.L. Roy and somewhat strangely, Saratchandra Chatterjee. Both these critics were eminent creative writers: D.L. Roy is perhaps the greatest playwright in Bengali and Saratchandra, even though much water has run down the Ganga during the past half century, continues to enjoy a very high position among the Bengali novelists. Any elaborate study of the critiques of Rabindranath should pay some close attention to the adverse criticism of these two talented persons.

A feature of Bengali criticism during the first three decades of the 20th century was the emergence of studies in the theory of literature. Chief among these works on theory (harking back to the concepts of Sanskrit literature) were Surendranath Dasgupta's Kavya Vichar and Soundarya Tatwa and Atul Gupta's Kavya Jijnasa.

During the inter-war period, Bengali criticism (along with the other branches of literature) became alert to recent western movements in literature, arts and philosophy. This alertness made itself felt in Bengali poetry, fiction, drama as well as in Bengali criticism. The impact of English critics (I.A. Richards and T.S. Eliot, to mention the two outstanding names) on Bengali critics and scholars was considerable. The chief forum for these new critical and theoretical ideas was the journal, Parichay, although it was Kallol which marked the emergence of the Bengali mind to new lines of creative activity. It was during this period that the influence of Russian, Scandinavian, French, German and American literatures began to make themselves potent. Writers like Gorky, Tchekhov, Hamsun, Bojer, Baudelaire, Thomas Mann, T.S. Eliot, Eugene O' Neill among others began to be read, discussed and imitated. Critical reviews and articles printed in such literary journals as Kallol, Kalikalam and Parichay indicate the new trends. In some quarters leftist ideas and dicta percolated into literary criticism (the writings, for example, of Dhurjati Mukherjee and Gopal Halder); new patterns of creative literature based on new European concepts (the parts played by the unconscious and the sub-conscious in the human behaviour patterns), the internal monologues, dream psychology, primitivism and a number of characteristically 20th century ideas entered into creative writing and therefore, at the next step, critical writing. Many new writers themselves, keenly conscious of the new ideological trends, wrote significant essays in criticism. Buddhadev Bose's first published critical work was An Acre of Green Grass, a collection of essays in English written during the war years.

Buddhadeva Bose is certainly in the front rank of Bengali critics. The elder poet, Jivanananda Das is the author of a collection of thought-provoking essays (most of which are preoccupied with problems of aesthetic theory), such as On Poetry; In the Context of Poetry; The Soul and the Body of Poetry; Reading Poetry; Time Space and Poetry; Truth Faith and Poetry, etc. Jivanananda's essays are as valuable as contents of theoretical ideas as they are indexes to his own poetry. Bishnu Dey, a major poet among the moderns, has a book in English, In the Sun and the Rain which presents an assortment of essays written on different occasions; the essays being on Marx and Bengali writing and sometimes on issues of Art.

Bengali criticism of the last fifty years is, both in quantity and quality, rich and many-sided. One reason for this richness is the fact that more and more professional scholars in Bengali literature are coming forward with contributions to literary criticism. The trend started years ago with Dinesh Sen the great historian of Bengali literature; it strengthened itself in Srikumar Banerjee's monumental study of Bengali fiction; the trend has now added valuably to literary criticism in Bengali.

A.B.

CRITICISM (Dogri). Literary criticism in Dogri had its beginnings in short essays which were more in the nature of sketchy surveys of Dogri writing or illustrated descriptions of some themes in Dogri folk literature rather than critical appraisals of Dogri literature. A book of prose essays called Triveni (1961) by Shyamlal Sharma and Shakti Sharma which appeared in 1961, carried two such essays. Later, during the 1960's, Dogri literary magazines like Nami Chetna (brought out by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu), Rekha (Editor: D.C. Prashant), Sheeraza and Sarha Sahitya (published by J&K Academy) and Nibandhavali (publication of Dogri Research Institute, Jammu), included a number of such essays and also reviews of some Dogri books and essays on different genres of Dogri writing like poetry, prose, novel, radio-plays, etc. It was a sporadic and spasmodic activity. Then, Dogri Sanstha, Jammu, organised the first Dogri writers's Conference in 1967; at this Conference, papers on different aspects of Dogri literary effort till that date were contributed. A collection of these papers appeared in the shape of a book called Dogri Sahitya Darpan a couple of years later. About the same time, two other publications concerned with literary criticism came out, one, Dogri Sahitya Charcha (1969) by Laxmi Narayan and the other, Dogri Kavya Charcha (1969) by Champa Sharma; the former was an attempt to present in Dogri the definitions and characteristics of different literary genres, and the latter provided an introduction to Dogri poetry with illustrations. These were soon followed by a collection of eight essays of literary criticism by Chanchal Sharma called Najar Apani Apani; an attempt was made in these essays to critically examine 3 Dogri novels, the work of 2 short story-writers and the poetry of 2 Dogri poets. This was followed in 1975-76 by a collection of Champa Sharma's essays under the title Ek Jhank and in the following year, by Sheeraza's special issue, Alochana Ank, devoted to literary criticism, survey of different genres of Dogri literature and an issue of Sarha Sahitya (1976) devoted to literary criticism. Some essays of literary criticism were also included in Dogri Sanstha's Silver Jubilee publication Rajat Jayanti Granth published in 1979. The latest effort in this direction is a publication of Dogri Research Centre of the Jammu University called Shodh Granth-one part of which is devoted to language and the other to literature.

Sh.

CRITICISM (English). Indian writing in English was the result of the effective British presence in India, which began (if a date must be given, with the Battle of Plassey in 1757.) And the distinguished work of early Anglo-Indian writers like Sir William Jones and historians like Robert Orme, and the launching in 1780 of Hicky's Bengal Gazette, created an atmosphere favourable to Indian writing in English as well. Nevertheless, for Indians, English was but an acquired language, carrying a certain prestige as well as stigma as the language of the alien rulers. Understandably enough, the earliest efforts were in prose rather than in verse, and prose too of a functional kind like Venkata Boriah's dissertation on the Jains (1801) and Rammohun Roy's tract on Suttee (1818). Thus prose came in handy in journalism, historical philosophical or scriptural exposition, educational or political controversy, and literary analysis and aesthetic criticism.

When presently English became the medium of instruction and examination in school, college and university, and English literature came to be studied with the same absorbing interest as Sanskrit had been earlier, a new generation of educated Indians grew up who were familiar with Western critical concepts and practice. Even as Western Orientalists like Jones, Colebooke, Wilson, Ryder and Max Muller attempted a revaluation of Indian literature and thought, educated Indians too felt the need to articulate, and to make a fresh appraisal of Indian liteature in the light of Western critical categories deriving from Aristotle and Longinus, Horace and Lessing, Matthew Arnold and A.C. Bradley. As English became more and more the language of the educated elite all over India, it was natural for scholars who aimed at an all-India audience (if not, indeed, eventually a world audience) to write in English, and this even when the subject was Sanskrit or Bengali or Hindi or Tamil or some other Indian literature.

Among the pioneers who brought stringent critical criteria to the examintion and evaluation of literature and art were Abanindranath Tagore, Bankimchandra Chatterjee, Rabindranath Tagore, Ananda Coomarawamy, Sri Aurobindo and C. Ramalinga Reddy, and each of them, although acquainted with the critical traditions of the West and of India, evolved his own individual point of view. Other seasoned scholars like P.V. Kane, S.K. De, K.C. Pandey, V. Raghavan, M. Hiriyanna, K. Krishnamoorthy and Krishna Chaitanya have either given us histories of Indian aesthetic theories or made comparative studies of Western and Indian theories. The emphasis in Sanskrit poetics on 'rasa' and 'dhwani' and on the importance of the sahridaya and the preoccupation of Western critics with mimesis, katharsis and the sublime cannot easily be balanced or correlated, but attempts in this direction are being made by critics exposed to both the traditions.

The affirmation sometimes made that India had not before the coming of the British, anything like literary criticism in the western sense of the term cannot be sustained, for without the exercise of sound self-criticism so much good–so much great–literature could not have been produced in India since Vedic times; and without a capacity for kavyanubhava or the enjoyment of poetry in the people, such an impressive body of literature could not have survived through the ages. The coming of the West, however, certainly gave an impetus to formal literary history and criticism, just as–more recently–the new methods of linguistic, stylistic, thematic, structural, sociological and psychological analyses are coming into vogue in Indian writing in English as in the other Indian languages. As yet these studies, as may be expected, tend to be largely university-centred.

Since almost the beginnings of Indian writing in English, translations have figured preminently. This has been a two-way Suez-Canal kind of traffic: Western classics into Indian languages, and Indian classics into English. The choic of books for translation and the act of translation itself must involve continued critical activity. As early as 1825, Cavali Venkata Ramaswami turned Venkatadri's Viswagunadarsha in Sanskrit into English as Mirror of Mundane Qualities. More than half a century later, Romesh Chander Dutt translated selections from the Ramayana and the Mahbharata with perceptive critical introductions. and in his The Literature of Bengal (1877), he made "an attempt to trace the progress of the national mind in its various aspects, as reflected in the nation's literature". About the same time, and almost in his nonage, Sri Aurobindo contributed a series of seven articles on Bankimchandra Chatterjee to the Indu Prakash in 1894, and concluded with the finding that, between them, Michael Madhusudan Dutt (the epic poet of Meghanadh Badh) and Bankim (the novelist of Ananda Math and the giver of the mantra 'Bande Matram') they were able "to create a language, a literature and a nation". In the South, P. Sundaram Pillai's Some Milestones in the History of Tamil Literature came out in 1895, and V. Kanakasabhai's The Tamils 1800 Years Ago nine years later. There were also scholars like R.G. Bhandarkar (Vaishnavism, Saivism, and Minor Raligious Systems, 1913) and Ananda Coomaraswamy (An Introduction to Indian Art, 1923; History of Indian and Indonesian Art, 1927) who were polymaths, and their work and influence transcended narrow subject-barriers.

In more recent times and especially after the coming of independence an impressive number of monographs in literary history and criticism have appeared. and these have helped to project an image of 'Indian' Literature, to highlight the significance of the more important classics, and to facilitate their interplay and diffusion over the whole of India. Among the earlier pioneering studies may be mentioned Milestones in Gujarati Literature (1914) by K.M. Jhaveri, A History of Urdu Literature by Ram Babu Saxena, (1927), History of Telugu Literature (1928) by Chenchiah and Bhujanga Rao, The Heroic Age of India (1929) by N.K. Sidhanta, Studies in Tamil Literature and History (1930) by V.R. Ramachandra Dikshitar, A History of Punjabi Literature (1931) by Mohan Singh, Landmarks in Malayalam Literature (1937) by T.K. Krishna Menon, and History of Marathi Literature (1939) by G.C. Bhate. The P.E.N. monographs on the Indian literatures began with Assamese literature (1941) by Birinchikumar Barua and Bengali Literature (1942) by Annadashankar and Lila Ray; and volumes on Sanskrit Literature, Telugu Literature and Indo-Anglian Literature have appeared since.

After independence, a series of authoritive literary histories sponsored by the Sahitya Akademi are being published; Assamese (B.K. Barua), Bengali (Sukumar Sen), Oriya (Mayadhar Manasinhar), Sindhi (L.H. Ajwani), Telugu (G.V. Sitapati), Kannada (R.S. Mugali) Gujarati (Mansukhlal Jhaveri), Dogri (Shivanath), Maithili (Jayakanta Mishra) and Malayalam (P.K. Parameswaran Nair). A symposium on Contemporary Indian Literature came out in 1957, giving a conspectus of the entire Indian literary scene; and it has been supplemented by Indian Literature since Independence (1973). Krishna Chaitanya's histories of Sanskrit Literature (1962) and Malayalam Literature (1971) are massive surveys, while a work like Sunitikumar Chatterji's World Literature and Tagore (1971) is an introduction to the world classics of all time, and his Languages and Literature of India (1963) present a comprehensive general view of the variegated literary scene in India. Krishna Kriplani's Modern Indian Lterature (1968) has a more limited scope and offers a vivid "panoramic glimpse" of the modern era commencing from 1800. Collections of critical essays have also become a familiar and welcome feature of the publication scene; Indian Writers in Council (1947), Writers in Free India (1950); Literature in the Indian Languages edited by V.K. Gokak (1954); Indian Literature of the Past 50 years, 1917-1967, edited by C.D. Narasimhaiah (1970); Contemporeary Indian Literature and Society, edited by Motilal Jotwani (1976); Critical Essays in Indian Writing in English, edited by M.K. Naik, et al (1977); Aspects of Indian Writing in English, edited of M.K. Naik (1979); Perspectives on Indian Drama in English, edited by M.K. Naik (1979); Indian Essays in American Literature, edited by Sujit Mukherjee and D.V.K. Raghavacharyulu (1969); Indian Response to Poetry in English (1970); The Image of India in Western Creative Writing edited by M.K.Naik, (1971) and such others.

Unlike literary histories, critical monographs on individual writers usually have a more immediate appeal. Among the earlier studies were Sri Aurobindo's Vyasa and Vilmiki and Kalidasa; Masti Venkatesa Iyengar's Poetry of Valmiki (1940); Humayun Kabir's Saratchandra Chatterjee (1942); Daurjati P. Mukherjee's Rabindranath Tagore (1943); A.S.P.Ayyar's Bhasha and Madan Gopal's Premchand (1944) later expanded into a full length study. Sahitya Akademi's 'Makers of Indian Literature' series contains over forty monographs, and include Lakshminath Bezbarua (Hem Barua), Chandidas (Sukumar Sengupta), Kumaran Asan (K.M. George), Keshavsut (P. Machwe), Hango Adigal (M. Varadarajan), Ghalib (Mujeeb), Vemana, (V.R Narla), Faikirmohan Senapati (Manasinha), Nammalvar (Srinivasa Raghavan). Bharati (Prema Nandakumar), Kamban (S. Maharajan). Kazi Nazrul Islam (Gopal Haldar) and Potana (Venkatavadhani). Each volume introduces the reader to the life-work of the chosen writer, and gives illustrative extracts–in original or in translation–from his literary creations.

Among other works of literary biography and criticism, worthy of mention here are those of Abdul Vahid's Iqbal (1944), Krishna Kripalani's Rabindranath Tagore (1962), Niharranjan Ray's An Artist in Life (1967), V.K. Gokak's Bendre; Poet and Seer (1970); A.D. Dwivedi's Toru Dutt (1977); S.K. Prasad's The Literary Criticism of Sri Aurobindo (1974); Prema Nandakumar's A Study of Savitri' (1962); Saros Cowasjee's So Many Freedoms. A Study of the Major Fiction of Mulk Raj Anand (1977); J. Birje Patil's Beneath the Axle Tree (1976); and M.K. Naik's Mighty Voices (1980), these last two on T.S. Eliot. An interesting development is comparative criticism, and quite a few studies have lately appeared; S. Ramakrishnan's The Epic Muse, being a comparative study of Kamban's Ramayana (in Tamil) and Milton's Paradise Lost (1977); Subhas Sarkar's Eliot and Yeats; A Study (1978); V. Satchidanandam's Whitman and Bharati (1978); S.P. Prasad's Thomas Hardy and D.H. Lawrence (1976); and Prema Nandakumar's Dante and Sri Aurobindo (1981). But of course the real challenge for the Indo-Anglian Literary Historian and critic is to gain intimacy with English Literature, to formulate his responses, and to give orderly expression to them. This is all the more difficult because literature in English is produced, not in England alone but in the USA, the older Commonwealth countries (Australia, Canada, New Zealand) and the newer ones (India, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Malayasia, Nigeria, Ghana, Kenya, Uganda, West Indies, Guyana, Fiji, Mauritius, Sringapore and the rest). An Indian who exposes himself to the classics of England and USA (and to European classics in good English translations) and then desires to 'judge' this apparently 'alien' literature has to form in his mind certain categories current in literature by a study of the masters from Aristotle and Longinus to Eliot, Leavis and Allen Tate, and at the same time grow intimate with the literature of India, whether in English or in the indigenous languages. If criticism involves "the elucidation of works of art and the correction of taste" (Eliot), "a disciplined relevance in response, comment and determination of significance" (Leavis), and (as in the best work of Allen Tate) the marriage of "an aesthetic judgement to an ethical judgement" (Herbert Read), surely the critic has need of as much of experience of both life and literature as possible, and not quantitatively alone either: for it is the capacity to look into the heart or the body of life or literature, into the very soul, in other words the capacity of Sahridayatvam, that makes the true critic. What literature tries to present is the elusive Truth beneath the mere apearance of truth, and this is done through potent symbol, the nuances of suggestion, the reverberation of dhwani.

Even a literary history, which is superficially a chronological record of trends and events and achievement in the world of letters, requires fullness and amplitude and movement, a sense of measure, and the right distribution of light and shade. And when the literary landscape is exotic, almost alien, the critic's task can become very taxing indeed. Even so, during the last decade or two, literary criticism in Indian writing in English has acquired new dimnsions of its own. It is now not just the literature of England, USA and India alone that claims the attention of the critic, but world creative writing in English. More and more, American literature and Commonwealth literature and not alone English and Indo-Anglian liteature-figure in postgraduate studies and research in the Indian Universities. In recent years, there has been a spurt of activity in the academies leading to the Ph.D. and the the publication of the research findings. A good doctorate degree is more a promissory note than an indubitable contribution to knowledge meriting publication; the promissory note is yet to be redeemed by the genuine article fashioned during the arduous years of post-doctoral research, The recent promiscuous publication of Ph.D. dissertations has doubtless led to a devaluation of literary criticism, but there are also those of yesterday and today giving evidence of exacting enough standards of scholarship, criticism and clarity and force of writing. To cite but a few; Amiya Chakravarty's The Dynasts and the Post-War Age in Poetry (1938), A.C. Bose's Three Mystic poets; A.E. Yeats and Tagore (1945), B. Rajan's Paradise Lost and the 17th Century Reader (1947), O.P. Govil's Browning's Poetics (1955), Shiv K. Kumar's Bergson and the Stream of Consciousness (1962), A.N. Kaul's The American Vision (1962), D.V.K. Raghavacharyulu's Utopia : The Quest and Crisis (1964), M.K. Naik's Somerset Maugham (1966), Mokashi-Punekar's The Later Phase in the Development of William Bulter Yeats (1967), V.K. Chari's Whitman in the Light of Vedantic Mysticism, K.B. Vaid's Technique in the Novels of Henry James, Chaman Nahal's The Narrative Pattern in Ernest Hemingway's Fiction (1972), R.S. Varma's Imagery and Thought in the Metaphysical Poets (1972), V.S. Seturaman's New Bearings in English Literary Criticism, P.V. Rajyalakshmi's The Lyric String: A Study of the Poetry of Sarojini Naidu (1977), Sant Singh Bal's George Orwell: The Ethical Imagination (1981) and T.R.S. Sharma's Robert Frost's Poetic Style (1981). Independent or post-doctoral research has also resulted in significant findings as, for example, in Gokak's Coleridge's Aesthetics (1975) and M.V. Rama Sarma's The Eagle and the Phoenix (on Samson Agonistes' 1976) and Things Unattempted (1982), a study of Milton's doctrines and his poetry, and D.V.K Raghavacharyulu's The Critical Response (1980), a collection of essays on American, Commonwealth, Indian and British Traditions in Literature. Not dissimilar in scope is Commonwealth Literature: Problems of Response (1981), a collection of comparative studies between Indian Literature and the Literature of Australia, Africa, Canada and the West Indies.

Particular mention should perhaps be made of Shakespearian Studies. Indians have always enthusiastically reacted to Shakespeare, and Rentala Venkata Subba Rao's Hamlet Unveiled (1909) and Othello Unveiled (1910) were almost tour-de-forces in imaginative interpretation. Notable among later publications are: C. Narayana Menon's Shakespeare Criticism (1938), K.R. Srinivasa Iyengas Shakespeare: His World and His Art (1964), Amaresh Datta's Shakespeare's Tragic Vision and Art, and S.C. Sen Gupta's series of critical studies of the Comedies, Histories and Tragedies respectively, cumulatively, an impressive achievement indeed.

Critical theory too has attracted some scholars, and promising work in this field includes Humayun Kabir's Poetry, Monads and Society (1941), B.S. Markhekar's Arts and the Man (1940) and Sri Aurobindo's The Future Poetry, published serially in the Arya sixty years ago and now available as a formidable volume. Sri Aruobindo's illuminating comments on literature ancient and modern, and on particular writers and poems, are also collected, and constitute a body of critical interpretation of a high order.

Informed and perceptive criticism of Indian writing in English is but a recent phenomenon, stimulated by the academic study of this subject during the last couple of decades in Indian and foreign universities, and there is a lively account of this phenomenon in G.A. Reddy's Indian Writing in English and Its Audience (1979).

Aside from the doctoral dissertations, independent critical studies have also been coming out to meet the academic as well as popular demand. In the series Indian 'Writers' launched by Arnold Heinemann under C.D. Narasimhaiah's editorship, quite a few monographs have appeared, for example: R.K. Narayan by P.S. Sudaram; Manohar Malgonkar by G.S. Amur; Mulk Raj Anand by M.K. Naik; Bhabani Bhattacharya by K.R. Chandrasekharan; Nissim Ezekiel by Chetan Karnani. In Twayne's 'World Authors Series', again, a few good monographs have figured: Raja Rao by M.K. Naik, Khushwant Singh by V.A. Shahane, Mulk Raj Anand by Krishna Nandan Sinha. Outside these series, an outstanding work is K.D. Sethna's Sri Aurobindo: The Poet (1970), and many are the critical studies of Sri Aurobindo's Savitri, and although denigrated by some of the 'new' poets the symbolistic epic continued to attract world-wide critical attention. The 'big three' (Narayan, Mulk Raj Anand and Raja Rao) of Indo-Anglian fiction also inspire fresh critical examination and report, and women writers like Kamala Markhandaya, Prawer Jhabvala, Anita Desai and Nayantara Sehgal have been studied too in full length monographs. Thus Shahane has a book on Jhabvala (1976), B. Ramachandra Rao on Anita Desai (1979) and A.V. Krishna Rao on Nayantara Sahgal. And Indo-Anglian fiction as a whole is critically surveyed by Meenakshi Mukerjee in her The Twice-Born Fiction and Uma Parameshwaran's A Study of Representative Indo-English Novelists (1976).

It is also worthy of record that literary journals–more often than not, based in some academic centre or other–have largely contributed to cricital activity in Indian writing in English. Notable among these Journals are the Literary Criterion edited by C.D. Narasimhaiah, the Literary Half-Yearly edited by H.H.Anniah Gowda and Commonwealth Quarterly edited by S.N. Vikramraj Urs, all three from Mysore; The Journal of Indian Writing in English edited by Balaram Gupta from Gulbarga; Literati (Trivandrum), Literary Endeavour (Anantapur), Skylark (Aligarh), the Indian Scholar (Raipur), Writers Workshop Miscellany edited by P. Lal (Calcutta), and Journal of Literature and Aesthetics (Quilon). Sahitya Akademi's Indian Literature, Osmania Journal of English Studies, Banasthali Patrika, Rajasthan Journal of English Studies, and other well established journals like Triveni and Quest, all provide a forum for the Indian critic.

In conclusion, although the contemporary critic in India is heir to two great traditions, the Western and the Indian, it must be admitted that he has not so far been able–except very rarely–to integrate the two critical disciplines into a viable modern new synthesis. Critics out of the ordinary like Sri Aurobindo, M. Hiriyanna and Ananda Coomaraswamy–in their characteristically seminal works such as The Foundations of Indian Culture, Art Experience and The Dance of Shiva–were able to effect a marriage of the finest in the two traditions. And in his The Future Poetry, Sri Aurobindo was able to posit the nature of the poesy of the future when the highest human utternce might partake of a mantric character. This will of course be dependent on a breakthrough in human consciousness. In the meantime, the new methods of linguistic, stylistic and psychological criticism, have found a place in our Groves of academe, and one can justifiably look to the future with high expectancy. "Like to the Kingdom of God on earth", says Allen Tate, "Literary criticism is perpetually necessary and, in its very nature of its middle position between imagination and philosophy, perpetually impossible". But this also explains why some of our best minds with the finest sensibilities are being lured to the ever fascinating and ever elusive profession of literary criticism.

K.R.S.I.

CRITICISM (Gujarati). Narmad was the first Gujarati author to be exposed to the new spirit of western literature and culture, and therefore should be considered as the pioneer of Gujarati criticism. Like all pioneers he suffers from some serious limitations. Though criticism as well as literary creation was yoked to the task of social reform during his nascent times, Narmad as a literary critic, apart from evaluating his predecessors as well as contemporaries, elucidated some of the fundamental elements of poetry. But his criticism, stops at the stage of stray thoughts as by temperament he was not given to working out a proposition in all its logical ramifications. On the whole Narmad's critical work lacks depth but it does have the most important quality of a pioneer, namely, variety. Looking to the fact that he combined the roles of the first critic as well as the first considerable prose writer in Gujarati he could be easily forgiven for lacking even a proper terminology of criticism.

Though, historically speaking, Narmad was the first Gujarati critic, Navalram Pandya is the first accomplished critic of Gujarati, possessing nearly all the necessary virtues of a critic. By profession he was a teacher, and during his twentytwo year long (1837-1888) literary career he also edited the Gujarati Shalapatra (The Gujarati School-Journal) for eighteen years presenting his mature views on writers of past and present as well as on the issues of Gujarati language and script. The insight, maturity and balance of his judgement have rarely been equalled since in the widely cultivated field of criticism and book-reviews. His taste and sensibility are cultivated and subtle, always well-tuned to the spirit and rhythm of the work, and he can describe his aesthetic pleasure with due detachment inspite of his complete immersion into it. If the various literary forms in Gujarati developed under the influence of English literature–resulting from our contact with the West, Gujarati criticism was shaped by the writings of Navalram. The quality of equanimity or high seriousness is the most distinctive mark of Navalram's criticism. His criticism is always shaped by a definite view-point and consequently while discussing the work under review he is able to throw new light on some issues of aesthetics or life. As a critic he has never been stagnant. His real talent seems to flower out more in practical criticism rather than in the discussion of abstract aesthetic principles.

What sets Govardhanram apart from all other critics is his predominent concern for viewing literature in the context of life i.e. in the social, cultural, religious and educational context, though it could be said that the spirit of the Indian renaissance was so pervasive in his time that didacticism was a common trait of many other writers and critics. He personified the writer as thinker, though he was second to none in his equipment of taste, judgement and capabilities in matters aesthetic. His effort as a critic is not only to illumine what he examines, but to illumine life as well.

He has criticized medieval as well as his contemporary writers, discussed various concepts and surveyed Gujarati drama and especially criticized a humorous play. His views on the novel form are to be found mainly in his prefaces to the four volume of his Epic-Novel Sarasvatichandra. His view on poetry emphasizes observation, contemplation, reflection and objectivity though not denying the importance of rasa or sentiments.

Being a learned professor of Sanskrit and Indian philosophy it was but natural that Manilal Nabhubhai Dwivedi's main critical aim would be to popularise Sanskrit poetics and to provide a philosophical basis to poetry, though he was a poet and a playwright in his own right and wrote many reviews and articles. His prejudice against the west, and his preference for Aryan culture and everything Indian led him to receive new lyrical poetry rather coldly.

Ramanbhai Nilkanth as a critic was the exact opposite of Manilal. He tried to synthesize the Indian tradition with the western i.e. the English tradition. He emphasised perhaps over-emphasised subjectivity and lyricism, the romantic attitude in literature. He has written on historical development of literature, and on some fundamental problems of literature. He was a social reformer, and was more influenced by the west in his literary as well as social thinking.

Narsinhrao Divetia is a scholarly critic and being a philologist he also takes into account the linguistic aspect of works under review. He has discussed at length the musical aspect of poetry. In his lengthy essays, prefaces and studies he mainly adopts analytical method.

Through his work as the editor of periodical Vasant for 36 years Anandshankar Dhruv has left an indeliable stamp of his thought and personality on the literary and cultural life of Gujarat. His articles on poetics, applied criticism reflect his vast scholarship and insight. His extensive reading in religion, philosophy, history, politics, education and literature was comparable only to that of Govardhanram. He has been aptly described as "the synthesizer, the discoverer of the gentle, sweet and benign in life and art" by Vishnuprasad Trivedi. Concepts like synthesis, the golden mean and eclecticism moulded his thinking. Unhampered by the weight of his scholarship his criticism is lucid in style, reflecting his deep understanding judiciousness and empathy. Ramanarayan Pathak has rightly observed that Anandshankar's criticism is serene, dispassionate, profound, poised, clean and wholesome, while his style has a felicity all its own.

Balvantrai Thakore's work both as a poet and critic has powerful influence on Gujarati poetry since the twenties of this century. He was a man with a powerful personality, marked by a strong sense of individuality and independence, and frankness of expression. Characteristically he has said of himself, "Just as my run-on lines and free verse was a new departure in metres of poetry, it is my modest claim that this concrete method of mine in criticism is a new path consciously carved out by me for practical education in criticism, in Gujarat criticism".

As against rhetoric, sonority and verbosity, he advocated a poetic expression aiming at richness of meaning, content and economy in free, flowing metres. Balvantrai did for Gujarati verse what Michael Madhusudan had done for Bengali. He liberated the Gujarati metres from their strait-jacket and set them flowing.

Other noteworthy critics who were working during this period are Nanalal Sanjana, Keshav H. Dhruv and Uttamlal Trivedi.

In terms of merit the name of Ramnarayan Pathak follows immediately after Navalram, Anandshankar and Balvantrai. He lent his support to the new poetic style of Balvantrai through the long years of his editorship of Prasthan magazine and his work as a teacher of language and literature at the Gujarat Vidyapeeth in Ahmedabad. In his first critical essay, he introduced the poet Balashankar as a true poet of the later half of last century. Similarly, he edited the first collection of a great poet 'Kant', Purvalap, with a fine introduction bringing out the artistry of the poet and thus contributed to strengthening of Kant's reputation.

His method was mainly analytical and like Balvantrai he also played a significant role in the making of a new generation of poets, though in a different vein. As a critic he always remained free from personal prejudices and was motivated by his pure love for literature. He was a poet in his own right, and that contributed to his subtle understanding of poetry. His solid scholarship and breadth of vision are to be seen in his critical works.

During the Gandhian era critics like K.M. Munshi, Meghani, Rasiklal C. Parikh, Kaka Kalelkar, Nagindas Parekh, 'Darshak' and Chunilal V. Shah have also done valuable work.

Vijayrai Vaidya is considered to be a pioneer of modern criticism and literary journalism. He was the editor of Kaumudi and Mansi for many long years and inspired many new writers to take to criticism, notable among whom are Vishnuprasad Trivedi and Vishvanath Bhatt. His impressionistic and romantic criticism is to be seen in his collections. Vishvanath Bhatt is notable for his comprehensiveness and a facile pen. He is frank and fearless but not free from prejudice. Vishnuprasad Trivedi is an heir to Anandshankar both in style and substance. His critical writings, reach the level of creative writing due to his style which reflects his delicate sensibility, refined taste for beauty, and intellectuality firmaly grounded in the classics of the East and West.

Mansukhlal Jhaveri is a critic of the first order in the tradition of poet-critics in Gujarati. He is original, frank and sympathetic.

Anantrai Raval has given us several books of critical essays and reviews. He tends to give an exhaustive study of the book under review, including a summary of the opinions of other critics, but he is rarely original. Navalram Trivedi has also written extensively on his contemporary writers.

The two leading poets–Sundaram and Umashankar Joshi of the Gandhian era are also leading critics. Sundaram has given a short critical history of Gujarati poetry between 1845 to 1945 in his monumental work, Arvachin Kavita. Sundaram as a critic is always original, thought-provoking, perspicacious and illuminating. He always goes to the root of the problem in hand, and his subtle sensibility results in a judgement that finds wide acceptance.

Umashankar Joshi is a poet-critic of a very high order. He knows the intricacies of poetry as well as other forms of literature, and with unfailing accuracy he can detect the distinctive element of the work under review. He is well-versed in both modern and ancient world-literatue but his lucid prose bears its burden lightly, spreading its aroma only from the background. He remained in the forefront of modern poetry and similarly the new criticism began with him.

In the tradition of poet-critics the names of Sundarji Betai and 'Snehrashmi' should also be mentioned.

Among the short story writers and playwrights, who are also critic, Jayanti Dalal, Chunilal Madia and Gulabdas Brokar are noteworthy. Among the other critics of the Gandhian era, the contribution of Dolarrai Mankad, Ramprasad Baxi, Bhrigurai Anjaria has been very valuable. Apart from their other critical writings Dolarrai Mankad and Ramprasad Baxi have done some work of fundamental and lasting importance in the field of Sanskrit poetics.

In the criticism of the post-Gandhian era two currents are clearly discernible: 1. The New Criticism and 2. The Traditional Criticism. In the new current of criticism the influence of Suresh Joshi has been foremost. He clarified literary concepts, emphasised (rather over emphasised) the formal aspect of a literary work, insisted on practical–-textual criticism as against socio-cultural frame of reference and conducted a compaign for removing the ambiguity in critical terminology. He is a formalist critic of the highest order. He conducted a re-examination of established opinions and evaluations, like a true rebel in the world of Gujarati criticism.

Among the critics in the new style we should mention Radheshyam Sharma, Sitanshu Yashaschandra, Suman Shah, Chandrakant Topiwala, Yashwant Trivedi, Aniruddha, Brahmabhatt etc. Among these Suman Shah and Topiwala have been emphasising the importance of structural analysis in criticism.

The noteworthy example of traditional critic is Niranjan Bhagat. He is a well equipped poet critic. Other critics in this tradition are Yashvant Shukla, Dhirubhai Thaker, Jayant Pathak, 'Ushnas', C.N. Patel, Ramanlal Joshi, Bholabhai Patel, Digish Mehta, Jayant Kothari, Heerabahen Pathak, Chandrakant Sheth, Bholabhai Patel, Suresh Dalal, Pramod Kumar Patel etc.

In the field of philology and linguistics Prabodh Pandit, Harivallabh Bhayani, Shantibhai Acharya, Dayashankar Joshi and Yogendra Vyas are notable. In the field of editing the texts of medieval literature, K.K. Shastree, Ramlal Modi, Bhogilal Sandesara, K.B. Vyas, Ramanlal C. Shah, Shivlal Jesalpura etc. have done valuable work. Dhiru Parikh and Hasu Yajnik have contributed to the criticism of medieval literature.

Ramanlal Joshi, besides his own books of criticism has started editing the 'Gujarat Men of Letters' series of which thirtyfive monographs have been published so far. His collection of critical essays–Vivechanani Prakriya (The critical Process)–has received Sahitya Akademi Award for 1984.

Periodicals like Sanskriti, Buddhiprakash, Forbes Sabha Trimasik, Granth have been actively engaged in literary criticism.

Thus in the course of a century different critical methods including sociological, philosophical, aesthetic, subjective, objective, practical and analytical were tried. Gujarati criticism has a long tradition and with the spread of higher education during the last two decades many new talents have entered the field of literary criticism.

Ra.J.

CRITICISM (Hindi). The History of Literary criticism in Hindi dates back to the beginning of the 20th century. It is, therefore, comparatively a modern discipline. The beginning could be stretched back a little farther to the last two decades of the 19th century, where we come across some stray attempts at criticism mainly in four forms: (a) Theoretical treatises and essays; (b) Scholarly research articles; (c) Histories of Literature-which actually provided source material for proper histories written later; and (d) Book reviews-which mainly performed the task of identifying the qualities and shortcomings of the works under reference. It is, however, these reviews which really represent the trend of criticism in this period.

The publication of Saraswati in 1900 was an important event from the point of view of the development of Hindi criticism. After assuming the responsibility as its editor in 1903, Mahavirprasad Dwivedi started a column 'book-review', the very next year. The significance of the column is evident from the fact that it was the editor's column. There were other periodicals also like Samalochak and Sudarshan, which were started primarily as review magazines. The tone of these reviews was introductory to begin with but became infested with propagada later on and ultimately degenerated into motivated admiration and condemnation from various camps.

Along with these introductory reviews some evaluative articles about both old and contemporary literature also came to light. The beginning was made by 'Mishrabandhus'. The subject was Litterateurs and Literature-both old and modern. This was done in Saraswati as early as 1900. These essays contained the germs of criticism in the true sense. The norms accepted, however, were in conformity with the mediaeval theory of poetry (Riti Shastra). The culmination of this criticism can be seen in the Hindi Navaratna (1910-1911). With the publication of this volume the trend of comparative evaluation was also initiated by laying down a preferential order among the poets. It evoked fiery polemics in which almost all significant critics of the Dwivedi era participated. Padmasingh Sharma, Krishnabihari Mishra and Lala Bhagwan Din deserve special mention in this context.

Whereas the established journals of the period continued to patronize established literature in a conformist style, some others turned towards comparatively new, contemporary and popular forms, particularly the novel. Since novels like Pariksha Guru and Chandrakanta Santati had posed some challenging questions, one comes across a new approach in the criticism dealing with these works, e.g. the probable versus the improbable in literature, or the relation of didacticism with literature. Almost all the significant novels written during this period figure in the critical essays published in various journals. The pattern commonly followed was a brief note about the get up and outer form of the work, followed by a socio-moral evaluation of the content. Sometimes some passing comments on language were also included which discussed mainly the urbaneness of the diction and the influence of Sanskrit, Urdu, Punjabi, etc. on the language.

In the beginning of the 20th century there were two clear trends in Hindi criticism: (1) the Scholarly style of poetry-criticism in comformity with the Sanskrit poetics, (2) the New style of fiction-criticism free from the bondage of traditional poetics.

Apart from these, there were quite a few scholarly research articles and reports published through the efforts of Nagari Pracharini Sabha. Varansi (U.P.). The publication of Mishrabandhu Vinod also paved the way for writing a proper History of Literature in the years to follow.

The first phase of Hindi criticism starts with the coming in of Mahavirprasad Dwivedi (1864-1938). He, on his own, assumed the responsibility of regulating the movement of Hindi literature. He advocated normalcy and simplicity and supported only that literature which answers the call of its time and stands for social needs and values. That is precisely why he advocated the use of the spoken language 'Khari Boli' in poetry and discarded 'Braj Bhasha' which was confined to literature. He changed the very norm of literary criticism and put forth the democratic principle that only those poets and poems are to be considered popular who are read by the common man. He, therefore, not only proposed new principles for evaluation of literature but also assigned the responsibility of moulding the taste of the reading public to the writer.

His criticism was free and frank. He was not awed by the traditionally accepted greatness of even a poet like Kalidasa. He was equally generous and open hearted in acquiring anything worthwhile from literatures of other Indian languages, mainly Urdu, Bengali and Marathi. Another notable tendency in Hindi criticism of this period is the concern of the critic to promote a sense of propriety in the reader and help him in making a proper choice of reading material. This concern logically leads to the comparative method, which was emphasised by Mishrabandhus both in their History of literature as also in Mishrabandhu Vinod. They, however, failed to evolve any modern tools of literary evaluation. Their criticism was based more on the text itself, than on any other socio-political considerations.

The grading of the poets by Mishrabandhu, however, started a chain reaction. A series of comparisons followed. The tone was polemical, but the motive was to establish the superiority of one poet over the other. The two poets around whom the controversy centred, were Deva and Bihari and the participating critics were Padma Singh Sharma, Krishnabihari Mishra and Lala Bhagwan Din. They have predominantly applied the comparative method and the range of comparisons is wide. It is more than evident from their approach and style that the basic sensibility was mediaeval.

These critics went a long way to keep the interests and taste for medieval poetry alive. But their interest in literature was limited to a peculiar kind of literature only. They could not do justice to the emerging new trends in contemporary literature. The tools that they applied were confined to examining the social awareness or the sensibility of the writer. It was in fact the 'Khari Boli' version of the mediaeval style and approach to literature. There were others like Mahavirprasad Dwivedi, who had realised the irrelevance of this outdated mode and outlook, but had not discovered definable tools for the study of literature in the context of life.

The retirement of Mahavirprasad Dwivedi from Saraswati in 1920 marks the end of an era in Hindi criticism and the beginning of the 'Chhayavad' poetry around 1916. It is not a mere accident that one comes across a whole range of new periodicals like Madhuri, Maryada, Sudha, Indu, Shri Sharada, etc. Since magazines like Saraswati and Nagari Pracharini Patrika represented the old guard, these new periodicals were started with a view to representing the new approaches. A series of four articles on 'Chhayavad' by Mukatdhar Pandey was published in 1920 in Shri Sharda, which marks a total shift of approach towards the emerging new trends.

The establishment of Hindi Department at the post-graduate level in 1920 in Benaras University was also an important event in the sense that it necessitated the need for the study of Hindi literature like other subjects in a serious, organized and unbiased manner.

The third decade of the 20th century can be defined a period of transition in the field of Hindi criticism. During this period of varied pressures, Ramchandra Shukla (1884-1940) was the only towering figure who, with a deep respect for the tradition, very keenly realised the need of his own time and accordingly initiated Hindi criticism in the real sense. He wrote the first significant literary history of Hindi literature, and also detailed introductions to the works of three pillars of the Bhakti movement-Tulsi, Jayasi and Sur. He also performed the challenging task of theorizing on the tools he used for evaluation. The most outstanding attribute of his criticism was that in spite of his professional commitment to the academic rigidity. Shukla's criticism was a turning point in the history of Hindi criticism.

The age of criticism which has been named as the 'Shukla era' is a point of departure from where Hindi criticism acquires its own character and form. Shukla's main concern centres round the attainment of this transpersonal area of experience. He rejects all religious and metaphysical references from literary concepts and theory. He was opposed to all kinds of dogmatism in literature. He drew a clear line of demarcation between theory of literature and literary criticism.

He emphasized the use of imagination in portraying an objective-correlative for the abstract emotion, rather than experimenting with devices of poetic craft. He stressed the desirability of objectivity in literature. He did not bind himself to the traditional form of any theory, but defined it anew according to his need and convenience. It was with Shukla that criticism attained the dignity of creative writing.

The need of the academic world was taken care of by Shyamsunder Dass. He wrote books on theory of literature, history of Literature, philology and also edited some medieval texts. His efforts were mainly from the point of view of educating and grooming the students of Hindi literature, which had found a place in higher education, in the University of Benaras. He also paved the way for a systematic and organized theory of literature.

In the third decade of the century, the Chhayavad poets also made a significant contribution to the development of Hindi criticism. Their effort was two-fold. They vehemently attacked the old traditional and conformist style of criticism and emphasized the need for a relevant modern approach, befitting contemporary sensibility. Sumitranandan Pant (1900-78) wrote a long introduction (Pravesh) to his first anthology of poems titled Pallava. The document has the same significance as the 'Preface' to Lyrical Ballads by the English Romantic poet Wordsworth. Pant has not only advocated the use of 'Khari Boli' for Hindi poetry very vehemently, but elucidated the craft of poetry in minutest details. He presented an extremely sensitive analysis of image, blank-verse, word-music, word-meaning and other devices of style.

In the critical essays written by Suryakanta Tripathi 'Nirala' (1896-1961), one comes across the polemics of romantic criticism. For the first time in Hindi literature, he talked of the organic theory of poetry and in the romantic analysis of one of his own poems presented a unique example of practical criticism in Hindi. Like Pant he has also discussed at length the role of metre in a proper historical perspective.

Jayashankar 'Prasad' (1886-1937) in his critical essays has mainly tried to meet the allegations brought up against Chhayavad. It is, however. a different matter that he has elucidated the sensibility of Chhayavad and also thoughtfully analyzed a number of general problems of literature. His main concern is to place 'Chhayavad' in its proper Indian tradition and trace its historical base and development, probably because the western influence on the movement was over-emphasized by major contemporary critics. He also made an effort to provide a philosophical base to the thought content of Chhayavad. He was probably the most significant poet-theoritician in the context of 'Chhayavad'.

Mahadevi Verma's (b. 1907-) contribution is mainly in her effort to formulate and define the various problems relating to this movement and also to interpret the socio-realist background of 'Chhayavad' in the wake of the progressive movement.

Apart from these poet-critics, there was another group of critics, who tried to analyse and evaluate the Chhayavadi poetry sympathetically. Among these critics was Shantipriya Dwivedi (1906-1967) who represented the Impressionist style of criticism in Hindi.

The post-Shukla criticism is dominated by three major critics–Nanddulare Vajpeyi, Hazariprasad Dwivedi and Nagendra. In Shantipriya Dwivedi one came across a very sensitive reader of Chhayavad but not an ardent critic who could meet the challenges posed by the norms framed by Ramchandra Shukla. It was his own disciple Nanddulare Vajpeyi (1906-1967), who came forward to meet the challenge and rescue 'Chhayavad'. He challenged Ramachandra Shukla on the theoretical plane. He decried Shukla's approach for its idealistic and moral ovetone and preferred to frame his norms of evaluation on the basis of the lyrical verses of 'Prasad' and 'Nirala'. He not only emphasised the role of creative energy, as explicit in 'Nirala's' poetry but also regarded commitment to literature as very important. He was against the decisive role of any non-literary norms in the context of poetic evaluation. One notable factor about the criticism of his period is that the area covered by the critics was very vast. Unlike their predecessor's their criticism is not just poetry-based. They have also enriched the theoritical base by offering a new interpretation of all significant poetic theories–specially the theory of 'Rasa'.

Hazariprasad Dwivedi (1907-1978) differed from Ramchandra Shukla in his very approach to literature. He was also different from his contemporary critics. He neither accepted the dominant role of political situation as propagated by Shukla for determining the literary movements and trends nor that of the poet's inner conscience. He emphasized the need for evaluating all trends and writers in the broader cultural context of his time. He attached more importance to the deep inherent cultural traditions as compared to political upheavels on the surface. To discover this inner unbroken cultural stream running through the literary tradition, he emphasized the study of literary work through motifs, myths and poetic convention because they represent the cultural consciousness of the race. A number of his essays on aesthetics from the point of view of original thinking are very fresh and significant.

Nagendra (b. 1915) starte writing after Nanddulare Vajpeyi and Hazariprasad Dwivedi were already established as critics. He, therefore, had the advantage of being cautious of the shortcomings of their writings. He started with practical criticism. His earlier essays betray the influence of Freud which he has also admitted. Slowly he changed his theme to theoretical essays. In the beginning he was attracted by western theory and later on the bulk of his writing was devoted to literary theory–Indian, Western and comparative.

In his practical criticism he discreetly avoided controversial and polemical subjects He tried to introduce. the psycholanlytical method also under Freud's influence. His best is expressed mainly in his analysis of the poetic craft. His subject is mainly Modern Literature but medaeval authors have also found place in his criticism.

One notable factor about his post-Shukla criticism is that all the three major critics have emphasized the importance of the poet's self-expression in poetic creation.

Post-Shukla critics mainly had to face two challenges. The final fall of the Chhayavad trend was proclaimed by Devraj in his book Chhayavad ka Patan (downfall of Chhayavad). The Chhayavad poets themselves had realised that the emphasis on emotion has degenerated in a kind of sentimentalism and fancy. Devraj's attempt is significant in the sense that he finally analysed and illustrated the shortcomings of Chhayavad and proposed new norms of evaluation. According to Devraj, a great artist always represents the temper of his age through his works. Devraj's approch is different from the progressive trend also in the sense that when he talks of social concern or consicousness it does not imply any particular economic structure or event.

The next turning point in Hindi Criticism came through in the middle of the fourth decade. The Post-Shukla critics were still busy establishing Chhayavad whereas the living poets had declared the end of an era and were passing through a phase of trnsition. The progressive moment had gained momentum with the establishing of the progressive writers union in 1956. A number of critics like Shivdan Singh Chauhan, Prakashchandra Gupta, and Ramvilas Sharma declared Marxism as the theroetical base of their criticism. These critics formulated their literary theory to a large extent in the light of Marxism, wrote book-reviews of contemporary literature and re-evaluated the old and mediaeval tradition of poetry accordingly.

Prakashchandra Gupta advocated a liberal approach and opposed dogmatic rigidity, but in his evaluations his ideological bias was more than obvious. The most controversial and yet the most significant among the progressive critics is Ramvilas Sharma. He also started with the evaluation of Chhayavad-poetry, particularly 'Nirala'. His significance lies in the fact that he did not merely propagate Marxist principles but re-evaluated the whole tradition, thereby providing a testing ground to Marxist approach and exploring its possibilities. His perspective, which engulfs the vast tradition from Sanskrit writers to contemporary authors lends a kind of legitimacy, and dignity to his efforts. What makes him acceptable is the lack of dogmatism and rigidity of approach.

He appears to be in agreement with Shukla on a number of issues. Ramvilas Sharma emphasized the anti-feudal and democratic approach of Shukla's criticism and placed him alongside 'Nirala' and Premchand. The main debatable subjects were the Sant Poetry. Riti poetry and Chhayavad. The writers who figured prominently in his writings are Bharatendu, Mahavirprasad Dwivedi, Premchand, Nirala and Ramchandra Shukla. The trend of experimental peotry. however, did not find much favour with him, yet he analysed poets like 'Agyeya', Shamsher and Muktibodh with a sense of deep involvement.

Gajanan Madhav Muktibodh (1918-1964) is the most outstanding poet-critic of the progressive trend. He had started contributing to periodicals in the form of critical essays as early as 1945, but his first volume Kamayani: Ek Punarvichar was published as late as 1961. The title of the volume is self-explanatory. The book is significant from the point of originality and non-conformist approach. He not only differs from traditionalists but also from progressives like Ramvilas Sharma in his approach. He interprets Kamayani anew as a phantasy. In his later works, viz. Ek Sahityik ki Diary and Nai Kavita ka Atma Sangharsh, both published in 1964, he comes forward as a self-conscious critic who very objectively and yet psychologically analyses the creative process of the poet. On the one hand the superficial and dogmatic approach of the earlier Marxist critics and on the other the subjective and introvert approach of the new literature are confused in his criticism. He was deadly opposed to what he called 'frigid aesthetic attitude' of 'New poetry'. He accepted the task of criticism not in self-defence, but with a sense of responsibility.

Namwar Singh (1927–), among the modern critics, is significant for combining the Marxist approach with the sensibility of 'New-Poetry'. He differs from the progressive critics in his sympathetic attitude towards New Writings His first work of criticism Chhayavad (1954) was a landmark in the sense that it is an exposition of the social reality in Chhayavad poetry. He tries to deal with one aspect or the other of the problem in some other essays too in his collection Itihas aur Alochana. He has also made very significant contribution in the sphere of fiction criticism.

Parallel to the anti-Romantic approach of the progressive critics there emerged another trend which was inspired by the Neo-classical theory of T.S. Eliot. The most significant name among these Neo-classicists in Hindi is that of the critic-poet S.H. Vatsyayan 'Agyeya' (1911–). In his Introduction to Tar Saptak, he emphasized the need for the New poets to act as their own critics as well as of their fellow poets. This, according to him, had become necessary, due to the fact that the movement of 'New Poetry' had not received its due sympathy from critics of the old order. Therefore, he thought it necessary for the New poet to be a critic too. Through his critical writings he explained his own poetry, evaluated his contemporaries and formulated certain norms of evaluation.

Trishanku, the anthology of 'Agyeya's' critical essays; drew heavily on T.S. Eliot. His theory of impersonalization in the creative process, the importance of tradition in shaping poetic sensibility, the need for the poet to imbibe it etc. are certain problems dealt with by him at length. In the beginning he was also influenced by the psycho-analytical method of Freud and Jung, but gave it up later. In his later essays collected in Atmanepad he has analysed the dialectical relation between the self and the other-than-self in the context of creative activity. Throughout, in his critical discusion, 'Agyeya' advocated the need for experiement in poetry. 'Agyeya' not only established New poetry and defined new norms and approach to it but also applied this new approach to earlier poetry.

Apart from 'Agyeya', other significant poet-critics, who have emerged out of the movement of 'New-Poetry' are Shamsher Bahadur Singh (1917–), Girijakumar Mathur (1918–) Lakshmikant Verma (1929–) Dharamvir Bharati (1926–) and Vijaydev Narayan Sahi (1927–). Among the critics the names of Raghuvansh (1921–) and Ramswrup Chaturvedi (1931–) may be mentioned. The efforts made by these critics were three-fold. First, those who were practising poets tried to analyse and establish the New movement of poetry. They elucidated the sensibility and structure of 'New Poetry' in a very sensitive and subtle way. Secondly, they also evaluated earlier poets, as well as their contemporaries and thereby found out a testing ground to their approach. Thirdly, they tried to define and theorize on the new norms for an approach to literature.

A very significant development in the history of Hindi criticism is the evolution of drama criticism and fiction criticism, hitherto overshadowed by criticism of poetry. One comes across a very lean tradition of drama criticism started by Bharatendu and Shyamsunder Das in the beginning of the modern-period. But they drew heavily from the Sanskrit sources. This was followed by some stray efforts at casual evaluation of some plays in which the thouchstone was almost the same as could be for any other narrative genre. Any worthwhile and deep concern for the practical problems concerning stage-presentation had not attracted anybody's attention. Some important questions were, however, raised by the Chhayavad poet and dramatist Jayasankar 'Prasad'. A little later Prasad's own plays were subjected to Ibsenian touchstones imported from the west, which only proves the lack of modernity in the traditional Indian drama criticism. Lakshminarayan Mishra wrote lengthy introductions to his plays under the influence of Ibsen. Upendranath 'Ashk' also raised some practical problems in the introductions to his play-collections. But drama in these essays continued to be treated as spoken or written literature and not as a form involving presentation.

Periodicals like Natrang were started with the specific object of dealing exclusively with drama and its stage-craft. Among those who emerged as drama-critics, the names of Suresh Awasthi, Nemichand Jain, Virendra Narain, Lakshminarayan Lal, Vipinkumar Agrawal, Gov-ind Chatak, etc., deserve mention. Apart from some systematic studies in the subject, scores of review articles on frequent stage presentations are being written and published in regular and little magazines from time to time.

Another branch of criticism which has come of age only in the modern period is fiction criticism. This was necessitated because a whole generation of young fiction-writers rose up in the sixties. The rise of so many fiction-writers at one time is indicative of the beginning of a movement. The starting of the periodical Kahani (1955) from Saraswati Press with Bhairavprasad Gupta as its editor was not accidental. It was in this magazine that a series of articles pertaining to fiction criticism were published. Namwar Singh raised a number of significant problems pertaining to this movement and the need for a separate technique for evaluating prose fiction through this periodical. A whole decade was pervaded with polemical writings pertaining to the various aspects of Hindi fiction. With the publication of Nai Kahaniyan, (1967) under the editorship of Bhairavprasad Gupta, fiction criticism assumed the form of a stream.

The critics and authors who made sustained efforts, and notable contribution in the field are Namwar Singh, Rajendra Yadav and Kamleshwar. Fiction criticism had attained a certain form and level, when the whole movement of 'Nai Kanhani' faced a lot of criticism at the hands of those who raised more slogans than anything else in the name of 'Akahani' (anti-story) 'Sachetan Kahani' (Conscious story), etc. They did make some daring statements and efforts to build up a movement which did not gain momentum, nor did they offer any well-formulated, systematic or organised point of view in criticism. One thing, however, had become very clear; that the large number of novels and short stories written during this period had posed a number of problems with the result that a certain technique of fiction-criticism automatically evolved through the reviews written on novels like Shekhar Ek Kahani and Nadi Ke Dweep by Agyeya and Maila Anchal, and Parti Parikatha by Phanishwar Nath 'Renu'. Nemi Chand jain and Nirmal Verma reviewed some of these novels very sensitively with a lot of insight. One can see an altogether different vocabulary and change in terms of reference in these reviews. The main contribution of this criticism is that it created plenty of scope for liberal evaluation or appreciation and gave a lot of latitude for the use of critical tools.

A group of young critics has emerged in response to the new experiments in the field of fiction and poetry. None of them has, however, so far made a desirable impact. Any commitment to get involved with vital and basic theoretical problems is steadily diminishing. As a result the whole area of literary-theory has been captured by academicians.

N.J.

CRITICISM (Kannada). The medieval tradition of Kesiraja and Nagavarma streses the Kannada practice in grammar, poetics and metre while retaining the tropes handed down in Sanskrit poetics. In the nineteenth century, profound work done by Christian missionaries laid the initial modern foundation for an awareness of period and history periodisation, historical self-awareness and holism in Kannada. Both Rev. B.I. Rice and Rev. E.P. Rice contributed the earliest histories of Kannada literature. Rev. F. Kittel composed the first Kannada dictionary. The proverbs and witticisms he culled from villagers still inspire Kannada poets and writers. Besides, Kittel's essay on Nagavarma's Chandombudhi sets a model for the new kind of research providing dates and temporal environment. Collectively, they inspired scholars of the coming age to conduct research with a secular interest.

For instance, their inspiration and model is seen in the early critical editions of several poets brought out by M.A. Ramanuja Ayyangar and S.S. Narasimhachar. Each edited work carries a well-researched introduction on the poet besides the text transcription from the manscript. With the coming of R. Narasimhachar, this kind of secular research can be said to have come of age. His Karnataka Kavicharite (1907) combines materials from three sources—visit to 'mutts' and libraries for direct study, recording of oral tradition and comparisons. Even today it is an important reference work and commands respect. The next important name is of B.M. Srikantiah, whose Kannada Kaipidi beside his essays and lectures, forms an essential possession of a student of Kannada poetics. Kaipidi is in two parts. Serious study of ancient Kannada literature had just started in the Universities and Colleges. At Mysore, the great trio, T.S. Venkannayya, A.R. Krishna Shastri and D.I. Narasimhachar established the tradition of serious research and criticism. They were fine teachers. To the tradition of textual criticism and editorial work should be added the names of Marishankara Dyavru, Karibasava Sastri and Nanjundaradhya. P.G. Halakatti did the pioneering work of discovering and editing the scattered Vachana literature of Virashaiva tradition. S.S. Basawanal, S.C. Nandimath, K.G. Kundanger, Alur Venkata Rao, Kapatral Krishna Rao, Bellave Venkatanaravanappa, Muliya Timmappayya, B. Shivamurti Shastri, N.S. Rajapurohit, R.C. Hiremath and others from all over Karnataka consolidated the tradition of critical scholarship through their occasional writings, introductions to texts, lectures, stray essays, discoveries of monuments and inscriptions, in line with the tradition founded by the Rice and Kittel. Serious attempts to bring scattered information into single perspectives were made by R.S. Mugali, T.N. Srikantia, N.K. Kulkarni, S.S. Malwad, Prahlad Kulkarni, and others in their histories or historical pieces with due attention to periodisation, regionalisation and evaluation.

CRITICISM–KANNADA

Serious scholarship in Karnataka is riddled by unseemly controversies and is not without its caste and regional biases. Kannada scholarship seriously set about to discover a unified identity. This tradition was continued and brought to a literary finesse in recent years and now it forms a major interest of both the professional and lay critics with distinctive approaches and philosophies. These approaches and philosophies are contemporaneous with the leading philosophies of the modern world and ancient Kannada texts are being subjected to criticism in their light.

Kannada is said to have had its literary renaissance in the twenties of this centurry. Some of the names we have included in the scholarly traditions mentioned above also figure in what can be termed as modern or humanistic criticism.

Freewheeling humanistic critics sprang all over Karnataka from the twenties onward and drew into their fold even the scholarly critics. B.M. Srikantiah appealed to the younger generation to emancipate Kannada from artificial loads of jewellery of the classical courtly period. This brave appeal went down well with the writers. D.R. Bendre swore that in his poetry he would rather sow stars in the Kannada soil than brilliant jewels which would be a waste. By gathering a small band of committed workers called 'Geleyara Gumpu', he laid the foundation for practical criticism by making them write verse and prose under his superivision and inviting comments. A profound thinker with originality, he challenged the entire alankara sastra built up over centuries and pointed out its limitations. To his classical scholarship he brought the freshness of his personality. His study of folk literature and the direct demonstration of its power in his own verse was a remarkable contribution to Kannada language. Another kind of freewheeling is witnessed in Manges Govind Pai, recognised by the former Madras province as a national poet. In his casual forage, he discovered a Kannada sentence in a Greek play and also tried to identify Hippocouros mentioned by Ptolemy with the Karnataka's village, Hipparige. Whether the validity of this suggestion, it points to the two essential qualities of Pai: his Karnataka-centredness and the fierce independence of his outlook. Coming from a poet-scholar belonging to a district which belonged then to Madras Presidency, such essays marked the emotional unity of a politically divided potential state whose actualisation had to wait for ten years after India's independence. It was at the same time that A.R. Krishna Shastri wrote his inimitable literary cum textual criticism of Bhasma Mahakavi (1933) and much later his work on Bankimchandra Chatterjee which bring out the catholic outlook of the Kannada critic. His work on Bhāsa is the best work on that subject known anywhere.

Literary theoreticians form a class by themselves. L.S. Seshagiri Rao gives the credit of pioneering to D.V. Gundappa. His long essay titled 'Sahitya Mattu Janajivana', published in Prabuddha Karnataka (Vol. 3, No. 1) is the first example of literary theory expounded in a sustained ratiocinative pattern. He tends to stress their interdependence. (In a later speech, Bendre stessed their relation as of mutual correctives, planning off each other's excesses.) D.V.G., as he was affectionately known, considers literature as involved with beauty and proves himself an ideal humanist.

Masti Venkatesa Iyanger (Srinivasa) published his first treatise on literature titled Sahitya in 1922. Drawing analogies from music ('Singers, when they execute a musical phrase very well, sometimes exclaim "Wahawwa!" themselves'.) he showed the intimate relation between a creative writer's function as a self-critic. Most creative writers then had also been critics of literature except in the rare cases of classicist scholars. Even today, Masti's works on iterature, criticism, culture and politics are very enjoyable. The editorial comments on political themes he wrote for his monthly Jeevana have been collected and represent the contemporary trends most ably. He showed intimate knowledge and appreciation of folk literature.

Of hisorical interest is M.R. Srivinasa Murty's essay on 'Placing Sadakshari in the Scheme of Kannada literature' published in Prabuddha Karnataka (1922) in which he raised the forthright question, 'What is good literature?'.

The next generation of critics of the humanistic hue are V.K. Gokak, K.V. Puttappa, A.N. Krishan Rao. For a time, Rao continued the role of a pioneering teacher in trying to fix the "responsibilites" of creative writers; but later, he branched off into different directions and tried to set literature in its contemporary environment. K.V. Puttappa, the distinguished poet and Jnanapith Award winner, remained a fundamentalist in theory throughout, pleading for a fierce independence of outook. His revolution is mainly social, being a protest against caste barriers. In theory, he was an advocate of the religion of beauty. He drew mainly on Tagore though he was committed to the humanist-Vedantic principles of Vivekananda and Aurobindo. Like Bendre, he advocated a poetry advancing towards the state of incantation, i.e. 'Mantra'. They charge literature with the function of guidance and solace in the struggle towards human equality.

Like Puttappa, V.K. Gokak too is a fundamentalist; but he makes "culture" the focal goal towards which literature should move. This is a loaded word full of personal and social implications both of which he subtly covers in his inclusive concept of culture. He makes the concept include preception, but excludes prescription. (In his Samarasave Jeevana (1956) he makes the Guru Swamidasa use the modern democratic rhetoric: how he himself would have reacted if he were under the same stress.)

Being exposed to international culture, he knows the injury a sensitive personality is subjected to as a result of prescription. But perception, which a smaller personality willingly tries to understand, is acceptable in literary criticism by implication. The main goal is enlightenment which is the heart of "culture". In spite of his training at Oxford, V.K. Gokak is a strong advocate of Indian cultural values as perceived in all social strata. In the 1950s, Gokak responded to social compulsion and advocated the other face of humanism—social responsibility. He changed his rhetoric and earned the double credit of being the founder of "progressive" poetry, and then "New" (Navya) poetry. For him, a new strategy of expression (rhetoric) was necessary for the articulation of the new sensibility; and he retained the right of the creative artist to change his style for the need of the fast changing Indian sensibility. It paid off in making him the founder of "Samanwaya" (via media) poetry too, in his response to some of the literarv excesses of the sixties.

A.N. Krishna Rao, an arch-rebel, began as a stage artist and literary critic. He is probably the first to publish a full-length piece of art criticism in Kannada, with his highly critical work on Raja Ravivarma's art. As an important contributor to D.K. Bharadwaj's Rangabhumi, a journal devoted to drama and stage, he was witness to the best age in the history of Kannada drama when brilliant literary personages rubbed shoulders with professional stage artistes and producers. Those days, alas, have gone forever, and an artificial hiatus has grown between the professional and the amateur theatre in Karnatak. But he did nothing to break this false barrier. He hardly realised the value of this alliance; but during the life span of Rangabhumi, he wrote brilliant appreciations of the professional artistes, Gubbi Veeranna, M. Pir, Malvalli Sundaramma, Garud Sadashiva Rao. He has written some lively pieces on Kannada artists, sculptors and musicians.

It is difficult to trace the promptings which made A.N. Krishna Rao the sworn rebel against a literary "establishment" which did not really exist. In 1943 he founded the Progressive Writers' Movement. Though modelled after the senior Hindi literary movement presided over by Premchand who stood for social commitment in literature, the movement was against 'literary establishment' preoccupied as it was with educated middle class family themes. Krishna Rao launched a virulent attack on "establishment". The Quit India movement had just subsided and the Bengal famine was on its way. News about Subhash Bose's INA was percolating. In this desperate climate of hope and despair, the progressive writers established a wide mrket with their cheap paperbacks and brought for A.N. Krishna Rao the position of an opinion-framer and a leader of a kind beyond the confines of literature. He became the articulate voice of Karnataka and its conscience keeper. Karnataka's unification and its present name owes a lot to his forthright advocacy. He deliberately guided the progressive movement into Gandhian channels and did much to earn for Karnataka the name of a 'Gandhi State'. His literary criticism is dominated by a concern for the down trodden, the peasant, the prostitute, the daughter-in-law rebelling against the mother-in-law, the poor artist caste barriers and the domination of religious institutions and of the wealthy. But it has drawn comments that in his creative writing, the same bourgeois themes he rebelled against continue to dominate. Most other progressive writers were creative artists rather than critics.

V. Sitaramayya, the most powerful critic of this generation, is known for his sensitive response to literature of all lands. Basically an economist, he resigned a lucrative job in the Reserve Bank to join as a teacher of English, Kannada and Economics in Bangalore. He was the first to show the poetic quality of Gokak's unusual Samudra Gitegalu. He is also the first to introduce I.A. Richards as a critic. His reading, as demonstated in his criticism, is alive with references to writers from all over the world. He is equally insightful about the poets of the past and the present. He insists on the nobility of mind for a poet which can make his verse broad and universal in its appeal. His Kavikavyadrishti (1955) is strictly a poet's response to criticism.

"Whatever the poet does, there is an underlying psychic power in the poet's desire and anxiety", declares Kadengodlu Sankara Bhat, the poet of South Kanara in his Kavi-Kavya-Tattva-Mimamse. Steeped in Sanskrit and Kannada learning, he stresses the humanistic concerns of poetry rather than the individual poet's merits and demerits.

P.T. Narasimhachar, another scholar-poet of the same generation is also a modern thinker who employs psychological theories of play for his theory of poetry. Inspiration, according to him, is "excess energy" employed in the creative act so that equilibrium is maintained.

It is not correct to describe the writers and critics of this so-called "Romantic" period as Romantics. The English Romantics had a personal religion of Beauty in protest against the rationalist-liberalist ethos of the 19th Century in the absence of a broad humanist framework. Kannada writers started with a framework of the humanised metaphysics given to them by Vivekananda, Tagore and Sri Aurobindo. Within this framework, they found room for a personal release, self-expression and the liberation of the human spirit. The framework as given by these stalwarts had already been humanised and made life-accepting, non-renunciatory, self-revelatory—the precise religion that a poet aspires for. The Sanskritic, Upanishadic "Raso vai sah"—God is Delight—brought them profundity and made their theory of poetics self-revelatory and inspiring. That helped them to include both the conscious and the subliminal in their creative effort. They aspired for the status of householder rishis and expected the same kind of individuation in other writers. They included the ideal of service and national cause in their inspirational tapasya. They were given the appelation "Romantics" based on the mistaken conception of both English Romanticism and Indian Vedantic idealism without realising how much it had been humanised. However idealistic their principles may sound,—and it is easy to label them all as idealists, Romantics, transcendentalists, unworldly, abstract,—their principles did no harm to their creativity and tended to enhance their intellectual vitality at least in a few cases. The reverse happened after the Independece: theory raised too many inhibitions, demanded too many concrete details in poetry and curtailed free expression; and worse, made expression shape itself into Western moulds of thought pre-existing in literature. This is a tremendous loss from which Kannada literature is slowly recovering.

Just within three or four years of Independence came a parasitical modernity called the "New Verse" modelled on T.S. Eliot and in its wake, a new criticism. We have seen how V.K. Gokak himself started it all; but kept his freedom by calling the New Verse only a new mode of expression and assigning no further significance to it. For Gopalakrishna Adiga, the criterion of "newness" is the expression of a new sensibility. Before this, he already had distinguished himself as a college-poet by winning a prize for a long poem in the Gray-Collins manner of "sensibility". Four yeas after Independence (even before the Indian Constitution had been accepted), he blamed the national leaders for not bringing the expected Ramraj on earth; and this, he claimed, was a situation which had brought in him a revolutionary sensibility. He begins with the declaration, "Do not look back on the path you travelled so far." The new style self-declaredly was the way of T.S. Eliot of the Westeland period: the mode of remote allusion, irony and anxiety. Adiga's theory is disarminghly simple—the idiom of the 'Romantics' has exhausted its expressive possibilities; literature must have something new. Other pseudo-political theories such as a stagnant political order, non-fulfilment of promise, from which a revolution in sensibility was said to have originated hardly seems to have mattered seriously. A number of brilliant Eliot students saw in Adiga a parallel Eliot and joined his retinue to create a poetic theory of new brand Thus was born Kannada "New Criticism".

The New Criticism, modelled after the New Criticism of England and America condemned paraphrase; swore to judge poetry as poetry; refused to know the mind or the purpose of the poet; sometimes judged and condemned the entire poem by a weak line; used an entire rhetoric of its own which the common reader failed to understand; and created a pseudo-literary 'culture'. Transcending the heavy theory of judging literature as literature, some critics did distinguish themselves by their Marxist or other social inclinations.

Profoundly influenced by Leavis, Lukacs and Lohia, U.R. Anantamurti holds an even balance between his literary and sociological interest. Being a New Critic by training, he judges literature as literature and is an unfailing admirer of Adiga's literary qualities. At his best, Adiga's poetry richly deserves such admiration. But his loyalty to Lukacs helps Murti "place" literature in a line-up of the progressive forces of the world moving towards a Marxist ultimate and wins the admiration of the younger generation as a critic. In balancing these pulls, he has evolved a sophisticated rhetoric for criticism in Kannada. Sometimes this rhetoric needs original English words such as "authentic" but mostly Kannada and Sanskrit words, which in their context do create special sense. Thus, "sannivesha" outside Anantamurti's context means "situation", but in the context of his criticism might mean "the human condition" in the existentialist sense. By consistent use, he has influenced a new genration. Some others acknowledge Adiga as the centre of their literary ideal and contribute critical articles to Adiga's magazine, Sakshi. For them, literature consists of words and is a verbal phenomenon and organisation. The more complex the organisation of words, the better its literary quality. They write detailed criticism on single works and major works. It has become more difficult for the less sophisticated artist to get noticed in this closed literary circle. Literature has become criticism-dominated.

Outside this closed circle some healthy criticism has also emerged; Kirtinath Kurtakoti in his admirable survey articles (barring a few prejudices) gave an overview of Kannada literature as a whole. Well versed equally in the ancient, old and new literatures, steeped in fundamentals and equally open to the new ideals, he was able to give a fairly reliable account of achievement of Kannada literary artists as a whole, in Nadedu Banda Dari. (Path Travesed). P. Lankesh who once belonged to the closed circle, broke out at last, giving occasional insights and using a freewheeling rhetoric. Giraddi Govindaraj uses an enviably clear language evoking exact response in the reader to his critical assessment. G.S. Amur specialises in criticism of single works, but has the background of deep reading in Sanskrit, English and American literatures. He has an open and original mind. S.K. Desai is received well both in the old and new circles. G.S. Shivarudrappa gives even perspectives on both Indian and Western criticism in his Vimarsheya Purva-Paschime (Eastern and Western Criticism) and is a 'Samanvaye' school critic at his dignified best. H.M. Nayak in his admirably freewheeling and clear style has displayed the rare quality of spotting the precise quality of a literary piece in his prolific critical writings and holds out a contrastive ability of upholding a budding writer's talent; and he brings to his assessments the weight of his scholarship as well as fresh insight. He is a contrast to "closed" criticism, but he is acceptable to both circles. G.H. Nayak uses Anantamurti's kind of rhetoric, but distinct in his study and appreciation of the older generation. Buddanna Hingamire has a freshness of outlook in the open forms of criticism. Sumatindra Nadig displays firm assessment of single poems and lines in his detailed work on Adiga. S. Mokashi-Punekar tries to trace Bendre's poetic theory as found in his poetry. Similar work has been done on Puttappa by S.J. Narayana Chetti and on P.T. Narasimhachar by C.P. Krishna Kumar.

Some more names are noteworthy. Purnachanda Tejaswi broke new ground by publishing a detailed analysis of a single stanza by Pampa, the medieval poet. Since then, to see ancient poets in a modern sociological perspective has developed. In this, the distinguished names are. Tipperudrasami,, I. Basavaraju, M. Chidanandamurti, M.M. Kalburgi, N.S. Laxminarayana Bhat, S.J. Narayana Shetti, C.P. Krishna Kumar, Sitaram Jagirder and others. Above all, there is S.V. Ranganna, who brings his training as a professor of English to the evaluation of Kannada classics besides his original works on the theory of style and Western tragedy. Then there are Gourish Kaikini with his enquiring rational mind; the late M.G. Krishnamurti with his spare, discerning pronouncements; and L.S. Seshagiri Rao who has a catholic perceptiveness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.S. Shivarudarppa, Kannada Vimarsheya Nele-Bele, ed. Banagalore University, 1975.

L.S.S.R.

CRITICISM (Kashmiri). If we take into account the opinion of Kashmiri poets that they formed about their own craft, we find a literary theory of a sort as old as the 14th century when Kashmiri poetry began. It is not possible here to consider this inchoate literary theory. The development of literary criticism is a recent phenomenon and the earliest attempts in it can be traced out in the Pratap magazine of S.P. College, Srinagar. For instance, a literary essay of Nandlal Ambardar was published in the magazine in 1936, in which he had evaluated Mahjoor's poetry. Meanwhile Abdul Ahad Azad wrote his Kashmiri Zuban aur Shairi (Kashmiri language and its poetry) in which, inter-alia, he appreciated Kashmiri poetry critically. The book was in Urdu and was posthumously published in 1959, by the J&K Cultural Academy. The establishment of Cultural Front in 1947-48 was a strong stimulus for young writers to discuss and assess various aspects of Kashmiri literature. Kongaposh, a Kashmiri monthly started in 1950, became a mouthpiece of the new enthusiasm and several literary essays were published in it, for instance, P.N. Pushp's 'Shams Faqirun Soz' (the music of Shams Faqir) and 'Kashri Shayiri hund godakal' (earliest period of Kashmiri poetry), Akhtar's 'Afsanas mutlaq kenh bun' yadi katha' (some basic assumptions about the short story), Rahi's 'Markazi adbi tanqid kya chhu', etc. The whole literary scene of this period was under the spell of Marxist theory of art. In 1960, the J&K Cultural Academy started its annual anthology, Son adab (Our literature) which played a remarkable role in furthering the development of literary criticism. Several critical essays appeared in the Kashmiri quarterly Sheeraza, the monthly Gulrez in early sixties. It was in the early sixties that an important change occurred in literary criticism. Our writers one by one turned their back to the progressive movement and gave up their fidelity to extra-literary doctrines. Rahi wrote his essay in 1961 'Tanqid-Amiyuk Maney ta Maksad' (the meaning and function of criticism) which encouraged this change. Hajini's book Kashiri Narach Kitab (A book of Kashmiri prose, 1962) also contains among other things, a few essays in criticism which are free from theoretical fidelity. Mention must be made of those books also which contained complete works of various authors of the past, as each of these books contains a critical introduction also. In mid sixties, Kashmiri literary critics especially Rahi, Kamil, Teng and Firaq were influenced by the formalist criticism of the west. Rahi's several essays in practical criticism, Teng's introduction to Kamil's collection of poetry Beyi Suy Pan (Again the same self, 1967) and Kamil's evaluation of Kashmiri Sufi poetry are the first attempts in search for the beauty of image and form in literature. Rahi's essays, now published in his book Kahwat (Touchstone, 1979) played a significant role in changing the canons of literary judgement. Nazir published his book Kashiri Shayiri (1974) in which he analysed certain important formal characteristics of Kashmiri poetry. In 1979, Gulshan Majid and Shafi Shauq brought out a special issue of the monthly Ash (hope) in which they evaluated Rahi's poetry, emphasising the form and style. Gulshan Majid had made a considerable contribution to modern Kashmiri literary criticism. His polemical essays on such pivotal issues as "Ibham" (ambiguity), "Jedidiyath Chha Saynasi Kina Soofiyana Tray" (modernity–a scientific look on mystic trend) and 'Kashur ghazal' (Kashmiri ghazal) have unsettled many minds. Some special issues of the Research Bi-annual of the P.G. Department of Kashmiri University of Kashmir viz., Kashiri Adbuk Fikri pot Manzur (the philosophical background of Kashmiri literature, 1979) and Adbi Tanqid (literary criticism) are the milestones in the development of Kashmiri literary criticism. The latter book contains translation of world famous classics in literary criticism, such as Aristotle's Poetics (translated by 'Shafi Shauq'), Horace's Ars Poetica (translated by Shafi Shauq), Longinus's On the Sublime (translated by Gulshan Majid), Sidney's Defence of Poesie (translated by Ghulam Nabi 'Firaq'), Arnold's The study of Poetry (translated by R.L. Shant). Recently Shafi Shauq's book Zaban ta Adab (Language and Literature, 1980), has been published which, besides dealing with some vital issues of the language-literature relationship and literary criticism, claims to provide a scientific language to literary criticism which has generally been highly ornate. Two more books related to the literary criticism have appeared recently, namely, Mishal Sultanpur's Vetsnay (analysis, 1980) and Nazir Kulgami's Kitab (book, 1980). Mention must also be made of some special issues of the annual anthology of Son Adab and the quarterly Sheeraza, these are: Lola Masnaviya (Love Masnavis, 1976), Kashiri Zaban ta Adab (Kashmiri language and literature 1976) and Kashiri Jangnama (Kashmiri epic 1977) and Son Adab, (1980).

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Firaq, Sone Adab Kashur Adbi Tanqid (Srinagar, 1980), Naji and Shauq, Kashiri Adbuk Tawarikh (Srinagar, 1978)

Sh.S

CRITICISM (Konkani) in Konkani is yet to take shape. There exists, however, a number of critical studies scattered in periodicals and as prefaces to important works. R.S. Nayak in his scholarly preface to Shenoy Goembab's play Mogachem Logn highlights the author's qualities as a translator and dramatist. R.N. Naik in his preface to Manohar Rai Sardesai's Gomya Tujya Mogakhatir welcomes the new spring in Konkani poetry, not failing to indicate the shortcomings of Sardesai's poetry. In his prefaces to R.V. Pandit's Ailem Toshem Gailem and to Manohar Rai Sardesai's Zayo Zuyo, B.B. Borkar dwells on the purpose and fuction of poetry while bringing out the characteristic traits of the two poets. Manohar Rai Sardesai's prefaces to Sheela Naik's Oli Sanz and to Jaimala Danait's Kavaso and his article on Damodar Mauzo discuss the evolution of Konkani short-story and the art of story telling. And his prefaces to R.V. Pandit's Mhajem Utor Gavddeacham, to Vijaya Sarmalkar's Gothlam and Madhav Borkar's Chonvor are critical appreciations of respective works. In his thesis Satravea Shatakantli Gomantaki Boli (Gomantaki dialect of the seventeenth century) V.B. Prabhu Desai surveys the works of Fr. Thomas Stephens, Antonio Saldanha, Gaspar de S. Muguel de Almeida and throws light on the lexical and syntactical peculiarities of the language of the period and touches on the literary merits of the texts. In his Literary Konkani-A Brief Survey Jose Pereira brings out the characteristics of many a writer with the discernment of a sympathetic critic. Manohar Rai Sardesai in his Brief Survey of Contemporary Konkani Writing eulogises certain tendencies and comdemns others which he considers harmful to a healthy growth of Konkani literature. Manohar Rai Sardesai in his Shenoy Goembab-His Life and Works and R.N. Naik in his Shenoy Goembab have highlighted the merits of Shenoy Goembab's literature. The most important work in the field of literary criticism is, however, Kathashilpa by Lakshmanrao Sardesai. It is a collection of articles on the most eminent of present day short story writers like Damdar Mauzo, Sheela Naik, Meena Kakodkar, Pundalik N. Nayak. Laxmanrao Sardesai which painstakingly analyses their short stories, points out defects if any and on the whole lavishes unstinted but due praise. Being a successful short story writer himself, he proves to be a valuable guide. In a chapter devoted to the art of story telling, the author brings home to the reader his conviction that the secret of a good short story is to be sought not so much in the technique but in an intimate knowledge of life and language. When a subject attracts you, enthrals you, invades your whole being the story takes its form and the technique inevitably follows the dictates of art.

M.S.

CRITICISM (Maithili). The tradition of literary criticism in Mithila has been very old as is evident from Nanyadeva's Sarasvatihridyalamkarar. The poetic talents of Mithila and their interest in prosody are well known through ages and their interest in prosody exercised a great influence on poetry and there are vast varieties of vernacular metres which are now not in use. Alamkara and Kavyashstra works of Maithila authors became the standard works in various parts of the country. A special Maithila school of poetics came to the fore and it had a clear influence on the vernacular literature and that is evident from the 14th century onwards. Lochana's enunciations of the rules of matras are like those mentioned in the Prakrit and Apabhramsa prosody. Two classes of metres have been adopted by the modern writers.

i) Matrika metres, represented by Krishnajanma of Manabodha and ii) Varnatnthaka metre have given rise to free and blank verse as a result of which the poetic craftsmanship has been enriched. The song metres are regulated by definite ragas and tales.

In the field of poetics Achyuta wrote a commentary on Kavyaprakasha of Mammata. Of the works on Alamkara the most numerous are on poetics. Bhanudatta wrote two works on poetics i) Rasatarangini divided into eight tarangas; the first deals mainly with the various components of rasa, and the second Rasamanjari with the nature of heroes and heroines. He mentions two varieties of Sringara and ten stages of Vipralambha. Gopala wrote a commentary on Rajamanjari known as Vikasa. Simhabhupala, composed a comprehensive and elaborate work Rasarnavasudhakara and his court poet Visheshwara wrote a book on rhetorics. Ganganand Kavindra's Kavyadakini deals with the poetical blemishes while Ramanada'as Rasatarangini (a Commentary on Mammata) is an important treatise on poetics and it also refers to Sahityadarpana of Vishvanatha. Works on metres by Ramapati and Gokulananda were also important. The perfection of the literary style in Mithila in the age of Vidyapati amply illustrates the fact that the cultivation of the language as the medium of literary expression had attained perfection. The metres enunciated by Lochana are found used in Umapati, Vidyapati, Govindadas and many others.

According to Lochana, Maithili songs were composed on their own individual principles and Maithili literature was bound by its own laws in the past. The Maithili writers could think independently of Sanskrit principles of literature as it is illustrated in their bold experiments in the field of drama from about 14th century onwards. This was a departure from the past and paved the way for a new dramatic tradition in Maithili.

The first efforts to study and appreciate the language were made by the European and Bengali scholars. The credit of making extensive studies goes to George Abraham Grierson who published and translated a large number of works and laid the foundation of a critical scientific study of the language and literature. He not only showed the way on modern lines but also dominated the scene of critical study till recently.

In Maithili there are Sanskritists, Westerners and those who believe in the synthesis of these two. Sanskrit literary criticism has obviously been the most dominant force in Maithili and no Maithili critic worth the name is free from the influence of Sanskrit works like Sahityadarpana and Kavyaprakasha. Umesh Misra's translation of Sahityadarpana, Upendra Jha's translation of Kavyaprakasha, Vedanand Jha's Kavyakaumudi, Shyamanand Jha's Kavyakalpadrum and Riddhinath Jha's Vishvabhushana (1944) are well known works on the principles of literary criticism. Vishvabhushana presents illustrations of all rasas from Maithili works. It can be discussed under two heads–theories of literature and the history of their application to literature. Mention may also be made of Jayadhari Singh's Kavyamimansa in Maithili. It is a major contribution and has established his reputation as an eminent critic. He presents illustrations of rasa from Maithili works. There are many minor Alankara works in Maithili, like Sitaram Jha's Alamkaradarpana, Damodar Jha's Alamkara Kamalakara and Vedananda Jha's Alamkritibodha. Ram Chandra Misra's Chandrabharana is the most comprehensive work on Alamkaras. Kishore Nath Jha's Rasanirupana is scholarly and complete in itself. Ramanath Jha has also written Alamkarapravesha. Among the critical works dealing with the language we have Subhadra Jha's Formation of Maithili Language and Dinabandhu Jha's Mithilabhashavidyottana–the most scientific and exhaustive grammar written in any modern Indian language.

The first attempt at literary criticism in modern sense came to be made when vernacular literatures were adopted as subjects of study. Literary criticism has grown in Maithili with this changed attitude. Chanda Jha was well versed in traditional sanskrit principles as well as in western methods of historical criticism. Umesh Misra, through his critical studies, laid down the scientific lines of studying Maithili classics. He has succeeded in showing how both traditional and modern principles can be utilised to produce a better result. The synthesis of eastern and western critical principles has led to really some first rate literary criticism. and in this field Ramanath Jha is the greatest. His various studies on Chandra Jha, Govindadasa, Vidyapati and Kirtaniya drama etc. are sober, argumentative and represent the literary criticism at its best. Narendranath Das has applied the method of comparative criticism and his Vidyapati Kavyaloka stands pre-eminent in the field.

Kirana is in favour of western principles of literary critism and to this school belongs Umanath Jha, Damodar Jha (who has published his principles of literary criticism in Maithili), Jayadhari Singh, Durganath Jha Srish, Bhaktinathsingh Thakur, Jaykant Misra, Radhakrishna Chaudhary and Premshankar Singh. In his Kavyamimansa (2 volumes) Jayadhari Singh has tried to work out a synthesis of eastern and western ideas. The critics have applied the western principles of historical criticism including Marxian and Freudian principles. The classical school is respresented by Shivanandan Thakur in his Mahakavi Vidyapati (in Hindi). Damodar Jha is an eminent Maithili critic. Among others, mention may be made of Shailendramohan Jha, Mayanand Misra, Govinda Jha, Shantidhar Jha, Harimohan Misra (he has recently published his account of modern Maithili poetry). As a book of criticism Sudhansusekhar Choudhry's Vivechana is a very good attempt. Laliteswar Jha, Viseswar Mishra, Amaranath Misra and Radhakrishna Chaudhry have done valuable critical studies on Chanda Jha and Lal Das. Modern critical writings and studies in Maithili are influenced by the contemporary Indian and Western literature. Criticism forms a major part of modern prose. Critics often differ both in method and technique. The influence of Rabindranath is noticed, in Yatri (Nagarjuna). Somadeva, Manipadma, Mayapanda, Kirana Amara and others have adopted new forms and techniques. Traditional and Marxian views of western writers on literature have been brought to bear on the Maithili literary criticism in recent years.

Being the seat of traditional Sanskrit scholarship, Mithila could not completely free herself from the influence of Sanskrit principles of literary criticism. The efforts of Chanda Jha were supplemented by Ramanath Jha and others. With the introduction of English education and contact with contemporary Indian languages, there have been serious critical studies in Maithili. The critics have been guided by the scientific mehtod of enquiry and objectivity. The style is extremely polished and thoroughly artistic. Modern criticism is based on the principles of western criticism though attempts have also been made at a synthesis of eastern and western principles. The muse of the younger generation is derived from the progressive thinkers of the east and west and critics view things with scientific eyes. Principles of literary crictism are yet to acquire the heights obtained by other genres in Maithili.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D.N. Jha Shrish, Maithili Sahitya ka Itihas, J.K. Misra, History of Maithili literature., R.K. Chaudhry, Mithila in the age of Vidhapati, A Survey of Maithili Literature., Annals of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute XVI. 145-47. Umanath Jha-Alochana-samakalin Pravritti.

R.C.

CRITICISM (Malayalam) as an independent form of writing is a recent phenomenon. But discussion of literary matters, and to a limited extent writing on them, existed in Kerala even before the advent of serious literary criticism. This inference is supported by the existence of literary groups which used to hold regular discussions on poetry even in the earliest days of Malayalam literature. Such groups existed in the courts of most of the important royal families which governed the different parts of Kerala. Their meetings were partly devoted to the reading of literary works, discussions on them and assessment of the relative merits of poems, authors and literary schools. The gathering of a group of writers known as 'Patinettarakkavikal' in the court of prince Manavikrama, a Zamorin of Kolikkod in the fifteenth century is the most famous example of such patronage. Periodical gatherings of writers like the 'Vakyarthasadas' used to be held in the capitals of these native states. But most of these discussions were based on Sanskrit Kavyas and the Alankarasastra of ancient India. In addition to these there were several 'Kalaries' which imparted literary education and held discussions. Some of the early poets have also recorded their critical opinion on contemporary literature in their own poetical works. One finds such remarks even in the works of later poets like Puntanum Nambutiri and Kunchan Nambiar.

Apart from these instances of unwritten literary criticism, there is an anonymous treatise on 'Manipravala' literature most probably written in the 14th century. The major part of Lilatilakam is set apart for the explanation of Indian literary concepts. The work has been divided into eight chapters (called 'silpas'), the first three of which deal with linguistic and grammatical topics after defining the Manipravala school of poetry as distinct from the 'Pattu' school. The fourth chapter deals with 'Dosa' (a conventional concept of literary defect) and the fifth with 'Guna' (generally accepted merits). 'Sabdalankara' and 'Arthalankara' (rhyme and figures of speech) are the topics discussed in the sixth and seventh chapters respectively. The concept of 'rasa' is explained and the various 'rasas' are defined in the last chapter.)

Lilatilakam is a comprehensive treatise on the principles of literary composition applicable to Manipravala poetry. The enunciation of these principles is of a prescriptive nature. The aesthetic concepts defined in the work are conventional ones borrowed from Sanskrit. But the author has explained them with reference to Manipravala poetry. They have been made relevant to the composition, enjoyment and assessment of Malayalam literature. It gives us an idea of the quality of Manipravala poetry in general and of the relative merits of its different varieties.

In the background of the high sense of literary values and the extensive literary thought reflected in Lilatilakam, the nonappearance of any other work of literary criticism during the long interval between the 14th century and the last quarter of the 19th century is amazing. It can be partly explained in the light of the difficulty experienced by the writers of the period in the circulation of prose writings and in the communication of critical ideas to ordinary readers. Books similar to Lilatilakam might have been written in Sanskrit explaining the 'alanakara sastra'. But they have not survived. Moreover, reading of literature and all forms of response to it remained the exclusive domain of individuals and groups which had common interests.

The situation changed with the advent of printing and journalism in the second half of the 19th century. One finds a gradual but uninterrupted growth of prose writing from that time onwards. The essay and literary criticism were the two forms of literature which developed fast along with journalism in its initial peiod.

The first notable book on Malayalam literature written in Malayalam is a history of literature, Malayala Bhasha Charitram (1881). Its author, P. Govinda Pillai (1849-1897), revised and enlarged it in 1889. It gives a comprehensive picture of the evolution of Malayalam literature through the ages. It contains valuable data on many of the earlier writers and their works. Hence it has provided later critics and historians with a basis for further study and research. Therefore this work is important in the history of literary criticism.

Literary criticism was given a prominent place in many of the early Malayalam journals. This practice which was largely responsible for the modernisation of

CRITICISM–MALAYALAM

Malayalam literature, continued upto the sixties of the 20th century. Most of the journals established in the 19th century used to publish book reviews as a matter of policy. This marked the commencement of regular writing and publication of literary criticism and of the practice of assessing contemporary literature for the benefit of ordinary readers. The book reviews written by the veteran journalist, Kantatil Varghese Mappila (1858-1904) for Kerala Mitram, a weekly established by Devaji Bhimaji in 1856 and those published in Kerala Patrika, another journal started in 1884 by Kunnirama Menon (1858-1936) set the trend. Malayala Manorama (estd. 1890), the renowned journal started by Varghese Mappila, also encouraged literary criticism. The most important critic among the journalists of this period was C.P. Achuta Menon, the editor of Vidya Vinodini (estd. 1890). In addition to book reviews, this journal published articles explaining the basic concepts of Indian aesthetics like 'rasa' 'dhvani' and 'alankara'. Achuta Menon's reviews reflect his wide knowledge of earlier literature, a high sense of values and a consistent approach.

There were two important centres of literary activities at that time, one at Kodungallur and another at Trivandrum. The former, sometimes referred to as the 'Kodungallur Kalari', consisted of a group of writers presided over by Kunikkuttan Thampuran (a prince: 1864-1913) and attended by most of the outstanding poets who lived in central Kerala. They used to hold regular discussions on the poems read out in their gatherings. Thus, a kind of informal and unwritten literary criticism developed at Kodungallur. This led to a simplification of the poetic style and an increased depiction of contemporary social life.

The second group was headed by another scholar and poet, Kerala Varma Valiya Koyil Thampuran (a member of the Travancore royal family: 1845-1914). His contributions to literary criticism consisted mainly of introductions to the works of younger writers and poets. Kerala Varma used to encourage poems of all kinds. But in his speeches and private discussions he took a firm stand in favour of the revival of the classical form of poetry, with particular emphasis on the elegance of diction. This resulted in the emergance of a strong neo–classical tendency in Malayalam literature.

Varghese Mappila, the editor of Malayala Manorama created a third centre of literary activity at Kottayam which eventually became the nucleus of the first all–Kerala organisation of writers. Within a short period he was able to create an atmosphere conducive to literary criticism. Varghese Mappila and many of his friends felt the necessity of forming an organisation to promote creative criticism and prose writing in general. An organisation called 'Bhasha Poshini Sabha' was formed for this purpose in 1891. From 1896 onwards the Sabha published a periodical named Bhasha Poshini with the aim of giving proper direction to the writing and appreciation of literature. It made valuable contribution to the growth of literary criticism.

In the same period A.R. Rajaraja Varma, (1863-1918) a scholarly poet and nephew of Kerala Varma, rose to eminence. He disagreed with his uncle on the requirements of good poetry. He attached more importance to the 'bhava' expressed in poems than to their outer form and did not favour the neo–classical trend in which artificial embellishment and blind application of conventions received greater attention. On the other hand Kerala Varma advocated strict adherence to conventions and emphasised the importance of alliteration in poetry. He stated that 'dvitiyakshara prasa' (correspondence of the second syllables of all the lines in a stanza) was indispensable to Malayalam poetry. At one stage this conflict of ideas erupted into an open controversy which is generally known as 'Prasavada'.

The controversy was sparked off by an article which appeared in Manorama and by a speech delivered by K.C. Kesava Pillai (1868-1913), a disciple of A.R. Rajaraja Varma, voicing this criticism of the practice adopted by some poets to observe 'dvitiyakshara prasa'. His observations provoked Kerala Varma to such an extent that he reacted violently. These marked the commencement of a public debate. Most of the Malayalam poets of the period took sides in the controversy. At last, a few who had taken a neutral stand intervened and put an end to the controversy on the basis of a compromise formula drawn up by Rajaraja Varma himself. It was agreed upon that 'dvitiyakshara prasa' may or may not be used according to the discretion of each poet without affecting the essential qualities of poetry. Even this compromise was a victory for Rajaraja Varma's camp, because they had successfully questioned the sanctity of conventions like the observance of 'dvitiyakshara prasa'.

The specific questions raised in the debate was the desirability of observing 'prasa' as a rule in poetry. Those who opposed the convention argued that it was not so essential as to compel the poet to observe it even by mutilating some words, incorporating superfluous words and neglecting the content of poetry. To the present day reader the topic itself might appear to be silly. But many related questions were also referred to by the followers of Rajaraja Varma in the course of the debate. They were trying to give a new direction to Malayalam literature by discouraging the tendency towards the mechanical application of conventions and by establishing the supreme importance of the experience (rasa) conveyed by poetry. The implications of their stand become clearer in the light of the romantic elements noticeable in the works of Rajaraja Varma and his followers. Prasavada was the first general debate in Malayalam on the guiding principles of literature. Most of the writers of the period were involved in it. The debate inspired some original thinking on th subject and produced a sizeable quantity of critical writing.

While the development of journalism created a form for the regular assessment and orientation of literature, the growth of the modern system of education created a class of people interested in the academic study of aesthetics. The field of creative criticism as well as that of academic studies required books for guidance. A.R. Rajaraja Varma produced concise reference books on Indian aesthetics and the general principles of prose–writing. In Bhashabhushanam he summarised the most important aesthetic theories of ancient India, especially those pertaining to 'rasa', 'dhvani' and 'alankara' and defined each rasa and alankara. The brevity, clarity and simplicity of his explanations are remarkable and the definitions are generally accompained by examples taken from Malayalam literature. In the second book entitled Sahityasahyam Rajaraja Varma has tried to familiarise the reader with the various aspects of prose–writing.

Rajaraja Varma's introductions to his own translations of Shakuntala (the Sanskrit play of Kalidasa) and to Nalacharitam, an attakkatha in Malayalam (by Unnayi Varier), are models of appreciative criticism, while his introduction to Kumaran Asan's poem entitled Nalini is a fine example of creative criticism. In the latter he deviated from the conventional interpretation of Indian aesthetic theories and mechanical application of definitions practised by other critics and boldly welcomed Asan's new concepts of spiritualised love and lyrical poetry. This became a green signal for the transformation of Malayalam poetry.

The role played by Rajaraja Varma in shaping the new trend in Malayalam literature had two significant aspects. Even though he himself was a poet it was the effect of his opinions as a critic that became decisive. Thus a critic emerged as the spokesman of resurgent poetry and as the mentor of the new generation of writers who advocated a change in poetic form. This predominant position acquired by literary criticism within a short time was maintained throughout the first half of the twentieth century. There appeared on the scene a number of critics with a decisive voice in the shaping of new literary trends. Rajaraja Varma also tried to integrate the essential features of Indian literary traditions with those of the romantic tendency in western literature. He did not say this in so many words. But some of his followers undertook the responsibility of explaining this point of view of fulfilling the mission. At the same time they differed among themselves for some time in regard to the relative importance of the tradition and the new tendency. Some others stuck to the Indian tradition in their approach to poetry, recognising the new tendency just in the case of other branches of literature adopted from the West. Yet, in course of time, the critics' affinity to the native tradition faded out and for all practical purposes western standards became the basis of all types of literary criticism.

The most noteworthy critic after Rajaraja Varma was one of his beloved disciples P.K. Narayana Pillai (1878-1938), generally known by the title 'Sahitya panchanana'. He was a scholar with an intimate knowledge of English literature and western ideas in general. But he was unable to reconcile himself to the unconventional manner in which the greatest poets of his period like Kumaran Asan wrote poems. He was uncompromising in his faith in traditional values. At the same time his knowledge of world literature persuaded him to emphasise the lyrical aspect of Ezhuttacchan's epic poems. Sahitya panchana-na's monographs on Ezhuttacchan and two other masters of Malayalam poetry, Cherusseri and Kunchan Nambiar, are classics in literary criticism. He was also one of the pioneers of literary research in Malayalam. Attur Krishna Pisharoti (1875-1964) one of the commentators of Lilatila-kam, Vadakkumkur Rajaraja Varma who wrote a survey of Kerala's contribution to Sanskrit literature, P.Krishnan Nair, (1891–1957) who undertook a detailed discussion of 'alankaras' in Kavyajivitavritti and Ulloor S. Parames-wara Iyer (1877-1949) the poet and historian of Malayalam literature, were some of the other prominent critics who valued the literary heritage of India more than the foreign models. P. Anantan Pillai, (1886-1966) another disciple of Rajaraja Varma and a biographer of Milton and Chelanat-tu Achuta Menon, (1894-1952) tried to combine the Indian and western approaches, whereas Ramavarma Appan Tampuran (1875-1941) and P. Sankaran Nambiar (1892-1954) leaned more towards western models. The two great poets of the period, Kumaran Asan (1873-1924) and Vallattol Narayana Menon (1878-1958) used to write book reviews in the periodicals Atmaposhini and Viveko-dayam respectively. Ennakkattu Rajaraja Varma (1853-1917), Oduvil Kunnikrisna Menon (1869–1916), and Kadattanattu Udaya Varma were three other writers who belonged to the traditional school of literary criticism. C. Antappai (1862–1936) was the first writer who surveyed the dramatic literature produced in Malayalam on the model of Sanskrit drama.

Most of the critics of the period were mainly concerned with the aesthetic aspects and moral contents of literature. The social life portrayed in them was seldom discussed. But there was a conspicuous exception to this general pattern. K. Ramakrishna Pillai (1878–1916), who was a rebel in the political and social fields, favoured the evaluation of literary works on the basis of the social philosophy reflected in them. He opposed the convention-al approach vehemently and encouraged other writers to use literature as a means of criticising the evils of contemporary society.

The reaction against the revival and imitation of the classical form of literature resulted in the development of indirect criticism also. The burlesque was one of the most important forms assumed by such criticism. A noteworthy example is Chakkichankaram a work written by Munshi Rama Kurup ridiculing the mechanical imitation of the few successful 'Bhashanatakas' (vernacular plays) modelled on ancient Sanskrit plays. These works had a sobering effect on over-enthusiastic imitators. At the same time it ultimately caused an almost total disappearance of many indigenous forms of poetry and drama.

But a similar attempt made in later decades to discourage the writing of meaningless verse in the name of mysticism and the indiscriminate imitation of European poems did not produce the desired effect because of the general tendency to accept the western models as modern and progressive. The fate of the pieces of burlesque and parody written by M.R. Nair (1903-1943) deserve mention in this connection.

The first quarter of the 20th century witnessed the proliferation of distorted imitations of English novels and poems. Most of the models belonged to the early romantic period of English literature. This tendency brought about a stagnation in Malayalam prose–writing which was still in its formative period. It was at this stage that A. Balakrishna Pillai (1889-1960) came forward to guide the younger creative writers towards a meaningful assimilation of the new trends in European literature. He was able to introduce into Malayalam a number of movements like realism and symbolism. In his book reviews and introductions to the works of other writers he tried to analyse the new literary forms and put them in perspective. He also wrote books containing definitions and illustrations of western literary concepts and movements, the best example being Rupamanjari. He used to classify literary works quite dispassionately on the basis of objective definitions without attempting to assess their aesthetic, psychological or sociological effects. Malayalam literature is very much indebted to him for the widening of its horizons and for the growth of realism in fiction and drama. Under his influence, the adoption of western literary forms acquired a meaning and a purpose. But his exclusive preoccupation with definitions and classifications has indirectly encouraged less imaginative writers to be satisfied with the mechanical application of such definitions both in creative writing and in criticism. He confined himself to technical criticism and naturally some of his writings have been collected under that title.

Kuttikrishna Marar (1900-1973) and Joseph Mundasseri (1903-1977) were two of the most effective critics after Balakrishna Pillai. They represent two categories of the scholars of those days who developed vastly different approaches to literature after having started as the products of the same tradition inherited from Sanskrit. A common desire to integrate the Indian and western approaches and to emphasise the essential unity of the values inherent in great literary works of all ages made their contributions complementary to each other. At the same time Mundasseri differed from Marar substantially in his outlook. Initially, he viewed literature as an aesthetic creation rooted in the realities of life experienced by man as an individual. Later, he became interested in evaluating literature on the basis of its immediate sociological value and in appearing as the champion of a cause, social or literary. This preoccupation with the sociological aspect of literature did not make him lose sight of its aesthetic aspect. But in his work entitled Rupabhadrata he projected the aesthetic perfection of literary works as something different from the merit of their contents. On the other hand, Kuttikrishna Marar viewed these two aspects of literature as inseparable. He stuck to his original view that literature is an aesthetic recreation of the experiences of human life. He accepted the motto 'art is life itself' and gave that title to a collection of his critical writings. He preferred to judge literary works on the basis of their 'bhavasilpas' or internal structures. Both Mundasseri and Marar dealt mainly with the ethical value and the most conspicuous elements of literature like the plot, characterisation, ideas and ideals and did not pay much attention to subtler elements like imagery.

Kuttipuzha Krishna Pillai (1900-1971) was a supporter of the progressive literature movement. He attached importance to the sociological content of literature and evaluated it on the basis of the message conveyed by it. His opinions were based on the western approach. M.P. Paul (1904-1952) was a product of modern education in English literature and was one of the leading members of the progressive literature movement. But surprisingly, he respected the Indian tradition in art and literature, valued the aesthetic aspect of literary works and held balanced views on all the relevant topics. His writings include those on style, on the sense of beauty and the structure of the novel and the short story.

Apart for Kuttikrishna Marar, a few other writers also continued to cherish the traditional values of literature. They recognised the tradition from the period of neo–classicism to that of the semi-romantic poetry of Vallattol and Ulloor and the adoption of new literary forms like the romance. Still they favoured the retention of some of the traditional elements in contemporary literature. M.R. Nair (1903-1943) usually known by his pen–name 'Sanjayan' and K. Bhaskaran Nair (b. 1913) extolled the poems of Ulloor while P.Damodaran Pillai (b. 1907) valued the earlier poems of Vallattol for the above reason. All these critics were opposed to the concept of 'progressive literature' in varying degrees. But their views did not carry conviction in the changed circumstances.

The forties of the 20th century witnessed a substantial expansion of literary criticism in Malayalam. It received liberal encouragement from many quarters, especially from periodicals. Naturally a number of new writers entered the field. Most of them were products of the new literary atmosphere conditioned by western influence. At the same time a few also retained their links with the past. An important development of this period was the growth of a semi–academic type of appreciative criticism. A large section of the new critics avoided sharp controversies. Among them U. Govindankutti Nair (1906-1966) tried to evaluate contemporary works in a dispassionate manner on the basis of generally accepted principles. S. Guptan Nair (b. 1919) introduced to the readers many writers and classics of world literature and interpreted the new trends in Malayalam from an academic point of view. His balanced approach is evident even in his attempts to channel the new trends along the more acceptable lines. K.M. George specialised in objective criticism, literary surveys and comparative studies of various literature. K.N Ezuttacchan and K.M. Daniel (b. 1920) contributed to academic criticism. Others like S.K. Nayar (b. 1917) and Vakkam Abdul Khadar (b. 1912) wrote literary articles and treatises on matters of contemporary relevance. Murkottu Kunnappa (b. 1905) was one of the few writers who attempted a criticism of literary criticism. N. Krishna Pillai (b. 1918) also wrote on comtemporary trends and creative works with an academic interest; but unlike the other academicians he has expressed strong opinions in favour of or against particular trends. There are a few others who follow the path of Mundasseri and utilise criticism as a means of giving a new direction to creative literature. This group includes some prominent writers who have made outstanding contributions to academic criticism. N.V. Krishna Varier (b. 1916) who has written an elaborate treatise on poetic style in the form of an introduction to the study of Vallattol's poems, has also advocated a planned effort to develop creative literature along particular lines. Sukumar Azhikkode, (b. 1926) the author of some of the best known treatises, on the work of recent poets is outspoken in his dislike of certain aspects of contemporary literature. M. Krishnan Nair (b. 1923), the only critic engaged in a regular survey of new writings, wields considerable influence on public opinion.

Another tendency which gathered strength in the forties was that of applying the concept of committed literature in criticism. Most of the writers who adopted this approach were associated with the Communist Party of India. They wanted creative writers to accept the Marxian interpretation of history, to align themselves with the revolutionary forces of the world and to subscribe to the idea of human progress through class struggle. They initiated the practice of interpreting and assessing each literary work in the light of the Marxian analysis of the socio-political set-up of the period. E.M.S. Nambuthiripad (b. 1909), M.S. Devadas (b. 1912), K. Damodaran (1912-1976) and V.T. Induchudan (b. 1919) were among the writers who laid the foundations of Marxian literary criticism in Malayalam.

From the beginning of the second half of the 20th century onwards there has been a general tendency among Malayalam writers for a reappraisal of the existing literary movements, a search for enduring literary values and a reorientation of all branches of literature. This tendency, strengthened by a growing knowledge of the new trends in western literature, has also been evident in literary criticism. At the same time ideologically motivated criticism had also its sphere of influence during this period. Pavanan (b. 1926 d. 1984), the Secretary of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi, P. Govinda Pillai (b. 1926), Tayattu Sankaran (b. 1926), A.P.P. Nambutiri (b. 1929), M.S. Menon, K.P. Saratchandran (b. 1941) and S.K. Vasantan are representatives of this school of criticism. A number of younger writers also have followed their footsteps. Some of the Marxian critics do recognise the creative value of any literary work irrespective of the sociological interpretation that may be given to its content. But all of them are Marxian intellectuals who believe that the ultimate value of literature depends on its contribution to human progress which, according to them, is possible only through the struggle of the organised working class against the reactionary forces. The growth of sociological criticism has directly or indirectly induced all creative writers to aim at a meaningful and effective portrayal of social life. Many of the Marxian critics are content with merely restating their sociological approach and rigidly applying it in the assessment of creative writings. A comprehensive system of Marxian aesthetics is yet to develop in Malayalam.

The majority of new critics who attained prominence in the fifties asserted their individuality. At the same time they tried to assimilate the modern concepts of literature and principles of literary criticism which had emerged in the west. They were called upon to interpret diverse literary movements and to provide the reader with a new sense of values. All these necessitated intensive efforts to understand the processes of literary creation and enjoyment with reference to the changes which were taking place in human life. Adequate knowledge of the different theories of literature and specialisation in particular fields became inevitable. Criticism could no longer be confined to the application of a single set of rigid principles. The age of super critics also came to an end.

C.J. Thomas (1918-1960), one of the new writers who had made their presence felt in the late forties, started the process of revolutionising the sense of values. He was a rebel endowed with a fine sensibility and a rare spirit of dedication. Even though he was an advocate of realism, he had utter contempt for everything superficial and mediocre. Therefore he encouraged the really creative and brave new attempts to depict the undercurrents of life. One of his collections of essays is entitled Dhikkariyute Katal (The Quintessence of the Rebel.) All the new critics who came after C.J. Thomas were not so much concerned with the revolutionary aspect of literary creation. The attitude of most of them was conditioned by the trends which were predominant in contemporary literature.

Writers like Sukumar Azhikkode (b. 1926), M. Lilavati (b. 1929), M.K. Sanu (b. 1929) and P.K. Balakrishnan (b. 1927) tried to discover the characteristic features of the works of individual writers and to evaluate them against that background. Lilavati's Varnaraji (The Spectrum), Sukumar's Asante Sitakavyam (Asan's poem on Sita) and Balkrishnan's books on Chantu Menon and Asan are some of the noteworthy results of this quest. M.V. Vijayan and Lilavati tried to apply modern psychology in analysing the works of poets like Vailoppilli and Changampuzha M. Achutan (b. 1930) and K.M. Tarakan (1930) contributed to the growth of theoretical criticism through their books on western aesthetic theories. Along with Lilavati they also tried to define and survey different literary movements. K.P. Sankaran's (b. 1939) efforts to evolve a new type of appreciative criticism are also important. M.P. Sankunni Nair (b. 1917) conducted indepth studies of a number of poems. K. Surendran (b. 1921) and P.K. Balakrishan studied the poetical works of 'Asan' against the background of his biography. K. Raghavan Pillai (b. 1920), Chemmanam Chakko (b. 1926), M.P. Panikkar (b. 1928), Akavur Narayanam (b. 1929), K. Ramachandran Nair (b. 1930), P.V. Velayudhan Pillai (b. 1931), V.S. Sarma (b. 1936), George Irumpayam (b. 1938), George Onakkur (b. 1941), and K.M. Prabhakara Varier are some of the other writers who contributed to the growth of academic criticism in the new context.

Recently academic criticism has begun to acquire new dimensions through the writings of critics like M.K. Sanu, K. Ayyappa Panikkar (b. 1930), K.S. Narayana Pillai (b. 1931), Thomas Mathew (b. 1940), M.M. Bashir (b. 1940), and Rajakrishnan who try to apply the test of modern sensibility in the study of individual authors, their works and literary movements. Sanu's monographs on poems like Trupatam nuttantinte Itihasam, study of the novel Ummaccu, Narayana Pillai's study of poet Channampula, Bashir's interpretation of the poems of O.N.V. Kurup and Rajakrishnan's analysis of the poems of Madhavan Ayyappat are a few examples of this type of criticism. Studies of various elements of literature like imagery and style are the other contributions of these writers.

With the growth of modernism in Malayalam poetry, fiction and drama in the course of the sixties, some critics like Ayyappa Paniker, Narayana Pillai and Thomas Matthew ventured to explain the essential features of the new movement from an aesthetic point of view stressing its inherent, though hidden, links with the inevitability of a change in the writer's sensibility. Another school of criticism represented by Narendraprasad and a few creative writers, projected modernism as a bold new venture of the young writers who have acquired the correct vision of life and art after discarding the remnants of romanticism and mechanical realism. A few other writers like M. Gangadharan and K.P. Appan have welcomed modernism on similar, but not identical, grounds. Recently some of the younger writers like Sachidanandan (b. 1946) and B. Rajivan have tried to give a new definition to modernism, making it an integral part of the latest movement for socio-political revolution. On the other hand, most of the critics who are inclined towards romanticism and realism vehemently oppose the concept of modernism. This conflict of opinions has developed to such an extent as to disturb the whole literary atmosphere.

Literary criticism was promoted by certain literary organisations and periodicals. Kavita Samiti an organisation established for the promotion of poetry in 1952, the C.J. Thomas Memorial Committee and the Kuttikrishna Marar Memorial Committee have compiled useful papers of literary criticism. Mangalodayam, a monthly published from Trichur for many years, Kerala Kavita, a quarterly devoted to the development of poetry, Samiksha, Bhasaposini and the periodical publications of the Kerala University the Sahitya Parishad and the Sahitya Akademi have also contributed to literary criticism.

From the time of A.R. Rajaraja Varma onwards many writers have shown interest in literary research and in the preparation of histories of literature. Besides, Sahityapanchanana and Ulloor, many others like R. Narayana Panikkar (1889-1959), Krishna Pisharodi and Chalanattu Achuta Menon were engaged in literary research in the first quarter of the 20th century. Their work was carried forward by Suranatu Kunnan Pillai, Ilamkulam Kunnan Pillai (1904-1973) P.K. Narayana Pillai (b. 1910), K. Raghavan Pillai (b. 1920) and K.M. George. Further work in this field has been taken up by scholars attached to the Universities of Kerala. Ulloor, Narayana Panikkar, Krishna Pisharodi, Achuta Menon, A.D. Harisharma (1896-1972), P.K. Parameswaran Nair (b. 1903) and N. Krishna Pillai are among those who wrote histories of literature. The separate histories of prose literature and poetry published by T.M. Chummar (b. 1889) and the exclusive histories of poetry (by Lilavati), Novel (by K.M. Tarakan) and Drama (by G. Sankara Pillai b. 1930) brought out by the Sahitya Akademi are the other important works of this kind.

Most of the critical writings in Malayalam are devoted to the discussion of poetry. O. Antappai wrote a survey of the earliest form of dramatic literature in the language. Later, A.D. Harisharma produced a book consisting of definitions of the dramatic forms and concepts adopted from Sanskrit. Mekkolla Parameswaran Pillai introduced the readers to the various forms of western drama. Kattumatam Narayanan (b. 1932) is the author of a comprehensive book on the evolution of Malayalam drama. Uyarunna Yavanika (Rising Curtain) by C.J. Thomas is another survey of this branch of literature with particular emphasis on the development of the stage. This field of criticism has received attention from some of the writers like G. Sankara Pillai, Kavalam Narayana Panikkar (b. 1928), and Ayyappa Paniker. Among those who undertook exclusive studies of Malayalam fiction, are M.P. Paul, P.K. Balakrishnan, M.Achutan, K.M. Tarakan, T.N. Jayachandran and K.P. Saratchandran.

In the course of the 20th century many scholars tried to interpret the aesthetic theories of ancient India for the new generation of readers. Through their writings Malayalam literary criticism has retained its links with the traditional Indian aesthetic theories in modern times. Many books have been written on western aesthetics also. For example, Vedabandhu has tried to explain the aesthetic theories of ancient Greek scholars through the translation of selected passages supplemented by short comments. M. Achutan and K.M. Tharakan have produced two separate volumes containing short explanations of most of the important aesthetic theories which originated in Europe. The aesthetic aspect of modernism became a subject of controversy in the third quarter of the 20th century, and prompted many critics to study literature from the theoritical point of view as well.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Balakrishna Pillai, Sanketika Nirupanangal, (Mangalodayam, Trichur, 1957); A.R. Rajaraja Varma, Bhasabhusanam S.P.C.S., (Kottayam 1902); Joseph Mundasseri, Kavya Pithika, (Mangalodayam, Trichur, 1957); K.M. George, A.R. Rajaraja Varma (English), Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, 1979; Kuttikrishna Marar, Kala Jivitam tanne, (Navakerala, Kozhikkode, 1965; M. Achutan, Paschatya Sahitya Darsanam (S.P.C.S., Kottayam, 1962); M.M. Bashir (compiled) Navinakavita, (National Book Stall, Kottayam, 1969), M.S. Menon, (compiled) Nirupanam Malayalattil, (Current Books Trichur, 1968); N. Krishna Pillai, Kairaliyute Katha, (S.P. Co-operative Society, Kottayam, 1956); Ullor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala Sahitya Charitam Vol. 1–5, (University of Kerala, Trivandrum, 1953-1957), Vimarsanam Malayalattil, (Marar Symposium, Navakerala, Kozhikkode, 1961).

K.S.N.P.

CRITICISM (Marathi) as such did not come into existence until the advent of the British rule. It is well known that the medieval Marathi poets from Mukundraj–Jnaneshvar to Sridhar–Moropant have borrowed their material extensively from Sanskrit classics, and yet not even one of them had ever tried to enunciate the fundamental tenets of Sanskrit Kavya Shastra (poetics). Sanskrit Kavya Shastra, derived from Bharata's Natyashastra and enriched by literary thinkers like Dandi, Bhamaha, Vamana, right down to Anandvardhana, Abhinavagupta and Jagannatha should have provided a sort of critical background for such poets. But it was not to be.

The Marathi encyclopaedist S.V. Ketkar has written a research thesis Maharastriyanche Kavya Parikshana (1928) in which, after a studious resume of the Marathi literature until the dawn of 19th century, he has come to the conclusion that the whole literature covering about 600 years does not give any kind of evidence pertaining to literary criticism. The later poets like Morpant may pay homage to the earlier masters, but even then they did not mention one single characteristic of literature, which can be attributed to even one of the master's greatness as a poet. The earlier masters like Jnaneshvar for instance must have been well-versed in Kavyashastra and some of them, again like Jnaneshvar have often referred to the concept of Rasa, but that too very loosely. The poet Jnaneshvar says in his Bhavartha-Dipika that his favourite Gita-Bhashya will supersede even Sringara, the foremost Rasa; and a poet like Raghunath Pandit later on exploits the same Sringara Rasa for a simile, saying that Nala, the hero of his epic, shone like Sringara among the nine Rasas. Both the poets held rightly that Sringara was 'Rasaraja'. But neither of these great poets turned his attention to drama, which was the repository of all the Rasas. Hence it can be safely surmised that the medieval literature does not take into account any kind of literary criticism. The same period is covered by M.G. Deshmukh's Marathiche Sahitya-Shastra (1940), which distinguishes Marathi criticism from that of Sanskrit.

Even after the advent of the British rule it took a few decades for the Marathi writers to come to grips with literary criticism. When Dadoba. Panduranga prepared his Yasoda Chintamani, (1865) a critique of Moropant's Shoka-Kekavali, he composed a treatise, which attempted to bring out the literary beauties inherent in Moropant's lyrical composition. But when the author offered his work to the members of the Dakshina Prize Committee he met with a very strong opposition with regard to his interpretation of the Kekavali. Eminent scholars like Krishnashastri Chiplunkar maintained, that Moropant himself was not a poet of very high order and Justice Ranade vehemently argued, that Moropant took undue liberaties with the concept of god head. Chiplunkar's illustrious son Vishnushastri, a few decades afterwards wrote a extensive treatise on Moropant as a poet, in which he had to argue with his distinguished father about the merits and demerits of the poet's work. This controversy, which dealt with the various aspects of literary criticism, started sometime in the later half of the last century and was carried on into the next century and many critics like Hansa and Modak participated in it. Thus Yashoda Chintaman provided an impetus for some kind of literary criticism.

Vishnushastri Chiplunkar was perhaps the first critic, who analysed the merits and demerits of the Sanskrit classics, and in his Sanskrit Kavi panchak his keen sense of appreciation and appraisal of the great Sanskrit poets is evident. He pays rich tribute to the Sanskrit classics, enumerating their glorious qualities, but at the same time he has also drawn attention to some trends in the Sanskrit classics, which deserve some censure. For instance, he has the courage to find faults with Kalidasa's Ritusamhara saying boldly that his descriptions of the various seasons offer merely a traditional catalogue of each season's peculiarities mentioning at the same time that even the great Kalidasa did not observe the natural cycles first hand and was content with the traditional account, His appraisals of Kalidasa's plays and the Meghaduta are remarkable for their wise and shrewd observations pertaining to their literary merits. While Vishnushastri was busy with his criticism of Sanskrit classics, another critic, equally wise and shrewd K.B. Marathe was busy with the criticism of the contemporary novel and drama. His short essay on the novel and the drama entitled Naval Va Natak (1872) lays bare the faults apparent in the two forms and censures the defects inherent in the contemporary novel and drama. Chiplunkar had also written some intelligent reviews of contemporary plays like Thorale Madhavrao Peshave, Jayapala and Manorama. His essay on Lokahitvadi (1880) turned out to be controversial in the end and later on a pretty long thesis on Moropant's poetic works, also raised quite a storm over his estimate of Moropant. But in the meantime he had written two very valuable essays on the right approach towards poetry and literary criticism, which form the nucleus of the modern literary thought.

This period however is not marked by any contribution towards poetics, critics only felt happy enumerating the Sanskrit Alankaras. Before the end of the last century Justice Ranade had written an erudite resume of contemporary literature, one is 1865 and the other in 1898. Ranade's latter Note on the Growth of Marathi literature was inspired by the thought of creating some suitable atmosphere for the study of Marathi literature in the Bombay University. Moropant's Shloka. Kekavali had primarily generated an enthusiasm for literary criticism some-time in the latter half of the last century and the end of the century saw the publication of S.V. Paranjape's criticial appreciation of the same work in 1896. The controversy over Moropant's poetic works was carried on to the next century and critics like Pangarkar, B.A. Bhide and Banahatti wrote their books on the same issue.

The dawn of the 20th century gave an impetus to the discussion of some controversial problems pertaining to the theoretical approach towards literature. The main problem concerned seems to be the primary object of literature, and some eminent literary thinkers like S.K. Kolhatkar, H.N. Apte, N.C. Kelkar, Vaman Malhar Joshi and N.S. Phadke have time and again turned towards the consideration of the same problem: What constitutes literature and what motivates the creation of literature? Each one of them has maintained that the primary object of literature is to provide entertainment, but each one of them at the same time appears to be confused when he comes to think of the political and social problems of the time as reflected in contemporary literature. Each one of them seems to suggest that entertainment may be the primary object of literature but consideration of the didactic message in any literary work may enhance its value. All these learned thinkers, it appears, echo the gist of what Tolstoy had laid down in his thesis: What is Art? All of them lay stress on the primary object of entertainment, but when they come to brass-tacks, they forget the fundamental object and seem to say that political or social implications should also be taken into consideration. This kind of confused thinking about the fundamental issues of literary criticism lessens to a great extent the salutary effect of what they have to say. These thinkers seem to say that entertainment should be and in fact is the primary object of literature, but there are social and moral issues to be considered. All of them feel that all literature should and must follow the tenets of Truth, Goodness and Beauty, but they find it rather difficult to dissolve the inherent conflict of the three concepts. The important point to note is that such thinkers like Joshi and Phadke and of the later days Mardhekar have dealt with the very issue in their own ways and not one of them has avoided it. Each one of them has faced the issue boldly with competence and skill to match but the resulting controversy seems to be inevitable.

It appears that the path of literary criticism did never run smooth anywhere for various reasons. With Marathi literary criticism the ascent over the path was rather difficult, because it had to face two different and somewhat conflicting theories of literature. One was the theory of literature as enunicated in the Sanskrit poetics, and other as enunciated in the European poetics. This was the dilemma, which could not be confronted easily.

In the first place, the Marathi critics were not completely coversant with Sanskrit poetics. R.S. Jog did some service to Marathi criticism, when he published his Abhinava Kavya Prakasha (1930) which was followed by D.K. Kelkar's Kavyalochana (1931). In 1942 appeared K.N. Vatve's Rasa Vimarsha and Jog composed a literary treatise Saundaryashodha Ani Anandbodha in 1943. G.T. Deshpande brought out his Sanskrit Sahitya Shastra in 1957. Marathi literary criticism had to wait till 1957 for the translation of Aristotle's Poetics by G.V. Karandikar.

In the meantime B.S. Mardhekar had been busy writing his essays in literary criticism, which were posthumously collected in a volume called Saundarya Ani Sahitya (1955). Mardhekar was well acquainted with the norms of contemporary literary thought of the western thinkers, and his essays in literary criticism provided a stepping stone which led to the understanding of modern concepts of literary criticism.

While such books, dealing with ancient and modern theories of literature were in the making, N.C. Kelkar and V.M. Joshi were writing several penetrating essays dealing with a variety of literary problems. N.S. Phadke's Pratibha Sadhan (1931) did not care much to consult ancient or modern literary theoriticians, hence his book for sometime came to be considered as a sort of landmark. Pratibha Sadhan was the first work of some magnitude to deal with the theoretical as well as formal aspects of literature. It dealt with several modern forms of literature like the novel, the drama, the short story, and later on the personal essay. It is rather curious to note that Phadke failed to take any cognisance of poetry in a treatise which presumed to deal with Pratibha or inspiration

The Marxist approach towards literature also found its voice in Lalji Pendse's Sahitya Ani Samaj-Jivan (1935). The Marxist approach towards literature was later on incorporated in several essays and books written by P.Y. Deshpande, D.K. Bedekar, G.B. Sardar, N.B. Phatak and such others.

Marathi literary criticism in its initial stage was bound to face many obstacles. In the first place, medieval Marathi literature for centuries together was devotion oriented, and it had practically lost all contact with the ancient Sanskrit poetics, which was mainly related to the twin forms of the drama and the epic, but the medieval Marathi literature was not at all concerned with these two forms. Then during the period of transition, from the end of the Maratha rule and establishment of the British domination, there was quite a lull in Marathi literature. It was then that the Marathi writers became conscious of English literature and its various forms like the lyric, the novel, the drama, the short story, the personal essay, the biography and the autobiography. Marathi writers then started to compose their works either in translation or in imitation of such various forms. But then there were no guidelines to work upon. Naturally creative Marathi writer was faced with a dilemma. For instance Kirloskar in 1880 composed his play Shakuntala, which had a reference to the traditional Sanskrit drama. But then after a lapse of two years when he turned to original composition and created a master-piece Saubhadra, he had to take resort to what he called the English Rasas. In the meantime he must have felt, that the ancient Rasa-theory was not adequate enough for his new undertaking, and hence he referred to the (non-existent) English Rasas. What he meant thereby was simply that the ancient Sanskrit Rasa theory could not be applied to his original work. The same was true about other kinds of creative works in the various forms of literature. A poet like Keshavsut had to define his approach towards the new kind of poetic compositions he had undertaken without any reference to the ancient traditional Sanskrit approach towards poetry. So it was in the fitness of things, that the literary thinkers had to acquaint themselves with ancient Sanskrit and modern European theories of litertature.

It is rather interesting to note that the Marathi critics of literature were also a bit confused when they undertook the review of contemporary literary works. This kind of confusion is apparent in the reviews of various books in different genres. For instance, reviewer like S.K. Kolhatkar, while reviewing the dramatic works like Saubhadra (1903) and Totayache Banda (1914) had to discuss certain conflicting norms, both ancient and modern. When a novel or a play was to be considered, very often the social aspect of such works assumed paramount importance, at the cost of aesthetic appraisal. A glaring instance of such a confused approach can be evidenced in the contemporary reviews of a discursive novel like Vaman Malhar Joshi's Ragini. The novel is replete with countless irrelevant discussions of various controversial topics, cultural, national, religious, social and educational and the life. The contemporary critics extolled the philosophical aspect of such irrelevant digressions, and failed to consider the aesthetic aspect of the novel. If a certain novel or play was concerned with some contemporary issues like child-marriage, dowry, female education or some such issue, the critics felt, that it deserved all attention and the aesthetic valuation was completely ignored. Later on when formalist critics like Mardhekar came to hold ground, they undertook to inspect and examine each word in a poetic piece, but failed to evaluate the total impact of the composition itself. Likewise the Marxist critics argued about the politics, social aspect inherent in a novel or play, and consequently ignored the aesthetic approach. This kind of confusion among the literary critics is evident throughout the annals of Marathi criticism. The outlook towards any kind of literary composition is bound to be subjective and entirely dependent on the personality of the critic, and hence literary criticism everywhere has to face some kind of difficulty of this sort. Intelligent criticism is not rare. What is rare is total criticism which considers all the aspects of a given work of art. There is for instance an eminent critic like Srikrishna Keshav Kshirsagar who calls himself a romantic and his criticism is tinged with his romantic approach. The same can be said about the Marxist interpreters of Marathi literature like Muktibodh whose stress is mainly on political and social upheaval. They tend to forget about the aesthetic appraisal. Even a distinguished critic like D.K. Bedekar finds fault with Mardhekar's poetry, simply because its approach is pessimistic, for the simple reason that the Marxist approach must be optimistic. Even well-known critics like W.L. Kulkarni of the new school find themselves helpless, when they have to deal with theoritical concepts concerning the relationship of truth, goddness and beauty. However all this goes to prove that the present Marathi criticism is very much alive. There are thus various schools of literary criticism and their competent exponents.

Literary criticism is not however the prerogative of the so called literary critics only. When eminent historians of Marathi literature prepare their monumental literary histories, they not only jot down but also interprete the facts and interpretation has to grapple with astute criticism of facts. Literary historians of the calibre of V.L. Bhave and D.K. Kelkar when they undertake the task of writing the literary history of a particular period have to be literary critics of a very high order. Their histories are marked with critical estimates of the writers and their works, and these critical estimates are worthy of seasoned literary critics. Kusumavati Deshpande and Narhar Kurundkar have dealt with Marathi novel, S.N. Banhatti with the earlier Marathi drama and Ram Kolarkar with the short story. They reveal themselves in such histories as competent literary critics. Banhatti's Natyacharya Deval is an exemplary work of its kind, wherein the author has done full justice to the genius who was Deval. Such histories or biographical studies can offer fine specimens of literary criticism.

Literary criticism is not restricted to the theoretical aspect of evaluation and its application to literature. The theory of literature undertakes to enumerate and discuss the problems pertaining to literature, and yet irrespective of the theoretical knowledge may hope to achieve an evaluation of a given literary work, which may transcend the norms of criticism to become a work of art. There are multiple and more often than not conflicting theories of criticism and modern Marathi literary thought is concerned more with the philosophical aspects of aesthetics. Formerly there was only the Rasa theory to contend with, while thinkers like B.S. Mardhekar and later on R.B. Patankar and Prabhakar Padhye have blazed new trails across the horizon of literary criticism, which are likely to move away from literature towards other disciplines of thought. Applied criticism, faced with the turmoil of such conflicting theories, is likely to be baffled and confused these days.

M.M.

CRITICISM (Nepali) began with Motiram Bhatta (1866-96). The publication of his Kavi Bhanubhaktacharyaka Jiwan Charitra (1891) achieved a three-fold objective. It brought the life and works of Bhanubhakta to light, it elucidated the distinctive quality of Bhanubhakta's poetry and it enunciated certain poetic principles. His Jiwan Charitra was no biographical criticism. He adapted for himself the poetic principles as are found in the Kavya-mimamsa of Rajshekhar.

Shambhuprasad Dhungal (1884–1929) wrote an essay in literary criticism, Kavitako Phal, probably the first of its kind, in 1920. It surveys the Nepali literary scene and attempts to estimate the achievements of Bhanubhakta, Motiram, Rajivalochan, Laxmidatta, Gopinath and Lekhnath.

Suryabikram Gewali (b. 1898) published in 1922 his essay Naivedya Samalochana, (a critical study of Dharanidhar Sharma's poetical collection Naivedya) in the Janma-bhumi which he edited from Benaras. It was followed by Nepali Sahityakashka Dui Nava Tara (Two new Stars in the Nepali literary Firmament) published in the Nepali Sahitya Sammelan Patrika in 1931. His many introductions and prefaces to books also carried his literary views. He was an impressionist given to moralism too.

Baburam Acharya (1888-1971), a historian and scholar, opted for studying literary works objectively. His historical and sociological knowledge enabled him to place and study the early Nepali poets in their chronological order and also to conduct textual analysis of their writings. Tulanatmak Sundarkanda (a comparative study of the two Sundarkandas by Bhanubhakta Acharya and Raghunath Pokhrel, 1945) and Purana Kavi Ra Kavita (The old Poets and their Poems, 1946) are his two works in this genre.

There were (and still are) also other competent critics and their contributions are not at all negligible. Only some of the outstanding ones are being mentioned here.

Yadunath Khanal (b. 1913) tries to suitably apply the eastern and the western critical principles to literary works as the case demands. Samalochanako Siddhanta (Theories of Criticism, 1946) and Sahityik Charcha (Literary Discussions, 1977) are his two books.

Ratnadhwaj Joshi (b. 1916) has published several volumes of critical writings of which the more important ones are Nepali Sahityako Bhumika (A Preface to Nepali Literature, 1959), Adhunik Nepali Sahityako Jhalak (Glimpses of modern Nepali Literature, 1964), Nepali Kathako Katha (The Story of Nepali short Stories, 1969) and Nepali Natakko Itihas (A History of Nepali Drama, 1980). He is good when he blends the historical and the comparative methods of study.

Ramkrishna Sharma (b.1921) considers evaluation to be the critic's main function. He values a work for its literary merit and for its historical role. Sapta Sharadiya (Seven essays earlier published in the Sharada, 1967), Dash Gorkha (Ten essays earlier published in the Gorkha, 1969) and Table Gaph: Nau Baithak (Table Talks: Nine Sittings, 1970) are his collections of critical writings.

Ishwar Baral (b. 1923) pursues research and a historical evalution of literary works and trends. He has compiled and edited three important collections of Nepali essays, poems and short stories. Akhyanko Udbhav (The Birth of Fiction, 1982) shows him as inclining towards a text based criticism.

Krishnachandra Singh Pradhan (b. 1925) refrains from studying any work in isolation and insists upon reviewing it against the relevant literary background. This enables him to properly understand the work and interpret it with generosity. His critical works include Kavi Byathit Ra Tinko Kavya Sadhana (Byathit and his Poetic Discipline, 1958), Nepali Upanyas Ra Upanyaskar (Nepali Novels and Novelists, 1980) and Sirjanaka Serofero (The creative Periphery, 1983).

Taranath Sharma (b. 1924) who has adopted no particular approach to criticism rather pens his vigorous reactions that he experiences in an encounter with any literary work. His works include Ghotlyaiharu (Ponderings, 1964), Bhanubhaktadekhi Tesro Ayamsamma (From Bhanubhakta to third dimensional Writing, 1970), Sama Ra Samaka Kriti (Sama and his Works, 1971), Nepali Sahityako Itihas (A History of Nepali Literature, 1970) and some more.

Basudev Tripathi (b. 1942) writes interpretative criticism often adhering to the literary principles of the writer studied. Sinhavalokan (A general Survey, 1970), Vicharan (Excursion, 1971), Sahityakar Pahalman Singh Swarko Punarmulyankan (A Revaluation of Pahalman Singh Swar, 1976) and Lekhnath Paudyalko Kavitwako Vishleshan Tatha Mulyankan (An Evaluation of Lekhnath as a poet, 1977) are his principal critical works.

Indra Bahadur Rai (b. 1947) attemps at an interdisciplinary study of literary works. His critical works include Tipeka Tippaniharu (Comments, 1966), Nepali Upanyaska Adharharu (Bases of Nepali Novel 1974), Sandarbhama Ishwar Ballavka Kavita (Referentially, Poems of Ishwar Ballav, 1976), Sahityako Apaharan (An Abduction of Literature, 1983) and Darjilingma Nepali Natakko Ardhashatabdi (Half a Century of Nepali Drama in Darjeeling, 1984).

Mohanraj Sharma (b. 1940), Dayaram Shreshtha 'Sambhav' (b. 1943) and Abhi Subedi (b. 1945) have amongst them made a promising beginning of the stylistical and the semiotic criticisms in Nepali literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Abhi Subedi, Nepali Literature: Background and History, 1980., Dayaram Shreshtha and Mohanraj Sharma, Nepali Sahityako Sankshipta Itihas, 1977., Krishna Chandra Singh Pradhan (ed.), Sajha Samalochana, 1968., Kumar Pradhan, A History of Nepali Literature, 1984., Taranath Sharma, Nepali Sahityako Itihas, 1970.

C.R.

CRITICISM (Oriya) evolved and developed along with the creation and progress of modern Oriya literature. The modern Oriya literature originated in the later half of the 19th century because of the impact of the western culture and literature on the educated class. The educated youth of the period were highly impressed by the wealth of literary treasures of the western world and began to write a number of essays, poems, short stories, novels and dramas on western model. A by-product of this new trend was a tendency to review and evaluate the earlier and new literature and thus a new genre, that of criticism was born. Earliest criticism was promoted by the periodicals.

In ancient Oriya literature commentaries written on reputed works and metaphysical interpretations of reputed literary pieces are also available. For example the poem Keshaba Koili by Markanda Das was re-interpreted by Jagannath Das in his Artha Koili bringing out its metaphysical significance. A commentary on Lavanyabati of Upendra Bhanja was written by Lokanath. These may be taken as predecessors to the literary criticism which assumed its modern form in the 19th century periodicals.

In 1873 the first monthly Oriya magazine Utkal Darpana was published. This magazine acted as the torch-bearer for modern Oriya literature. It published the writings of the contemporary authors.

In 1869 Oriya text books were introduced for the first time in Cuttack Normal School. Gradually this practice spread to other institutions and a suitable atmosphere for the growth of Oriya literature and criticism was created. Though the influence of the Bengali literature on Oriya writing continued, efforts were made to maintain the individuality of the Oriya literature. The newspapers, periodicals and magazines which contributed to this effort were Utkal Dipika (1866), Utkal Darpana (1873), Utkal Hitaishani (1873), Odia O Navasambada (1888), Sambalpur Hitaishani (1889), Utkal Prabha (1891), Utkal Sahitya (1898) and Alochana (1900). The result was that the Oriya literature became purified in the use of its vocabulary and beautified by novel styles of composition. Simultaneously popular modes of prevalent language were being introduced into Oriya literature. Besides these, information about writers and criticism on their writings were also being regularly published. The literature in the form of criticism prevalent in the 19th century can be broadly put under five heads:- 1) Discussion on Oriya literature and language in general. 2) Evaluation of textbooks. 3) Review of contemporary literary works. 4) Comparative study of ancient literature and modern Oriya literature specially of Upendra Bhanja and Radhanath. 5) Composition of the history of Oriya literature.

Gourishankar Ray through his editorials and leading articles in Utkal Dipika propounded the cause of Oriya literature. A series of criticism and counter criticism were published in the magazine Utkal Sahitya on the language used in the dramas written by Gourachandra Dev of Paralakhemidi, Ramashankar and Jaganmohan Lala of Cuttack.

A discussion on ancient literature versus modern literature was carried on during this time. Upendra Bhanja represented the ancient literature and Radhanath Ray represented modern literature. While Utkal Dipika, Sambada Bahika and Indradhanu supported the cause of the former, the Utkal Madhupa, Utkal Prabha, Bijuli and Utkal Sahitya supported the cause of the latter.

Towards the later part of this century attempts were made to write the history of Oriya literature. W.W. Hunter was the forerunner of the research work for the building up of the history of Oriya literature. Hunter published a list of Oriya poets in the journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. This list was not very accurate but it inspired others to work in this direction and ultimately to bring out authentic histories on different aspects of this literature. In Utkal Prabha a series of articles were published under the heading Prachina Kavinka Brittanta (Life and works of the ancient poets). In these articles Upendra Bhanja, Dinakrishna Das, Abhimanyu Samanta Singhar, Bishwanath Khuntia, Lokanath Vidyadhar and Krishnachandra Singh found place. The next attempt made in this direction was the article on language and literature by M.M. Chakravarty published in the journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal. This article on Oriya literature was a source of information and a work of inspiration for giving a critical account of the literature.

In the magazine Utkal Putra Pyarimohan published an essay where he pointed out the defects inherent in ancient Oriya literature and recorded his appreciation of the modern. In Navasambada (13-2-1887) there appeared a criticism on the drama Sati of Jaganmohan Lal, the first dramatist of Oriya literature. His first drama Babaji was compared with Sati and the improvement of the latter over the former was discussed in this article. In its issue of 16.6.1887 Navasambada published a critical discussion on the writings of Jagannath Das and Upendra Bhanja under the heading 'Kavita O Kavi'. In the issue of 14-7-1887 of this magazine a discussion on the work of poet Dinakrishna was published and in the issue of 17-11-1887 a similar discussion was published on Nandikeshwari and Chandra Bhaga. In later years the magazine Navasambada was amalgamated with the magazine Odia which became a very powerful vehicle of socio-cultural movement of Orissa. This magazine took upon itself the responsiblity of revealing the different aspects of Oriya literature and a series of articles were published regularly on different topics. Some of the pieces of this series are: 'Odia Bhasha' (4-4-1888), 'Kalikala' of Ramashankar (11-4-1888), 'Upendra Bhanja' (16-1-1889), 'Rama Banabasa' of Ramashankar (31-8-1892) and 'Odia Nataka O Mancha' (6-1-1909). The other works which received similiar treatment in this magazine were the novel Bibasini of Ramashankar, the poem 'Tulsi Stabaka' and 'Parvati Kavya' of Radhanath Ray. Another magazine which did yeoman's work in this respect was Utkal Prabha (1893). Of the many articles that appeared in this magazine, the most noteworthy was that on Upendra Bhanja written by Lala Ramanarayana which inspired a prolonged debate among the men of letters of the period.

The second phase of literary criticism may be taken to have extended from 1900 to 1947. During this period the magazines that played active roles in the development and progress of this form of literature are Utkal Sahitya, Mukur, Satyabadi, Jugabani, Sahakar, Nababharata, etc. The emergence of literary associations and periodical discussions conducted by them also helped a lot in this direction. The most reputed among such organisations was 'Utkal Sahitya Samaja'. While the first phase of this branch of literature was marked by enthusiasm and emotion, the second phase was marked by maturity, tolerance, logicality and coherence. During the first two decades of the 20th century stalwarts of critical literature, like Shyamasundar Rajguru, Gopinath Nanda, Mrityunjay Rath, Tarinicharan Rath, Nilakantha Das and Binayak Mishra had their roles to play. Their contributions to a scientific analysis of the Oriya language and literature both ancient and modern, to the systematic presentation of their history and to the critical appreciation of the literary wealth of the language is enormous. It was at this time that a comparative and scholarly study of the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata written in Oriya language was made. The Sarala Mahabharata received such a critical treatment at the hands of Gopinath Nanda and Mrityunjaya Rath. Bharata Darpana of Gopinath Nanda and Sarala Charita of Mrityunjaya Rath may be taken as informative and valuable commentaries on the Sarala Mahabharata. The discussions by Shyamasundar Rajguru on the writers and their works, on the epics and Kavya age of Oriya literature in his book Prabandhabali are remarkably of a very high order. The value of two essays of Mrityunjay Rath on the devotional literature cannot be over-estimated. The contribution of Nilakantha Das in his writings on Indian religions and Orissan culture, on the literature of Sarala Das and Upendra Bhanja is unparalleled. His writings are distinguished by erudition, comparative study and logical reasoning.

A research association named 'Prachisamity' was formed under the leadership of Artaballava Mohanty during the third decade of this century. The contribution of this association towards enriching the critical literature is great. It edited and published a very large number of rare books. It not only discovered many such valuable works but after due investigation and adequate research reprinted those with scholarly prefaces. The most remarkable contributions of this association centre round 1) Pre-Sarala literature, 2) Sarala literature, 3) Post-Sarala literature, 4) Literature of the Pancha Shakha period, 5) Pre-Bhanja Literature, 6) Bhanja and Post Bhanja literature, 7) Literature on Mahima religion and 8) Literature of the inscriptions and Padavali. The worth and importance of these for any research worker on Oriya literature cannot be over-estimated. Artaballava Mohanty had an analytic mind and a love for accuracy and precision. So his contribution is not only authentic but also specific. This period was also marked by experimentation on the technique. Girijasankar Ray followed the Western techniques examining the Oriya dramas and manner of expression. Among others who had also tried the same method of criticism with the works on religion, culture, literature and politics are Jagabandhu Singh, Jalandhara Dev, Krishnaprasad Choudhury, Birupaksha Kar, Bhagaban Pati, Nabakishore Das, Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Sarala Devi and Jagadananda Mohanty. Thus it may be seen that besides the Prachi group, the Satyabadi group and the Sabuja group of writers also co-operated in the development of Oriya literature in the sphere of criticism.

The post-independence period may be reckoned as the third phase of Oriya critical literature. There was again a revival of journalistic contribution to the cause of critical literature. A number of magazines e.g. Dagaroo, Jhankar, Nabarabi, Ashantakali, Samabesh, Konarka, Jibana-Ranga, Diganta and Manasa published many valuable essays devoted to criticism. Special issues of Dagaroo, Diganta, Istahar and Mulyana were very often published in order to bring to light different aspects of the literature of different modes, periods, trends and subjects. During this period many books were written and published with the purpose of highlighting the life and works of individual writers like Sarala Das, Jagannath Das, Upendra Bhanja, Dinakrishna Das and Abhimanyu Samanta Singhar, Radhanath Ray, Madhusudana Rao, Fakirmohan Senapati, Gangadhar Meher, Nandakishore Bala, Kuntalakumari Sabata, Gopabandhu Das, Nilkantha Das, Godavarish Mishra and Godavarish Mohapatra. Literary conferences started to be held to commemorate the birth anniversaries of literary luminaries, where different aspects of their achievements were discussed and souvenirs brought out.

A notable feature of this phase was the interest taken by a number of research workers to study, evaluate and write out critical histories of the different periods of Oriya literature. This work was started in the pre-independence period by Tarinicharan Rath, Aparna Pradhan, Binayak Mishra and Jagabandhu Singh. Some of the notable writers on this theme in the post independence period are Mayadhar Mansingh, Suryanarayan Das, Surendra Mohanty, Banshidhar Mohanty, Pothani Patnaik, Brindabanchandra Acharya, and Devendra Mohanty. These writers have not treated the history of Oriya literature as a descriptive account of the authors and their works chronologically arranged ; they have rather tried to show the impact of the prevalent cultural, social and religious trends on literature and the influence of the literature on these trends.

In recent years a wave of enthusiasm is noticeable among the teachers of Oriya language and literature to bring out research works and this has enriched the critical literature in very many ways. Earlier Karunakar Kar and Kunjabehari Das had started this tradition which has been kept alive by Benimadhaba Pardhi, Natabar Samant Ray, Gopalachandra Mishra, Bichitrananda Mohanty, Banshidhar Mohanty, Dolagovinda Shastry Krishnacharan Sehera, Narayan Satpathy, Krishnacharan Sahu, Kshyatrabasi Nayak, Dinabandhu Rath, Dhaneshwar Mohapatra, Shrinibas Mishra, Janakiballava Mohanty, Basudeb Sahu, Nagendranath Pradhan, Hemantakumar Das, Niladribhushan Harichandan, Ratnakar Chaini, Narendranath Mishra and Devendranath Mohanty etc. Gradually more and more scholars having research abilities have been entering the field.

Among the writers whose devoted endeavour has contributed quite a lot to the progress and refinement of critical literature are Surendra Mohanty, Sarbeshwar Das, Chittaranjan Das, Sachchitananda Routray, Chintamoni Behera, Benudhar Rout, Pathani Patnaik, Gangadhar Bala, Asit Kavi, Baishnabacharan Samal, Krishnachandra Panigrahi, Narendra Mishra, Natabar Samant Ray, Gourikumar Brahma, Birakishore Das, Debiprasanna Patnaik, Prahlada Pradhan, Janaki Mohanty, Krishnacharan Sahu, Sachidananda Mishra, Nilamoni Mishra, Umacharan Pujari, Brindabanchandra Acharya, Ananta Padmanav Patnaik and Khageshwor Mahapatra.

A spurt of enthusiasm has been exhibited by a group of youthful Oriya writers who have written a number of modern poems and absurd dramas. This has necessitated long prefaces by the writers themselves partly to explain what they have written and partly to justify the existence of such writings in Oriya literature. This has increased the volume of critical literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asit Kavi, Odia Prabandha Sahityar Ithias, 1978., Dagaroo, July-August, 1956., Pathani Patnaik, Sahitya O Samskriti, 1979., Utkal Sahitya Samaja Souvenir, 1972.

P.P.

CRITICISM (Punjabi). Hafiz Barkhurdar of the 17th century is considered to be the first critic of Punjabi literature, who gave expression in his 'kissa', to some critical utterances regarding the poet Pilu who preceded him. He has all the praise for Pilu's poetic excellence. Hamid of the 18th century expressed his gratitude for the preceding poets who wrote the 'kissa' of Hir before him. But real critical faculty got its proper expression with Ahmadyar (1768-1845). He is a critic who passed his judgements consciously on most of his preceding kissa poets. His attitude is both appreciative and critical. He has all the praise for Hafiz Barkhurdar, Pilu, Mughal, Waris Shah and Hashim. But he is very critical about Hamid and does not recognise him as a poet. Inspite of extolling the poetic qualities of Waris Shah and Hashim, he points out their defect of inconsistency. According to him Waris Shah has not expressed his poetic excellence consistently in his Hir. In his view Hashim could not touch those poetic heights in his kissa, Shirin Farhad, which he had exhibited in Sassi. His sincerity and high standard of criticism can be gauged from the fact that he considers himself a much inferior poet to Waris Shah. He himself admits without any reservation that in spite of the fact that he has spent about fifty years in writing so many kissas in Punjabi, he has not been able to achieve that poetic excellence in any of his compositions, which Waris Shah has exhibited by writing only one kissa of Hir. In fact Ahmadyar is our first real critic, who has clearly given the proof of this deep understanding, correct formulation and complete objectivity.

But it took many more decades for criticism to establish itself as a distinct developed genre in Punjabi literature. During the first few decades of the 20th century, Bawa Budh Singh through his three memorable works–Hans Chog, Koil Ku Bamhia Bol–and Maula Baksh Kushta through Punjab de Hire did a yeoman's service by making available unknown material, ascertaining their authorship and authenticity, with brief biographical sketches of their composers and expressing appreciative comments on their literary contributions. This was a sort of laudable spadework for the successive critics to judge these works in their proper perspective.

By this time the influence of western literature on the writings of Punjabi authors was visible about half a century had passed since the establishment of Punjab University at Lahore (the first institution of its kind in the province). Stalwarts like Teja Singh had appeared on the literary stage who, as an encouragement and guidance to the budding Punjabi writers, wrote introductions to their maiden literary attempts.

The historical approach to Punjabi literary criticism was given by Mohan Singh 'Diwana', who for his doctoral degree wrote and published the first History of Punjabi Literature (1933) in English and later on in Punjabi under the title of Punjabi Adab di Mukhtsar Tarikh. He introduced to Punjabi readers a large number of manuscripts, which were hitherto unknown to them. Diwana inspired others to pursue literary criticism with seriousness, severity and scholarship. Gopal Singh, Surinder Singh Kohli, Parminder Singh and Kirpal Singh Kasel, and others followed his historical approach with some deviation and improvement.

The literary and critical views expressed by Sohan Singh 'Josh' and Hira Singh 'Dard', in the form of introductions to certain books, paved the way for the emergence of Marxist interpretation of literature. Sant Singh Sekhon, through his Sahitarath expounded the fundamentals of Marxist theory of literature. Kishan Singh's contradictions of Sekhon's views about Punjabi literature and his own elaborations through his book Sahitya di Samjh further clarified and explained the Marxist theory of literature. In this way an attempt was made to establish Marxian School of Punjabi criticism. Many other writers such as Surinder Singh Narula, Kulbir Singh 'Kaang', Najjam Husain of Pakistan contributed their mite to strengthen this approach to literature.

This led to a progressive movement in Punjabi literature and creative literature by Mohan Singh and Amrita Pritam was written accordingly. Attar Singh in his Darshtikon and Mohinder Dhingra in his Punjabi-Hindi Kahani Tulnatmak Adhiyan discussed different aspects of Progressivism in Punjabi literature. According to Jasbir Singh Ahluwalia, Punjabi criticism gained in four ways by virtue of the role played by Sant Singh Sekhon and other Marxian critics. It came to acquire a new footing; provided a historical perspective to the Amrita and Mohan Singh tradition; brought in a radical re-orientation in the leitmotif and raisond 'etre of literature.... Fourthly the Sekhon dhara stressed the purposive/tendentious role of the artist hag-ridden by the complex of social responsibility which differentiated him as a progressive artist."

Side by side with the Marxian school of criticism established by Sekhon, there appeared appreciative criticism purely based on the literary merits of the works. These critics took guidance and inspiration from western literature. Teja Singh (Sahitya Darshan), Gopal Singh (Romantic Punjabi Kavi), Surinder Singh Kohli (Punjabi Sahitya Vastu te Vichar), Roshan Lal Ahuja (Sahitya Shastar), Attar Singh (Darishtikon), Harbans Singh (Aspects of Punjabi Literature), Gurcharan Singh 'Arshi' (Sahitya Samikhya), etc. were the main protagonists of this tendency.

Pre-commitment of the author to a set of ideas and ideology, narrow scope of life-considerations, and opposing forces led this Marxian school of thought to lose its hold on Punjabi readers in course of time.

With the pioneering efforts of Jasbir Singh Ahluwalia and his followers, a new trend in Punjabi criticism appeared commonly known as Experimentalism or New Criticism. Comparing the Marxian criticism with New criticism, Ahluwalia observes that the Marxian critic employs the historicist methodology for the purpose of analysing the historical role of literature of a period; but for the new critic reference is not a one-way predetermining complex. Further the new dhara is materialist in the sense that it does not consider reality as of the nature of or product of idea ... But for the new critic, in the human context, reality is not a reflection of merely the economic base of society ... The New criticism stresses the creative and cognitive character of the artistic activity whereas the Sekhon tradition placed emphasis upon its reflective nature." But due to the laxity, ineffective and inoperative efforts of its protagonists, this New Criticism had its natural death even in its infancy.

Under the guidance of Harbhajan Singh (Adhian te Adhiapan, Mul te Mulankan, Rachana-Sanrachna), a new type of criticism known as the structural criticism came into being in the annals of Punjabi literature. Its main followers are Tarlok Singh and Atamjit Singh (Sabitaki). They got this inspiration and information after studying the works of Roland Barthes and A.R. Greimas and propagated it as Delhi University's School of Criticism. Structuralism was introduced to Punjabi criticism at a time, when it had already been rejected in the West. In the words of Jonathan Culler, it is true that in its early stages structuralism envisaged the possibility of a 'literary system' which would assign a structural description to each text; but this, which is the only proposal that would justify talk of literary compentence, is now regarded as an error. Texts can be read in many ways; each text contains within itself the possibility of an infinite set of structures, and to privilege some by setting up a system of rules is a blatantly prescriptive and ideological move. This school of criticism had a very short life to live.

Modern age is an age of specialization. Literature has profusely expanded into many genres. For doing proper justice to different forms of literature, it was considered advisable by modern literary critics to specialize in one or two genres. This trend of specialization is also visible in Punjabi criticism.

On Punjabi poetry laudable work has been done by such eminent critics as Gopal Singh, Sant Singh Sekhon, S.S. Amole, Harnam Singh Shan, Dewan Singh, Attar Singh, Satinder Singh 'Noor', Harjinder Singh Dhillon, etc. Regarding the collection of scattered folkloric material and its proper evaluation, commendable efforts have been made by Sohinder Singh Wanjara Bedi (Lok Dhara ate Sahitya, Lok Dhara Vishav Kosh and Karnail Singh Thind (Lokyaan ate Madhkalin Punjabi Sahitya).

On Punjabi prose, critics like S.S. Kohli (Puratan Punjabi Vartak), Pritam Singh (Paras Bhag), Piar Singh (Shambhu Nath Wali Jana Patri Babe Nanak JiKi or Audh Sakhiyan), Tarlochan Singh Bedi (Punjabi Vartak da Alochanatmak Adhiyan), Kirpal Singh Kasel (Adhunik Gadkar), etc. have done commendable work.

Short story is the special forte of Punjabi genius in which they have excelled. Surinder Singh Uppal was the first critic who studied this genre of short story for his doctoral degree under the title of Punjabi Short Story–Its Origin and Development. In the words of Khushwant Singh, the chief merit of Surinder Singh Uppal's thesis is that he has interlarded it copiously with best examples of the genre of short story with which he is dealing. Uppal was followed by Dalip Kaur Tiwana and Gurbux Singh Frank. Uppal's other popular book is Punjabi Kahanikar (first published in 1954 and subsequently in 1970). Gurcharan Singh wrote Punjabi Galapkar. Gurmukh Singh 'Jeet' contributed Samkali Punjabi Kahani and Balbir Singh 'Dil' gave Punjabi Kahani de Vikas to Punjabi readers.

Critics on Punjabi novel have not lagged behind. Jaswant Singh 'Rahi' (Punjabi Novel) studied this form of fiction for his doctoral degree. Niranjan Tasnim wrote two valuable books-Punjabi Novel da Alochnatmak Adhiyan and Punjabi Novel da Muhandra. Surinder Singh Uppal's book Punjabi Novel–Vidhi te Vichar was warmly received by scholars and students alike.

In the field of drama, Gurcharan Singh, Gurdial Singh 'Phul' and Atamjit Singh have studied this genre critically and in a scholarly manner.

In the end it can be said that whatever modern Punjabi critics have said theoratically, is mainly under the immediate impact of western literary theories. They have applied these foreign formulations and ideologies to original Punjabi writings with objectivity, sincerity and understanding.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.S. Rattan, Tin Novel (Sahyug, 1983)., Jasbir Singh Ahluwalia, Punjabi Literature in Perspective., Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics.

S.S.U.

CRITICISM (Rajasthani) What was handed down to us as the old Sanskrit hertiage, was the form of commentaries known as Tika, Avachuri, Darpana, Bhasya etc. which, though occasionally carried casual critical remarks, were mere explanatory notes to serve as paraphrased translation to understand and appreciate the text, and cannot pass as criticism in the modern sense of the term. Moreover, even such commentaries were very rare and only two or three instances such as Veli Krishna Rukmini Ri, Vamsa Bhaskara etc. are known, which too are more of translations than commentaries in details. Some anecdotes and verses of appreciation of eminent literary books and authors, eulogising their literary achievements, have of course been preserved, but these too can hardly be counted as literary criticism.

Criticism on the lines of English and Hindi criticism was introduced when by research in their studies of oriental texts. L.P. Tessitori did so in his editorial prefaces and other articles. This tradition was further enriched by scholars, like Bikaner Parika Suryakarana, Thakura Ramasingha, Swami Narottama Dasa in the editorial introductions to Veli Krishna Rukmini Ri, Dhola Maru ra Duha and Rajasthana Ra Lokagita. Suryakarana also contributed independent articles on criticism of old texts in prose and poetry. His critical study of folk songs was very well received in literary circles.

A critical study of modern Rajasthani literature by Kirana Nahata deserves special mention. (Rajasthani Bhash Sahitya Sangama.) With a view to projecting certain poets, a study based on personal interviews was made under the title, Hemani edited by Tejasingha and others.

Raw.S.

CRITICISM (Sanskrit). Since the earliest literature in Vedic language is religious and the premier epics are at once poetic as well as didactic, embodying historico-mythological elements, tradition usually regards Valmiki's Ramayana as the first kavya proper. It contains perhaps later layers of interpolated matter; yet its kernel is at least as old as 400 B.C. Already, by the time of Patanjali (150 B.C.) we know that several poetic and dramatic compositions as well as prose romances had been written in Sanskrit, since this great grammarian alludes to them.

Epigraphical evidence of this period also confirms this. It also shows that concepts like gunas (literary qualities) and alamkaras (figures of speech) had already been formulated. Unfortunately, like the first specimens of Sanskrit literature, the first specimens of literary criticism also have been lost. The earliest book which has come down to us is Bharata's Natyashastra, an encyclopaedia of theorisings on drama, music, acting, dance, prosody and, incidentally, poetry. It is also a work which has different layers of materials rubricated into the text at different times; but even so, it is pre-Kalidasan (200 B.C.–200 A.D.).

Although practical literary criticism of individual poems and plays is not come across till the 9th century A.D., literary theory was systematically developed in several handbooks by various writers in Sanskrit. They not only summarise the chief requirements of plays and various genres of poetry like the art-epic, short poem, prose tale and chronicle, but also discuss such general questions as the nature of poetry, the making of a poet, the value of poetry, the differentia which marks it off from scientific writing and the causes for the success or failure of a poetic composition. With a penchant for nice distinctions and classifications, the Indian theorists developed such crucial concepts as rasa, guna-dosha, alamkara, riti, dhvani, vakrokti and auchitya to illumine the 'soul' of poetry; these ancient attempts at disengaging the essence of poetry remind us often of similar modern attempts in the West. What deserves particular mention is the fact that all these concepts are inter-related and should not be considered in isolation. They all possess a common ground for a philosophical view of man and nature on the one hand and a clear idea of the process of creative intuition (pratibha) in the poet and the cultivated or responsive critic alike. This basic fact is often missed when one surveys the field only from the historical perspective, looking upon each critical text as a handbook of merely rules of rhetoric.

The singular contribution of literary criticism in Sanskrit to the thought of the world is the concept of rasa as admitted by modern scholars of the East as well as the West. Its connotation is so vast that all translations of it have failed miserably to highlight it. In Sanskrit, the word rasa is so multi-vocal that it includes 'sap', 'essence', 'semen', 'juice', 'nectar', 'intoxicating drink of Soma', 'taste', 'flavour', 'mystic ecstasy', etc., in its semantic spectrum; and all these are involved in a smaller or greater measure in the connotation of the term 'rasa'. It is usually translated as emotion or sentiment which can hardly do justic to the original implication. It is the nucleus around which all the other literary concepts are made to revolve.

The rasa concept was first formulated by Bharata himself, mainly in relation to drama as presented on the stage. The playwright's composition creating a plot (itivritta), characters (patra), etc., his style (vritti) and technique as also the histrionic talents of the actors in a specially devised stage with dance, music and so forth are all said to spring from the whole and sole consideration of rasa. Though first formulated with reference to drama, the idea of rasa was soon adapted by theorists to the realm of poetry and several interpretations of the concept followed in successive centuries. These are all ably summed up in Abhinavagupta's commentary on the Natyashastra known as the Abhinavabharati (1000 A.D.).

While states of mind or feeling in life are both pleasant and unpleasant, the represented states of mind in drama are called bhavas because they shed their worldly associations in the witnessing spectators and become exclusively delightful. It is this act of 'tasting' on their part which entitles them to be called rasikas. A bhava itself comes to be called rasa when so tasted. Thus rasa in the singular is just the aesthetic experience, which is common to many spectators or readers who possess a taste for it.

The number of mental states or feelings, including psycho-physical responses, is stated to be 49; but all of them are not equally capable of rising to the high level of rasa, because of their changing nature. Only eight are selected among them by Bharata as deserving prominent development and called by the word sthayibhava (abiding mental state) as distinct from the others which are fluctuating (vyabhicharibhava). Now, a play is nothing but action of characters actuated by these sthayibhavas; their portrayal on the stage is only by way of their stimulants, accessories and results. These are termed respectively vibhavas, sanakarins or sancharins and anubhavas by Bharata. In poetry, they are described in suitably heightened language (varnana). Thus the critic tastes the delight of these eight primordial passions or rasas which are : 1. the erotic, 2. the heroic, 3. the pathetic, 4. the wondrous, 5. the comic, 6. the terrible, 7. the frightful and 8. the noxious. In poetry, Shanta or the tranquil can be ranked as a rasa. This theory explains the variety of themes possible in a play as well as in a poem; it helps to indicate the emotive types of heroes and heroines; it also points to the emotive use of language as the singular distinguishing feature of all poetry. It links itself with the creative intuition of the poet which catches it in a synoptic vision before embodying it in adequate poetic form; it also explains the nature of aesthetic response to poetry wherein depersonalization takes place, while empathy is established with objectified emotions; and the natural bliss (ananda) of the inner self is released, temporarily though, by the removal, for the nonce, of worldly self in action. It also leads naturally to the norm of 'unity of rasa' or one leading rasa admist a variety of subordinate rasas as explaining the secret of the success or failure of any given play or poem. In later times, the only significant work on dramaturgy was Dhananjaya's Dasharupaka (10th century).

The whole history of Sanskrit literary theory may be described as one continuous attempt at fixing the other ingredients of poetry in relation to rasa. Bharata himself had given the concepts of alamkaras (figures), gunas (merits) and doshas (flaws) in respect of shabda (sound or syntactic form) and artha (content). Later theorists, like Bhamaha, Dandin, Vamana, Udbhata and Rudrata (600-850 A.D.) who wrote exclusively on poetry, just refer us to Bharata about rasa and speak of their treatises as alamkaralakshana or kavyalamkara meaning thereby that they are formulating rules only about beauty in poetic form and content. In Sanskrit the term alamkara means both beauty (the suffix in the sense of bhava or state) and a means or turn of beauty or figure of speech (the suffix in the sense of karana or instrument). It is wrong to take it only in the latter sense as many have done today. That poetic language was deliberately made oblique by the poet was realised by one and all; and the various types of this obliquity (vakrokti) were distinguished by them under the heads of figures of sound like alliteration (anuprasa) and of sense like metaphor (rupaka). Certain inherent qualities like tenderness, harshness, etc., inherent in the very syllables as patterned into a diction by the poet (bandha) were called gunas like 'sweetness' (madhurya) and 'forcefulness' (ojas); and these were held to be at the root of distinct styles (marga or riti) like the Northern (Gaudiya) and Southern (Vaidarbha). These gunas are to be distinguished from others which are negations of blemishes and also called by the same term gunas. Since these early theorists mostly revel in minute subdivisions, typologies and classifications, without entering upon any thoughtful treatment of the philosophy of beauty, they are usually dismissed as rhetoricians. They often give their own ready-made illustrations instead of going to literature for their examples. Yet it would be ungenerous on our part to conclude that they did not have a working philosophy of beauty, however incohate.

We may now briefly review the outstanding contributions of each of the old theorists. Bhamaha's Kavyalamkara (600 A.D.), the oldest work on poetics proper, brings out forcefully the claims of literature to be regarded as the highest achievement of human intellect; it shows how, besides immediate delight, it also brings other incidental advantages like fame and riches for the poet and an easy insight into the various factors, ethical, practical and spiritual, which might make the reader's life richer and more meaningful. He expounds how the various figures of speech are much more than mere mechanical devices and serve as the most inevitable and cherished media for creative expression. A conscious slant (vakrokti) or hyperbolic turn (atishayokti) is at the very root of all poetic language. He records the different attempts of his predecessors in classifying them and gives some 38 in all, in place of Bharata's four. Apart from this, Bhamaha's contribution lies in his demarcating the provinces of logic and grammar from that of poetry and showing how poetic defects are not identical with logical and grammatical defects, but distinct from them, because of their aesthetic concern. Underlying his figures, one can discern today the principles of comparison, contrast, allegory, irony, ambiguity, implication, etc., which relate more to structure than analysis of tone or feeling.

The next writer of note is Dandin (700 A.D.) whose Kavyadarsha soon became such a standard work as to be adapted into several languages, like Kannada, Tamil and Singhalese. He shows a greater predilection for analysis of sound effects and verbal acrostics, devoting a whole chapter to it. He goes a step further than Bhamaha in dwelling at length upon the nature of styles (marga) and the qualities that distinguish them from each other. Though he differs from Bhamaha in minor details, his treatment of alamkaras is much the same. Yet he shows a flair for further subdivisions. He does not undertake any quest for the soul of poetry; and is content to regard rasas as well as gunas on a par with alamkaras.

But this exactly was seized upon for further investigation by the next theorist Vamana (750 A.D.) whose celebrated work is Kavyalamkarasutravritti. For the first time, he raised the question: 'What is the soul (atman) of poetry?'; and answered it by unerringly laying his finger on riti or distinctive diction which is shaped by divergent stylistic qualities (gunas). It emerges in his treatment how the different dictions or qualities are not isolated concepts but integral elements co-existing in a poem, and how they directly produce beauty which can only be enhanced by alamkaras. In this scientific analysis, rasas naturally get the higher status of gunas and cease to be termed alamkara. What is more, Vamana breaks new ground in illustrating all his precepts with examples from established poets. He also holds rightly that the drama is the finest flower of all literary forms, because it is made up of several art-forms. He has also an excursus on grammar wherein he tries to vindicate poetic usages which seemingly offend rules of grammar. He reduces the number of alamkaras to 30.

Udbhata, who was a contemporary of Vamana, is famous as the authoritative interpreter of Bhamaha and as an author of the compendium, Kavyalamkarasarasamgraha. Unfortunately, the former work, Bhamahavivarana is not fully available; even the fragments recovered recently are well nigh unreadable. Yet, he has the credit of first enunciating the Shanta (the tranquil) as the ninth rasa. He also shows new insight in his treatment of bhavas and rasas and in recognising their variant manifestations like semblances (abhasa), rise (udaya), cessation (shanti) and commingling (shabalata). That he wrote his own new poem Kumarasambhava to illustrate alamkaras is his unique distinction.

Rudrata (800 A.D.) also wrote a Kavyalamkara. But he formulated a principle of classifying the several alamkaras which came to be mostly accepted by succeeding writers. The four broad heads are: natural fact (vastava), hyperbolic fancy (atishaya), similitude (aupamya) and paronomasia (shlesha). In his extensive work of 16 sections, as many as four are devoted to rasa. He adds a fourth riti, viz., latiya and makes the use or unuse of samasas (compounds) the differentia of riti. He is the first writer to show how rasas and ritis are interrelated. Perhaps another Rudrata or Rudrabhatta (1050 A.D.) wrote the Shringaratilaka which is exclusively devoted to a treatment of the types of rasas, their accessories, heroes and heroines in love, etc., with telling illustrations. A third Rudrabhatta (1250 A.D.) is the author of a similar work, also exclusively on rasa. It is called Rasakalika. One unique doctrine of this author is that rasas may be pleasurable as well as painful (sukhaduhkhatmaka).

The celebrated poet and playwright Rajashekhara (900 A.D.) was also a literary critic who essayed for the first time what might be regarded as an encyclopaedia of literature. His work Kavyamimamsa is available only in part; only one out of his projected eighteen books is extant. But even this is a thesaurus of miscellaneous information, not to be had elsewhere. He narrates a legend how the babe poet was born, how he grew up into a youth and how he married the bride, sahityavidya or literary criticism. He mentions details about the diversity of poetic productions consequenced by varying forms of intuition, erudition and practice of poets. He vididly describes the sophisticated fashionable life conducive to a poet and the kind of life a cultured king should lead, with leisure for enjoying the fine arts. He expatiates on the art of poetry-recitation and makes witty remarks on regional variations. He is the first writer to give a classified account of plagiarism and also the virgin field of poetic conventions (kavisamayas). Additionally he has given a comprehensive picture of the various sources from which a poet has to draw, before venturing upon versification. These include geography, cosmography and all the arts and sciences of his day.

An eclectic writer Bhoja (11th century) remains off the beat in spite of two massive works that he wrote, Sarasvatikanthabharana and Shringaraprakasha. Both are voluminous and derive material from diverse sources, though without even a remote connection with poetry as such. He advocates a new thesis that the self-regarding ego is at the root of all rasas; and the word shringara signifies this focal or primary rasa (essence only and not love); hence he would admit many more mental states as derivative rasas. His classifications are more complicated and his examples most copious.

The realization of the merits as well as defects of early authors is best evidenced by the first and foremost poet-philosopher Anandavardhana (9th century) who accepts all the detailed findings of the early normative theorists except under the count of rasa for which he found it necessary to add a new semantic explanation. The ancient had accorded rasa and bhava also a place under alamkara or guna. That would not emphasize the key role of rasa as it would be on a par with other poetic devices. Hence he formulated the first principles of a new criticism in which rasa could come into its own. He propounded a new philosophy of poetic language as well. His epoch-making finding is known as dhvani or suggestion. Meaning suggested is always more intrinsic than meaning stated in poetry; and rasa cannot be evoked in any other way but by suggestion. What applies to rasa is true of all mental states which form the soul or life-essence of poetry. Beauty of such rasa makes poetry first-rate, when the other beauties of structure and diction are overshadowed by it; if the latter should outshine the former, then beauty becomes next best because intellectual talent scores over spontaneous intuition.

The credit of reducing these literary norms to practical application also goes to Anandavardhana. He showed for the first time how every unit in literature–syllable, word, suffix, pronoun, conjunction, etc., sentence, episode and the whole work shine best when the propriety of rasa is dully observed; and how succession of conflicting rasas should be dexterously avoided and harmony of rasas preserved. In a lively and closely reasoned language he has shown how the leading rasa of the Ramayana is the pathetic, while that of the Mahabharata is the tranquil. He established the credo that the world of poetry is autonomous and that its supreme authority is the poet. Hence he easily justifies the free innovations in story introduced by poets like Kalidasa in their masterpieces like the Shakuntala. In self-contained lyrics too, he could successfully show the core of rasa embellished by wit and diction.

The opposition against dhvani-theory spearheaded even by stalwarts like Bhattanayaka (10th century) and Mahimabhatta (11th century) died out because of the able defence by the great master Abhinavagupta (1025).

Till the advent of this illuminating dhvani-theory, literary criticism meant only traditional obiter dicta, such as :

> Bhasa is the Muse's smile winsome, > Kalidasa her grace handsome!
> or
> Kalidasa excels in simile smart
> Bharavi in deep meaning's art;
> Dandin's is the diction sweet,
> In Magha all the three do meet!

The path of a comprehensive literary theory accompanied by a sensitive and perceptive practical criticism blazed by Anandavardhana was widened by Kuntaka (970) in his Vakroktijivita. His theory embraced all the essentials of dhvani and went beyond it in recongnising even more numerous nuances and shades of poetic beauty under the wider concept of 'deviant expression' or vakrokti. He could succesfully attempt full-length analyses of all major plays and poems in Sanskrit up to his time. What is more, his criticism itself is creative and has a raciness and readability so rare in Sanskrit.

After Kuntaka, we step into the period of consolidation in place of original thinking. We have masterly textbook-writers like Mammata (1150) Vishvanatha (14th century) and Jagannatha (17th century) who systematized the theory in detail and codified the rules of rhetoric without any noteworthy contribution to practical criticism. Ruyyaka's Alamkarasarvasva (12th century) and Appaya Dikshita's Kuvalayananda (16th century) treat exclusively of figures.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Edwin Gerow, Indian Poetics, Otto Harrasowitz, Wiesbaden, 1977; K. Krishnamoorthy, Essays in Indian Criticism, Dharwad, 1964; S.K. De, Sanskrit Poetics; V. Raghavan and Nagendra, An Introduction to Indian Poetics, Madras, 1970; V. Raghavan, Bhoja's Shringaraprakasha, Madras, 1963.

K.Kr.

CRITICISM (Sindhi). The history of literary criticism in Sindhi is not as old as we find in other Indian regional languages. The earlier efforts in this genre were rightly directed to research criticism and one of the earliest works on this trend is Mirza Qalich Beg's (1853-1929) book entitled Shah Bhitaia jo Ahval (Account of Shah Abdul Latif). The trend was followed up but the real boost to the genre was provided by the Mushairas and Majlases, which were the order of the day, in which the poems read by the poets were evaluated threadbare. But the trend could gain momentum only in the beginning of the present century and a good crop of books on research criticism is available. The books on the critical study of the poetic works brought out during this period were Shah Bhitaia ji Hayati (Life of Shah Abdul Latif, 1915) and Sachal Sarmast (Sachal, the intoxicated, 1922) by Jethmal Parsram Gulrajani (1885-1954), Qurbu-Qalich (Love for Qalich) by Mohd. Siddiq Musafir (1879-1961). It may, however, be noted that the authors mentioned above never probed deep into the spiritual truths that the Sufi poetry contained and almost all of them remained satisfied dilating on the superficial aspects of the philosphic conents of the works. Apart from that, these books are devoid of critical and scientific methods that the genre demands of a critic/editor. The only book which was based upon the scientific research methodology was the edition of Shah Abdul Latif's poetry brought out in 1923 by Hotchand Moolchand Gurbuxani entitled Shah jo Risalo (Poetry of Shah).

The second and third editions followed in 1924 and 1931 respectively. The fourth and the last volume did not see the light of the day owing to the editor's death in 1947 and the Mss is considered to have been misplaced. The published volumes contain highly critical introduction, explantory and etymological notes and commentary which are the first examples of practical criticism in Sindhi. This introduction was later published as a separate book entitled Muqdamah Latifi which is considered a landmark in Sindhi literature. Since then about ten editions of Shah jo Rasalo have been published but none of these editions stands to comparison with the one edited by Gurbuxani. Two books entitled Karima jo Kalamu (Poetry of Shah Abdul Karim, 1937) and Abyat-e-Sindhi (Sindhi verses of Khwaja Muhammad Zaman, 1939) by Umar bin Muhammad Doudpota (1896-1958) can also be considered as good examples of literary research in Sindhi language. Another critical work on Shah's heroines was brought out by Naraindas Bhambhani entitled Shah joon Soormiyun (1944). But prior to the publication of this book, yet another work, a critical study of Shah Abdul Latif and his poetry by H.T. Sorely entitled Shah Abdul Latif of Bhit was published by the Oxford University Press in 1940.

After Independence the Sindhi critics in India could not keep pace with the progress made in the direction of research criticism due mainly to the nonavailability of source material. Even then, two remarkable works were brought out one each by Bhojraj Nagrani entitled Samia ja Saloka (Slokas of Sami in three volumes published in 1955, 1958 and 1967 respectively), Shah Abdul Latif, his Life and works (in English, 1975) by Motilal Jotwani and Qazi Qadana jo Kalamu (Poetry of Qazi Qadan, 1978) by Hiro Thakur. In addition to these, three more books were published on research criticism during the year 1984, entitled Sindhi Kahani Virhange Baid (Sindhi short story after the partition, 1984) by Kirat Babani, tracing the development of Sindhi short story after 1947 and Shah ain Sufi Mati (Shah and Sufism, 1984) by Jagdish Lachhani. Harumal Sadarangani 'Khadim', one of the master writers in Sindhi language, brought out a comparative study of Shah Abdul Latif entitled Kanwar Paaroon Paatar mein (The lotus has its roots deep, 1984). There is no doubt that his book is the result of diligence. His aproach is scholarly and very didactic, but the heavy severity of his style is relieved by illustrations from other Sindhi and Punjabi poets for comparison with those of Shah Abdul Latif whose life style and poetry he has so painstakingly analysed. This book is one of the excellent works in the field of research criticism.

Muhammad Siddiq Memon brought out two volumes on history of Sindhi literature one entitled Sindhi Adab ji tarikha (History of Sindhi literature, 1937) dealing with the development of Sindhi literature prior to the advent of the British rule in Sindh and the second entitled Tarikha Sindhi Adab (1951). In both the volumes the author's views generally appear to be biased against the Hindu authors. In the first volume the author fails in his efforts to distinguish between the literary works and those dealing with the Islamic theology and jurisprudence. Then again, he comments on two major Sindhi Hindu poets Sami (1730-1850) and Dalpat (1769-1849) in a superficial manner. Many Hindu authors have not been included in this volume. In the second volume, he talks more of the British government's effort to produce educational books in Sindhi than the literary works. Another book discussing the development of Sindhi poetry from the fourteenth century to the end of the nineteenth entitled Tazkirah-e-Lutfi was brought out in three volumes (1943, 1946, and 1953) by Lutf Allah Badvi (1904-1968). Here again, the author dwells more on the political history of Sindh and the Persain poets of Sindhi than on their impact on Sindhi poetry.

Mangharam Udharam Malkani (1896-1980) brought out a book Sindhi Nasra ji Tarikha (History of Sindhi prose, 1968) covering the Sindhi prose works published during the period 1843 to 1947. This history is very comprehensive and useful as a reference book. Sahitya Akademi brought out a book in English entitled History of Sindhi Literature (1970) by L.H. Ajwani. This history is an outstanding contribution to Sindhi literature and covers extensively all trends, and movements upto 1947. Murlidhar Kishinchand Jetali brought out a book entitled Sindhi Sahitya jo itihas (History of Sindhi literature, 1972) which contains a brief survey of Sindhi poetry and prose from the 8th century to 1970. There was yet another book briefly depicting growth of Sindhi literature genre-wise by Jagdish Lachhani entitled Sindhi Adaba ji Roop Rekha (1966). Popti Hiranandani brought out a book in English entitled History of Sindhi Literature (1984). The history traces the literary activities in the Sindhi language from 1947 to 1978. Dayal Asha brought out a book entitled Sindhi Shaira Ji Tarikha (History of Sindhi poetry, 1984).

After independence, a number of books on theoritical as well as textual criticism were published. The books worth mentioning are Bevas ain naon daur (Bevas and new age, 1970) by Arjan Mirchandani 'Shad', Sindhi Sahitya jo mukhtsar jaizo (Brief survey of Sindhi literature, 1980) by Mangharam Malkani, Tanqidi Mazmoona (critical essays 1985) by Popti Hiranandani, Okha Dokha (The probe) and Pehi Menjhi Paatar (a dive fathoms deep, 1985) both by Kirat Babani. The books on criticism Sindhi Kahani, Natak ain Tanguida (Sindhi short story, drama and criticism, 1981) by A.J. Uttam and Nataka Kala jo Vikas (Development of art of drama, 1983) by Jetho Lalwani are also worth mentioning. We have two books on criticism by Lal Pushp on short story which won critical acclaim. These are Kahani Kala Jo Vikas (Development of short story, 1972) and Drishti ain Darsini (Viewpoint and mirror, 1972). One of the master writers in Sindhi Tirth Basant, brought out a book Sahitya Saar (Essence of Literature, 1961) in which he discussed the elements of various genres of literature and Sahitya Sariji (Creation of Literature, 1978). Two other books that evince interest are Bevasja Panjviha poora, a comparative textual study of poetry of Bevas by Naraindas Sadhwani and Chhand Sugandh by Jhamatmal Bhavnani.

The 'new' literary criticism came to Sindhi literature with the publication of critical evaluation in the literary magazines of the collections of short stories, novels, poems etc, during the sixth decade of the present century. In a way, the monthly magazines like Sahitya Dhara and the Raabel published from Delhi during this period and Prahaphuti from Bombay, were responsible for strengthening the trend of 'new' literary criticism in Sindhi literature. The first book of modern criticism was brought out by Sahitya Dhara publications entitled Chetna (The consciousness, 1967). This was an anthology of selected pieces of practical criticism of works published during 1964-66 edited by Anand Khemani. Incidentally, Anand Khemani edited yet another anthology of essays of theory of various genres of literature entitled Sahitya ja Sidhanta (Principles of Literature, 1969). The articles were again contributed by the eminent scholars in the field. Later, Kalpana Kitab Ghar published Jidata jo Mafahoom ain Sindhi Kahani (Concept of modernity and Sindhi short story, 1975) by Hiro Shewkani and Sindhi Times publications brought out Jaizo (Evaluation, 1981) by the same author. At this stage the clouds of misconception about the new criticism seem to have cleared for the Sindhi ciritics and they very rightly thought that to pilot readers through the intellectual mine fields of literary criticism calls for a personality with more than the basic survival-kit of wide ranging intelligence, authority, personal charisma and an infectious enthusiasm for the subject. A cool and rational approach is essential, but an academic with no experience of the 'heat of the kitchen' would be a mere word-spinner, and anyone who has maintained a stance of total detachment form the literary problems would be less than a critic. The discussions on the scope and reach of literary criticism in Sindhi literature and the part played by it so far, started in the literary magazines, as a result of which two more important books on criticism were published. These were Satu Saar (The essence, 1980) by Param Abichandani and 40-80 (1984) by Harish Vaswani. While the former contains highly critical articles on philosophy and its impact on literature, definition of literary criticism, various forms used in literature, the latter contains the pieces of evaluations of various works published in literary magazines during the past years.

The criticism in Sindhi literature came of age in the sixth decade of the present century, and during this short span of time, the development of this genre has been more than satisfactory.

P.A.

CRITICISM: (Tamil) Tolkappiyam is an ancient book on grammar and other fields of Tamil language and literature. It may be said that Tolkappiyar, the author of Tolkappiyam (300 B.C.), is the originator of Tamil literary criticism. He had a clear perspective in framing the literary principles. The theories enunciated by him are found codified in the third part of Tolkappiyam.

The commentators of ancient Tamil literature may also be considered good critics. In their commentaries we can find the seeds of their own literary thoughts. The vision through which they saw literature and the methods by which they analysed works of literary art show the fact that fundamentally they are critics.

Modern Tamil literary criticism began in the first decade of the twentieth century and in that formative stage Tamil scholars had drawn their inspiration from the study of western literature.

In the history of Tamil criticism the first three or four decades of the 20th century may be called the period of the neo-classical criticism. V.G. Guruyanarayana Sastriyar (1870-1903) published his Natakaviyal ('A Treatise on Drama') in 1877. He compared the Tamil dramaturgy with those of Sanskrit and western languages and wrote his treatise to suit the modern period. Maraimalai Atikal (1876-1950) gave a new direction to contemporary criticism. His aim as a critic was to inclucate a sounder appreciation of literature by improving the standards and methods of criticism. His Mullaippattu-Araicchiyurai (A critical study of Mullaippattu,' 1903) is a fine example of criticism. It is an attempt at literary criticism on western lines and the author frankly admits his debt to the "able and profound critic Prof. William Minto", as also to "the grand views expressed on poetry by such great masters as Milton and Ruskin."

T. Celvakesavaraya Mudaliyar (1864-1921) is one of the pioneers of modern Tamil literary criticism. Primarily he was a good essayist and his two essays on 'Poetry' and 'Prose' contained in his Tamil Viyasankal (Tamil Essays) are more remarkable. He goes deeply into the nature of poetry and elaborately discusses the various elements of it.

V.V.S. Aiyar (1880-1925), who played a historic role in the freedom struggle, is one of the outstanding Tamil men of letters of this century. A critical study of Kambaramayanam is his magnum opus. As an erudite scholar in Tamil, English and Sanskrit, he was able to apply the cannons of western literary criticism and brought out the significant features of the epic. The Tamil version of the study came under the title, Kamba Ramayana Rasanai. He used the term 'Rasanai' to mean criticism.

T.K. Chidamparanatha Mudaliyar (1881-1954) shaped the artistic and poetic taste of his generation and this was his unique contribution to the literary world. We find in him the formalistic approach to literature. He was a passionate lover and admirer of rhythms and the mental image formed in the mind of the reader. He called this image, 'Bhavam'.

A. Muttusivan, a critic, was bent on developing critical literature in Tamil. He intelligently applied the fundamentals of English criticism to Tamil literature. In his book Asokavanam ('Asoka Forest' 1947), A.C. Bradley's conception of Shakespearean tragedy has been quintessentially interpreted in Tamil with adequate illustrations from Tamil classics. A. Srinivasa Raghavan's (1905-1975) Kaviya Arangil (In the arena of epics, 1956) is a study of some of the minor characters in Kambaramayanam. It is very much in V.V.S. Aiyar's tradition in criticism. But his method is more aesthetic than scientific. Following the lines of V.V.S. Aiyar, critics like R.S. Desikan (1900-1968), A.S. Gnanasambandan and others have produced a good number of books.

In the next phase of the development of Tamil literary criticism we find two great masters. They are T.P. Minakshisundaram and M. Varadarajan. T.P. Minakshisundaram is a good critic endowed with profound scholarship. As an author of many books on a variety of subjects, he may well be considered one of the makers of modern Tamil literary criticism. Kanal Vari ('Songs of Grove in the Sea-shore, 1959) and Kutimakkal Kappiyam ('The Epic of the People, 1961), are some of his remarkable books. He approached literature in the spirit of pure investigation and his assumption is that the laws of art should be discovered in the practice of the artist himself. He wrote almost commentary-like critical exposition. M. Varadarajan (1912-1974) was one of the academic critics. Ovacceyti (The Message of a Portrait, 1946) and Korikuter Valkkai ('The Life of Examining the Pollen of Flowers' 1956) stand prominently among his critical works. The former is an exhaustive and exhilarating study of a poem in Akananuru, while the latter treats one of the poems in Kuruntokai as a neat allegory to explain the poetic art, which, of course, the author of this poem perhaps could not have thought of.

The criticism of prose-fiction was born more or less simultaneously with the emergence of prose-fiction. P.S. Subramanya Aiyar is one of the pioneers in this field. In the last decade of the 19th century, he paid good attention towards the criticism of prose narratives. He has coined the technical terms 'Kunatola Vilakkam' and 'Chayilai' which mean criticism and style respectively. Only during the fifth and sixth decades of this century the criticism of prose-fiction found its development. K.N. Subramanyam (b. 1912), popularly known by his initials Ka. Na. Su.' and C.S. Chellappa have done some good work in this branch of study. In Ka. Na. Su's works we find his views of blending the western concept of 'Art for Art's sake' and the eastern philosophy. C.S. Chellappa who originally belonged to Ka. Na. Su's school of thought, differed from him, adopted his own method, 'Alasal Vimarsanam' or analytical method of criticism.

When the prose-fiction attained the new dimensions the criticism of prose-fiction also attained similar dimensions. M. Ramalingam's (b. 1940) Naval Ilakkiyam (Novel Literature, 1972), R. Dandayatam's (b. 1942), A Study of the Sociological Novels in Tamil (1976) and D.V. Virasami's Tamilil Samuka Navalkal ('Sociological Novel's in Tamil', 1978) are some of the remarkable works of this genre.

Of the present day critics of the progressive school K. Kailasapati holds an eminent position. He seeks to explain a work of art in terms of its social environment. He regards a literary work as a product of social factors and forces prevailing in a particular society at a particular time. Mention may also be made here of other critics like, T.M.C. Raghunathan (b. 1922), N. Vanamamalai and S. Sentilnatan. Having a strong conviction in the Marxist philosophy they are able to judge a work of art in its social context.

S.R. Markapantu Sarma is another remarkable critic who has made an indelible mark in the field of criticism. He comes from the school of Neo-Siticism. His critical studies on Silappatikaram show new frontiers in this field. Having assimilated eastern concepts and western ideas, he skillfully penetrates into the work and brings out the intrinsic values and immortal architectonics of Silappatikaram.In his critical works Silampin Pukkal. ('The Flowers of Silampu, 1962), Cilampin Kotikal ('The creapers of Silampu, 1963) he tries to show the new facets of critical art. His critical method is deeply influenced by A.C. Bradley and F.R. Lewis.

Comparative criticism seeks to evaluate a work by comparing it with other works of the same type either in ones own language or in other languages. S. Vaiyapuri Pillai (1891-1956) with an eye on world literature, insisted upon the importance of comparative study of literature. In his valuable work Kaviya Kalam (Age of Epics, 1952), in which we find the depth of his arguments, he appealed to the scholars to get into the comparative method. Seviyar S. Taninayakam's Nature Poetry in Tamil,(1953) is one of the pioneering works in this field. He compares Tamil nature poetry belonging to the classical period with the classical poetry in Sanskrit, Greek, Latin and English. Another important work in this field is Tamil Heroic Poetry (1968) written by K. Kailasapati (b. 1933), a native of Sri Lanka. The author has approached Sangam poems afresh by relating them to many important studies of heroic poetry in other languages, especially the Greek, which enabled him to place them in a proper perspective. The comparative method throws new light on a number of unsolved problems in the study of early Tamil poetry and makes a distinctive contribution to our understanding of the bards and bardic traditions of early times and their social function.

S. Ramakrishnan compares Kamban with Milton. His critical work Kambanum Miltanum (Kamban and Milton, 1960) attempts to evaluate the greatness of the two poets. Quite a good number of books have come out in this field S. Sankararaju Nayudu published his Comparative Study of Kamba-Ramayana and Tulsi Ramayana in 1979. K.D. Tirunavukkarasu's excellent critique Tirukkural Niti Iakkiyam ('Thirukkural as a Didactic Literature,' which was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1974) came out in 1971. Tamilannal's Oppilakkiya Arimukam ('An Introduction to the Study of Comparative Literature,' 1973) introduces the basic principles of comparative literature to the common readers.

Many books have been written on the history of Tamil literature so far, some of which have been introduced as the text books for students. Recetly M. Arunachalam has written a complete history of Tamil literature, of which more than 10 volumes have been published till 1981. In these volumes the author deals not only with the lives and dates of the poets but also gives critical assessment of their poetical works.

There are quite a good number of critics who have in some way or the other guided the readers and writers by their critical studies. K. Minakshisundarm, Salai Ilantiraiyam, C. Kanakasabapati and V. Svminatan deserve mention here.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A V. Subbiramaniya Aiyar; Tamil Araichiyin Valarchi (Madras, 1960); Chuvatu (ed.), Tamil Ilakkiya Vimarsakarkal (Pudukkottai 1979); R. Dantayutam, Tarkala Tamil Ilakkiyam (Madras 1974).

M.R.

CRITICISM (Telugu) is a recent development in Telugu literature that took place under the impact of western literary criticism.

There was no separate genre called literary criticism in Telugu. Naturally there were no literary critics as such. Many poets however, distinguished themselves as literary critics. A few introductory verses of their works by themselves would speak for their critical talent. Some of these verses were in the nature of tribute to ancient poets, while some others dealt with the literary outlook and attitudes of the poets themselves.

Nannaya Bhattaraka, the founder of classical Telugu poetry, observed in his Andhra Mahabharatam that while his poetry appealed to the common people because of its euphonic beauty, it was appreciated by the poets of the higher order for its intrinsic narrative excellence.

He also complimented the then existing academy of scholars, comparing it to a lake full of lotuses in full bloom spreading fragrance far and wide.

Nanneda, one of the leading ancient Telugu poets, in the opening chapter of his work *Kumarasambhavam,*set forth certain criteria for good poets and poetry. He also referred to the pseudo poets.

Later on, Sri Krishna Devaraya (16th century), the royal-poet, gave a new life to literary criticism by holding open discussions in the famous hall called ('Bhuvana Vijayam'), patronising poets coming from every nook and corner of the country.

Tradition says that once the royal-poet declared that he would present a gold anklet to a poet who was able to versify extempore with equal power the characteristics of poetry in pure Telugu and Sanskritic styles. But no poet could dare to come forward. When the Emperor was about to express his disappointment, Allasani Peddana, the most illustrious of the eight poet-laureates, stood up and recited impromptu thirty chaste versified lines, picturing the features of good poetry, the first fifteen in pure Telugu style and the remaining in Sanskritic style. The Emperor conferred on him the title 'Andhra Kavita Pitamaha' i.e. the founding father of Modern Telugu poetry.

Tenali Ramalinga Kavi, the youngest of the eight royal poets, was prominent for his ready wit and humour, which was sometimes too pungent to tolerate. His outbursts on poets and poetry delighted one and all in the auditorium.

Pingali Surana, a great poet who appeared later introduced new techniques in literary criticism. He described the significant features of poetry through the mouth-piece of characters in the story in appropriate context.

He also outlined his views on poetry through incidents in the story. Satina, one of the important characters of his work Kalapurnodayam,did not react to his wife in the way he should have, when she presented herself to him with over-ornamentation. But when she participated with him in the gardening work, divested of ornaments, there was a spontaneous and whole-hearted embrace. The poet seems to suggest through this incident that poetry should not be too ornamental at the sacrifice of natural beauty.

Suchimukhi, a royal swan, another important character in his work Prabhavati Pradyumanan,once exhibited in the royal court, the gold anklet presented to her by the Lord Brahman, engraved with the title 'Upama atisayokti Kama Dhenuvu' i.e. a desire-fulfilling Divine Cow for simile and hyperbole. This is a kind of satire on the prevailing type of poetry, bombastic and over saturated with figures of speech.

There were in Telugu literature, stray verses dealing with poets and poetry, of known and unknown authorship. We have got a verse popularly attributed to Allasani Peddana bringing forth vividly the idea that art consists in concealing art. The verse projects before us three distinct pictures, a Gujarati lady with fully covered breasts, a Dravidian lady with naked breasts and an Andhra lady with breasts party concealed. The poet alludes here, how good poetry should win the appreciation as in the last picture, by suggestion rather then by complete exposure.

Attempts were made by later scholars by placing before us certain guidelines pertaining to poetics, aesthetics, prosody and grammar, for appreciating good poetry and encouraging people to take to it. The first work of this kind in Telugu is Kavyalankara Chudamani, written by Vinnakota Peddana of the 14th century. Out of the nine chapters of the work, the seventh and eighth are on prosody, the ninth on grammar, and the rest on poetics and aesthetics.

This work is unique by itself. It divides poets into seven categories, according to the emphasis on form, content, or both and finally on the talent and erudition of poets.

Anatamatya's Rasabharanam and Ramarajabhushanam's Kavyalankara Sangraham are examples in this line. These were commented upon by scholars. Extensive research on these works is also carried on.

Avvari Subrahmanya Shastry, a poet and scholar, first attempted to translate Dandi's Kavyadarsa into Telugu verses. Afterwards Panchagnula Adinarayana Shastry rendered into Telugu prose, Rajasekhara's Kavyamimamsa. But the credit of rendering into Telugu prose, the Sanskrit literature on poetics and aesthetics in its entirety right from Bharata to Jagannath Pandit, goes to the erudite scholar Jammulamadaka Madhava Rama Sharma. All these works helped Telugu scholars and critics in applying Sanskritic theories of literature to Telugu literature. Vedala Tiruvengalacarya's application of the 'Theory of Dhwani' to Telugu literature deserves mention.

Commentary is a minute analysis of a poem. The first and the earliest of the comentaries now extant in Telugu is that of Muddaraju Ramana (17th century) on the complicated double entendre work Raghava-Pandaviyam of Pingali Surana. This however does not reach the heights of Mallinatha Suri.

Another scholar, Chitrakavi Anantamatya brought out a commentary on Harischandra Nalopakhyanam of Ramaraja Bhushana and on Amukta Malyada of Krishna Devaraya.

Ramaraja Bhushana's famous prabandham Vasu Charitra was commented upon by another scholar Vemulawada Somanatha Kavi. But all these commentaries receded into the background as they were eclipsed by the more exhaustive modern commentaries written by Vedam Venkata Raya Sastry glorified as 'Aparamallinatha Suri', Tanjanagaram Tevapperumallayya and others. Venkataraya Sastry's commentaries on Amukta Malyada of Krishnadevaraya and Sringara Naishadam of Srinatha are very popular and have run into several editions.

The commentary of Tapi Dharma Rao on Chemakura Venkata Kavi's Vijaya Vilasamu, is worthy of attention.

C.P. Brown gave an impetus to Telugu scholars like Zuluri Appayya, Garimella Venkaiah, Mulupaka Bachchayya Sastry and some other to write short annotations to many Telugu works.

Modern Telugu literary criticism has its own origin and development. In the embryonic stage it may be spotted in the preface to the Biographical Sketches of Deccan Poets written in English by Kavali Venkata Rama Swami, head translator and pundit in Literary and Antiquarian Department, Calcutta (1888). The difference between the point's of Western and Eastern criticisms was drawn to some extent in this preface.

C.P. Brown, in his 'Opinions' in English on various Telugu works takes us to the 'European method of study of Telugu poems.

Kandukuri Veeresalingam Pantulu stands first as a modern Telugu literary critic. His criticisms on Vigrahatantra, a prose work of Kokkonda Venkataratnam, opened new vistas. It was published in 1875-76 in a journal called Viveka Vardhini. In as much as this criticism confines itself to the correctness of form, this may be named as 'formalistic criticism'.

Drawing inspiration from the Muses of Spenser, Veeresalingam has left for us his work Saraswati Narada Samvadam in verse. In this piece he makes the Goddess of Learning speak to Narada about the deteriorating features of the post-prabandha poetry. He has also authored The Lives of Telugu Poets on the model of Johnson's Lives of the Poets.

The great modern commentator Vedam Venkata Raja Sastry initiated literary criticism on various Telugu works under the serial 'Sarada Kaneika'.

Kasibhatla Brahmayya Sastry stands out as the first critic of the Telugu novel. He had the laurels of Vimarsakagresara meaning the foremost literary critic. Viveka Chandrika Vimarsanam is his piece of literary criticism on Kandukuri Veeresalingam's novel Viveka Chandrika popularly known as Rajasekhara Charitram which is nothing but a free rendering into Telugu of Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield. He elaborately dealt with the original story, plot, characters, sentiment, descriptions, figures of speech, habits and customs. Here we find the early stages of development of modern Telugu literary criticism. It gives us an idea of the nature of descriptive criticism.

A good number of critical essays were published by many scholars on various poets and their works. Comparative criticism also gained currency. Mention may be made of the following significant writings.

(1) Adyam Venneti Ramachandra Rao's Manu-vasu charitra rachana vimarsanam. (A comparative criticism of Manu and Vasu Charitrams).

(2) P. Dakshina Murty's essay on Pingali Surana's Poetic genius.

(3) Panappakam Rangachari's paper on Nannaya Bhattaraka.

Vijamuri Rangachari published a critical book on Pingali Surana, expounding Telugu literary trends. The centre of these activities was the city of Madras. Critical essays on Mahabharata were also presented by many scholars.

But the credit of giving a new direction to modern Telugu literary criticism goes to Kattamachi Ramalinga Reddy. While the critics preceding him were formalistic in their approach, he penetrated into the depths of poetry in his monumental work Kawitvatatwa Vicharam i.e. study of the philosophy of poetry. Reddy's textual criticism on Kalapurnodayam, the only original work in Telugu literature, has become a model to scholarly critics like Duvvuri Venkata Ramana Sastry, Malladi Suryanarayana Sastry, and Vemparala Surayanarayana Sastry in their critical pursuits.

Rallapalli Ananta Krishna Sarma, unlike Reddy, placed Telugu prabandhas on a higher pedestal for their mirroring forth the sociological conditions and the aesthetic sense of the then existing society. His lectures on Vamana and other literary essays are thought-provoking and constructive in their approach. There is an undercurrent of subtle humour throughout his writings, which invigorated the modern Telugu literary criticism.

Viswanatha Satyanarayana also made significant contribution to Telugu criticism. Prasanna Katha Kalitharthaukti, Okadu Nachana Somanna, Allasavivari allika jigibigi, Sakuntalamuyokka Abhigjna and other contributions are marvellous. They portray his deep insight. It is pertinent to point out that the approach of Satyanarayana is oriental unlike that of others.

Telugu literature and its theories took their final shape in the hands of Pingali Lakshmikantam. He was a balanced literary critic and a literary artist. A number of his students like K.V.R. Narasimham, Diwakarla Venkatavadhani, K. Veerabhadra Rao, etc became noted critics.

The literary contributions on Veluri Sivarama Sastry, Veluri Prabhakara Sastry and some others are of no mean order.

Tummalapalli Ramalingeswara Rao occupies a special place as a literary critic. His interpretations of the verses of the great yogic poet Potana, with 'mantra sastra' background, arrest our attention.

A good number of critics have their publications on poets and their works. Various types of literary criticism have gained currency. Histories of literary criticism, Western and Eastern, were also well attempted.

B.P.

CRITICISM (Urdu) is a term applicable to four kinds of activity in literature: (i) theory of literature and its relationship with life as also its various disciplines; (ii) evolving rules, regulations, standards and criteria for a balanced assessment of the literary works of various genres; (iii) editing and compilation of correct texts, and (iv) periodisation and categorisation of the literary activity and according it a place under a compact genre of literature. Any survey of literary criticism in Urdu will have to consider all these activities. Aesthetics and social history apart literary criticism deals essentially with the dynamics of literary taste and adjusts its focus in accordance with the changing times and in the process reveals the ethos of the community to which this particular literature belongs.

Urdu is one of the few Indian languages, which though born and bred in India, is not wholly based on the literary and critical standards of Sanskrit. Its literary criticism is therefore based mostly on Perso-Arabic and Central Asian traditions from which it drew its inspiration and form. Though a regular treatise on literary criticism was not written in Urdu before the 19th century, fragments of critical sensibility are clearly discernible in poetic compositions and the anthologies and Tazkiras composed in the 14th century and thereafter.

Vajhi in his celebrated mashnavi Qutub-o-Mushatari (written in 1609), deals with the merits and demerits of poetic composition. He stresses the need and significance of selecting the words fully expressive and communicative of the poet's thoughts and emotions that are not only fresh and appropriate but are also maintaining at the same time coherence, lucidity of expression and balance.

Such references about the criteria of literary works are scattered in various couplets and prose works but the most significant indications about such criteria are found in the Biyadhs and Tazkiras which, though essentially mere anthologies, throw sufficient light on the tastes and the norms of literary criticism of the period.

Biyadh is just a notebook containing couplets of various poets which are usually maintained by the most ardent and earnest listeners of a mushaira to note down couplets of their choice along with the name or pseudonym of the concerned poet. Later, it takes the form of a more detailed note on the poet along with a number of his couplets to give an idea of his artistic individuality as also a critical assessment of his poetry. This exercise gave birth to the Tazkira tradition. The Tazkira-writers classified the poets in various ways-(a) Alphabetically (b) Abjad wise or (c) according to historical sequence.

Among early Tazkira-writers, the forms of historical classifications were: 'Early' 'Mediaeval' and 'Contemporary'. Some Tazkira-writers also tried to delineate the artistic and linguistic peculiarities of each of these periods of literary history. Mir Taqi Mir and Hatim also added epilogues shedding light on the literary taste of the period and the various trends in poetry.

The tradition of Tazkiras is long and varied. Though written about Urdu poets, most of the Tazkiras prior to 1800 were in Persian and used critical vocabulary borrowed from Persian Tazkiras and classics like Chehar Miquala.

The Tazkira criticism lays emphasis on lucidity of expression, strict observance of the rules of grammar and prosody. In addition, the use of obsolete words and expressions, as well as of dubious or malicious suggestions, where noted, are commonly commented upon adversely. About the theory of criticism or the nature of the critical concepts, these Tazkiras have practically nothing to say. Yet there is a wealth of critical awareness hidden behind the age-old cliches like Mazmun afrini' chusti-e-bandish, Fashat, Balaghat, Maqhzgoo, etc. which had come in vogue towards the end of the 19th century when the impact of the British rule and the spread of English in the fields of education and culture had made itself felt.

The last of the important Tazkiras in this tradition was written by Muhammad Husain Azad in his Abe-Hayat (meaning the Nectar)-a picture gallery of pen portraits of poets of the by-gone periods. In drawing up these pen portraits, Azad had followed the traditional pattern of the Tazkira which was to give a selection of couplets after describing the poet. However, Azad was the first ever critic to judge all the leading men of Ab-e-Hayat according to modern standards of criticism. Many legends about poets narrated by Azad have been questioned, but his critical judgements about them are by and large still valid.

Poetry for Azad holds mirror up to Nature, Nature to him was not a mere metaphysical concept but signified the vast richness not only of the flora and fauna but also of human relationships. He advises poets to shun traditionalism and conventional diction of far-fetched metaphors and decorative but unreal similies and to return to spontaneity of nature. This theme was later further elaborated by his eminent contemporary, Altaf Husain Hali.

Hali in the celebrated preface to his poetic collection, Muqaddama Sher-o-Shairi stressed the Miltonic concept of the simple the sensuous and the passionate in poetry. On the one hand he defined nature as something reflecting the genuine inner urges and aspirations of a human being (it is in this spirit that he suggests that only the genuinely mystic poets should write mystic poetry and only the lovers should compose love lyrics and those actually relishing wine should sing of wine and all conventional writings about such themes be outlawed), while on the other he interpreted natural Poetry as something responsive to the needs of the times.

It was in this vein, that he wrote Musaddas-i-Hali or Maddo-Jazr-i-Islam and advised the contemporary Urdu poets to shun all conventionalism and carry out reforms in ghazal by giving it the genuine glimpses of the real experience, keeping in view their social and moral obligations to society. These factors made him advocate for the adoption of Nazm (compact poem) so as to encourage replacement of conventional formalism by more meaningful and vibrant thoughts.

Another major critic of the period was Shibli Nomani, who made a notable contribution in respect of comparative study of the works of some important poets. Shibli has often been described as an aesthete but he never minimized the significance of the social roots of literature and always studied it in relation to prevalent cultural norms. Both Hali and Shibli stress the importance of the concept of imagination. They were not conversant with English, though they often refer to Milton, Scott and Coleridge. Their concept of imagination is however positively different from that of Coleridge and other Romantics of the West. While for the latter, imagination was an instrument of cognition itself, for Hali and Shibli, it was merely an organiser of the perceptions at various levels. Another important difference is that while Hali stresses realism or the depiction of the material world through imagination, Sahibli stresses Mahakat for the depiction of the material world of events and things.

Both Hali and Shibli died in 1914, the year of the First World War. By this time, the generation educated in English or through the medium of English had come into its own and had started to emulate the Western concepts. But between them stood at least three scholars who tried to integrate the Eastern canons of criticism with those of the West. They were Imdad Athar (Kashiful Haqaiq) Abdur Rehman (Mirat-us-Sher) and their junior contemporary Niyaz Fatehpur and Najm-ul-Ghani.

Imdad Imam Athar categorised poetry as poetry of 'intellect' and 'emotions' and while differentiating between the two, stressed the need for observing 'lucidity of expression and originality of diction.' What is emphasized by Levis-Strauss and others of the Russian Formalist School as 'giving the familiar a stranger's look' was expressed by Imdad Imam in the parlance of the oriental prosody. Abdur Rehman in his Miratus-Sher draws heavily on the canons of Arabic criticism and stresses the close relationship between the word and the meaning giving the word the primacy of status for "poetry in the ultimate analysis rests on words, and even though the meaning and the content are usually old and often timeworn, their expression that is the choice of new words and phrases-gives these an artistic freshness and aesthetic appeal".

Najm-ul-Ghani in his Bahrul Fasahat (Ocean of lucidity) provided a compendium of the time-honoured conventions and traditions of poetic form and standards of poetic composition. He did try to strike a balance between the classical oriental criteria and the Western concepts but his leanings are decisively oriental.

Niyaz Fatehpuri earned fame as editor of an epoch-making literary monthly Nigar from Lucknow whcih brought out several special issues devoted to outstanding poets and attempted critical evaluations of their poetic achievements. Moreover, in his critical articles, he tried to evolve a rational criterion for judging literature (mainly poetry-based) on enlightened common sense and lively taste of the classics. His main stress was on uniqueness of content, depth of feeling, freshness of approach and artistic use of words and imagination.

The impact of Romanticism on Urdu criticism was symbolised best by perhaps Abdur Rahman Bijnori whose unfinished preface to the re-discovered Diwan of the famous poet Ghalib is still remembered as a unique specimen of literary criticism. Bijnor laid the foundation of impressionism in Urdu criticism by making reader's own aesthetic projection of the text as the very basis of critical evaluation. He also introduced comparative criticism in Urdu by insisting on standards of world literature being compared to those of the Orient. For him, Ghalib was not to be judged merely according to some rigid and objective critical standards of particular literary tradition but on the criteria of world literature which unite all great creative artists of the world, who represent not only the spirit of their own area and age but also the basic urges of the cosmic consciousness. For him genuine literary criticism touches the realms of metaphysics and aesthetics and provides the sum total of the very best of the treasures of human civilization.

Bijnori's was a unique contribution but unfortunately as he had practically no followers, his strain died down. Among the few literary critics who carried forward this great tradition and even added additional dimensions to it may be included the names of 'Firaq' Gorakhpuri and Rashed Ahmed Siddiqi.

Firaq treated every piece of art, particularly poetry, as a creative experience for both the reader and the critic. An intelligent reader has to re-create it aesthetically according to his own lights without unnecessarily submitting to the poet's personality. Rashid Ahmed Siddiqi saw in every creative endeavour an unmistakable mark of cultural ethos struggling for its fulfilment. Every poetic composition was for him not just an effusion of an individual in personal turmoil or abandon but an expression of the cultural ethos of the given period.

In 1936, Progressive Writers Association was organised with its first all-India conference held in Lucknow under the chairmanship of Premchand. Simultaneously, new ideas in literary criticism started taking shape. These new ideas laid special stress on the social roots of all literature and called for an analysis of all literature according to the social milieu of which it is a product and insisted on the class with which given literature or its author identifies himself. This understanding gave a new look to literary criticism and closely related it to all avenues of social studies.

For the first time, relations of literary and scholarly productions and their impact on social-cultural superstructures came to be discussed and a new awareness of history, sociology and the part these play in creating new concepts, images and sensibility began to be thoroughly examined. In the process, folk literature and poets and writers closer to masses were identified and new links between literature of one language with another and of one land with that of others were also rediscovered.

This critical awareness was later on more fully developed by critic like Ehtesham Husain (the most important literary critic of the Movement.) He tried to make criticism a system guided by certain values evolved through a cultural process brought about by the interplay of various classes in a given society. According to this system mere rhetoric or an aesthetic re-creation of a literary masterpiece could not do justice to it unless the forces which shaped its form and gave it colour, validity and significance are also not identified.

Efforts of Mumtaz Husain in this direction were also noteworthy. He tried to reveal the social class roots of philosophical concepts and literary sensibility in sociological and socio-economic terms. Ali Sardar Jafri's analysis of mysticism as a historical phenomenon and its impact on poets from Kabir to Mir and Ghalib added new dimensions to the understanding or rather the re-discovery of the classics. The progressive critical vein continues in the writings of new critics.

Simultaneously some other trends also prospered. Kalim-ud-din Ahmed, an ardent pupil of the F.R. Leavis published two books, namely, Urdu Shairi per Ek Nazar and Urdu Tanquid per Ek Nazar taking stock of the entire panorama of Urdu poetry and Urdu criticism and found both these genres hopelessly wanting in standards. Taking world (mainly Western) standards as his model, Kalm-ud-din judged Urdu literature rather harshly and insisted on a scientific and a formal judgement of literary genres.

Ali Ahmed Suroor took his cue from T.S. Eiot's love of tradition and attempted to analyse and assess literature as a continuum of cultural values. His enlightened re-appraisal of classics focussed attention on study of literature with the help of modern disciplines but keeping in view the exclusiveness of literary norms.

Yusuf Husain Khan's studies of Iqbal (Ruh-i-Iqbal) Ghalib (Ghalib Aur Ahang-i-Ghalib) and of Urdu Ghazal are deeply rooted in the philosophical understanding of the physical environment of a certain age and its elite. Primarily a historian he studied literature as a part of the process of History which releases new energy and serves as the sheet anchor for nations in trouble.

Since 1960, another trend of New Criticism inspired primarily by modern American literature, began to take shape which discarded the mehods of sociological criticism and exclusively tried to devote itself to the study of the text. They concentrated their attention to the close text study of the modern writers. To them, criticism was to find the real identity of the creative writer as expressed in the text itself and to exclude everything extraneous as irrelevant. Though modern criticism has made its mark in several journals, yet it is still to evolve into a coherent system of critical evaluation. Some individuals have, however, tried to imbibe healthy values of new criticism in the framework of modern literary sensibility.

Along with the theoretical and practical literary criticism, textual criticism has also flourished in Urdu. Since a large number of manuscripts were either not available in print or the printed texts themselves were dubious and lacked anthenticity, a number of textual critics devoted single-minded attention to the editing of such texts. The most important among them was Mehmood Shirani who discovered and systematically edited a number of literary texts. Abdul Haq also edited a number of hitherto unknown and unpublished texts with far reaching impact on Urdu's literary history. Such careful editing of the texts was also admirably done by various others but the most important contribution was made by Qazi Abdul Wadud who laid down rigorous rules for the editing of texts and sifting of literary evidences. His detailed reviews of research theses set up a new standard in research methodology and textual editing and has left a deep impact on the later researchers like Kali Das Gupta Riza and a few others. Mention may be made of the critical insights provided by eminent critics like Dr Gian Chand, Sandar Ali Jafri, Tara Charan Rastogi, Jagannath 'Azad', Khurshed Sami and a number of others.

These are the major trends of literary criticism in Urdu run through various channels predominant among these being Cultural Criticism and Formal Criticism. Attempts are being made by certain critics to integrate and synthesize these two trends into a composite whole so as to present a more comprehensive and more satisfying view of literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Edabat Brelvi, Urdu Tanquid Ka Irteqa., Kalim-ud-ddin Ahmed, Urdu Tanqid par Ek Nazar, 2nd edn. (Patna)., Ram Babu Saxena, History of Urdu Literature (Allahabad) 1927., Sharib Rudaulvi, Jadeed Urdu Tehqeek Usool-o-Nazariyat., T. Graham Bailey, Urdu Literature (Calcutta).

M.H.

CRY, THE PEACOCK (English), Anita Desai's remarkable first novel in English, was published in 1963. It is her most representative work, since it reveals many of her distinctive qualities as an artist, intense preoccupation with loneliness and death, vibrant lyricism and gift for poetry. The novel is in three parts–the first and the last, brief and in the third person narration, and the middle, substantial and told in the first person by the protagonist. Maya, a young girl is married to a middle aged lawyer. Maya and her husband Gautama form a strange couple and, as Maya realises early, there are no bonds between them. Though they live together, they inhabit different worlds. Gautama puts his faith in facts, and only ideas and theories stimulate him, while Maya believes in the 'validity of real existence' of which she finds symbols in flowers, a Kathakali dance or even Toto's short stump of a white tail. In spite of a certain amount of tenderness and considerateness for each other, their marriage is doomed to failure. The sense of doom is further heightened by the prophecy of an albino astrologer that either she or her husband would die an early death. Images of death proliferate in the novel, and each part contains episodes centred round death–the death of Maya's pet dog in the first part, that of Gautama in the second and the suggestion of Maya's suicide in the last. The structure of the novel is poetic, and is built round imaginatively conceived symbols. The peacocks, suggested in the title itself, form the central symbol. With their association with death and destructive love, they come to have a terrifying fascination for Maya : "In the shadows I saw peacocks dancing, the thousand eyes upon their shimmering feathers gazing steadfastly, unwinklingly upon the final truth–Death. I heard their cry and echoed it-...Agony, agony, the mortal agony of their cry for lover and for death."

Inspite of its intense Iyricism and the pervasive presence of Maya's anguished consciousness, Ms. Desai's novel effectively communicates its strong sense of place and persons. Maya's sensitivity to her surroundings lends an objective solidity to a world which is otherwise filled with fantasy. Delhi and Lucknow, Gautama's mother and sister, Maya's father and her brother Arjuna, her girlhood friends Leila and Pom, her pets and flowers–are all real presence in the novel. Ms. Desai's language triumphs in its dual task of articulating a many layered consciouness and also in objectifying a sensitivity to an intensely experienced outside world.

G.S.A.

CURRIMBHOY, ASIF (English; b. 1928) is a prolific writer of plays in English. In the span of about 17 years he has written 29 plays of varying act-lengths. This is a remarkable achievement in the field of drama which has been lagging far behind poetry and fiction in India.

Currimbhoy, a company executive, who had strayed into play-writing, got off to a good start with the production of his Goa in 1965 at the University of Michigan–a play which he calls 'Indo-Anglian' because its characters and its language are European. His Monsoon was staged at the Dallas Theater Center the same year. Productions in Broadway and elsewhere in the U.S. marked his rise as a playwright in English. His success abroad has been an encouragement to the Indo-English theatre movement in India. He does not approve of the tendency, among our producers, to adapt Broadway and West End successes. He suggests that our near commercial producers and amateur companies should go in for experimental theatre, show-case productions, dark-light programmes and mini-theatre to alternate with their big ventures; this would create a more encouraging situation in India for English plays, which now flourish only in the metropolitan centres. Currimbhoy has tried his hand at one-act plays like The Clock and The Refugee, two-act plays like Goa and the Doldrummers and three-act plays like Sonar Bangla. Among his other important plays are The Tourist Mecca (1959), The Restaurant, The Dumb Dancer (1962, staged in La Mama with Kathakali dancers), Om (1962), Thorns On a Canvas (1968) and The Great Indian Bastard. One of his early plays, The Doldrummers (1962) had an Actors' Studio tryout in the United States. Its title is an ingenious coinage by the author to refer to a group of hippie-type youngsters who find themselves in doldrums, youngsters, 'who haven't worked for a year of Sundays' and who lived in a shack on fashionable Juhu Beach in the suburbs of metropolitan Bombay, with their idealism turned into cynicism. It is an interesting play dealing with the angry young men who wash their dirty linen in public, and who are 'too close to reality to live the life of the imagination'. The play was banned for about nine years before its first Indian production in Delhi in 1969. Since then Currimbhoy's status as a playwright has risen in India. Goa (1964) was produced on the opening day of the Indian National Centre for the Performing Arts in Delhi. Revolution (Inquilab, 1970) is one of his political plays, of topical interest at the time, dramatising the nightmare of the havoc created by the Naxalites. Others of the kind are The Captives (dealing with the Indo-China conflict of October, 1962) and The Restaurant (on the problems arising out of the partition of the country.) Monsoon or Noah's Ark (1965), produced at the Dallas Theater Center, deals with violence and revolt in the Malayasian archipelago. The Alien National Land dramatises the Indian Jewish family's predicament. Politics and social problems provide the themes for his plays.

All of Currimbhoy's plays have not been published. Oxford and I.B.H. publishers have brought out a volume containing Goa, Inquilab, The Doldrummers, The Refugee, Darjeeling Tea and Sonar Bangla, with an appreciative foreward by F. Bowers.

H.A.G.

CYCLE OF SEASONS IN INDIAN LITERATURE (Pan-Indian). There is no literary epic in Sanskrit literature which does not include a sizeable description of the cycle of six seasons woven into its narrative fabric. The primary epics of Valmiki and Vyasa blaze the trail as it were for all future poets. Valmiki, whose poetic vein is more emotive, naturally devotes whole cantos to the description of the seasons; while the Mahabharata, in its multifarious predilections cannot devote such exclusive attention to this subject. Even in our sacred literature as embodied in the Rigveda, we find glimpses of poetic awareness of the seasons, viz., vasanta (spring), grishma (summer) and sharat (autumn). The Hymn to Purusha (Cosmic Person) metaphorically relates how in the sacrifices of the Cosmic Person preformed for gods of Vedic times, Sping was the ghee offered, Summer the sacrificial wood and Autum the oblation (Rigveda, X. 90.6). According to the Atharvaveda, this consecration involved also the rainy season (XIX. vi. 11). This refers of course to the creation of time in its well known phases in the year.

By the time of the Taittiriya Samhita of the Yajurveda, two more were added to these four of the Rigveda; and in the hoary Vedic period itself, the number of Indian seasons in the year came to be fixed as six. Winter came to be allotted two terms—one Hemanta (Dewy season) and second, Shishira (Cold). The Yajurveda text mentioned states: shad va ritavah samvatsare (Six are the seasons in a year). In all accounts of our chronicles (Puranas), law-givers (smritis) and scientific texts (charaka-samhita on Ayurveda for instance), the concept of Shadritus is standardised; and no wonder the poets of the classical period in Sanskrit took this idea without any change and gave it an imaginative treatment in their works. Their treatment of the seasons as a backdrop to sentiments in general, and to love in particular, was so striking that theoreticians like Dandin included it as a noteworthy component among the eighteen themes of set description to be conventionally observed by writers of art epics (Kavyadarsha, I. 16). Among others these set themes include items such as city, ocean, mountain, sunrise, moonlight, garden, water-sport, drinking spree and convivial damsels. Of all these, the pride of place belongs indeed to the cycle of seasons because it typifies, the very idea of time conditioning man and nature alike. These ancient theorists like Bhamaha and Dandin were aware that beauty in nature, of birds, animals and landscape, all entered the poetic world of imagery by choice, because the actions and emotions of the characters were to a large extent shaped and conditioned by them. The nature of figures of speech like samasokti and svabhavokti were essentially based on a sensibility of personified nature or nature as it strikes the sensibility of a poet. And all the major figures of speech recognised in Indian poetics like simile, metaphor, poetic fancy, contrast, poetic doubt, and so forth depend on imagery springing up from a close observation of natural scenery in a mind guided by literary memories.

In sheer masterliness of touch in the depiction of the advent of various seasons, Valmiki remains unexcelled. This is how he depicts winter:

Hands and feet stiffen with frost.
Small green glades garland the earth,
A drink of water aches in the mouth.
Fire is beautiful to watch.
Now that the moon has given the sun
Its sheen and moves through a dimming mist,
It seems as if a heavy sigh
Had suddenly blinded a mirror's face.
The trees themselves, their flowers gone,
Seem to be sleeping now, lapped
In a shine of dew and swapped again
In the milky glimmer of the mist.

These are but random specimens from a whole canto. But they can provide an insight into the poetic mind of the great epic master who weaves nature and man in one thread of creative vision. The following are specimens of his account of the rainy season:

Nine months through the rays of the sun
The sky had held the rain in its womb
It drinks up the waters of the seas
And waters are born from it, transformed.
Just now it seems quite reasonable
To drape the sun in flower chains,
Climbing to Heaven on the steps
Of lacquered clouds, scaled to the sun.
The mountains, wrapped in cloudy deerskin,
Bearing the sacred thread of streams,
Their mastered breath, the wind in caves,
Seem like sages it their thought.

We see here every minute detail of the Indian landscape transfigured in the lively imagination of the poet. Nature bathed in variant shades of seasonal beauty becomes almost a character in Valmiki's hands.

However, it is the singular achievement of Kalidasa that, even while following the example of Valmiki, he was able to improvise a new dimension, as it were, in depicting the entire gamut of seasons in general, and the rains and spring in particular, in epic as well as lyric genres. It was his genius that gave a heroic divinity to Kama, the love-god and made the personified Vasanta or Spring his commander-in-chief. His unfailing arrows are all vernal flowers—Ashoka, Aravinda, Chuta, Mallika and Nilotpala, each celebrated by aesthetes for its colour, scent and enchanting freshness. The row of black bees speeding forth towards the flowers makes cupid's bow-string, the bow itself being the bent sugar-cane with coloured patterns. His friend is none other than the soft breeze from the South. Thus equipped, the Love-god can challenge even Shiva, the Supreme Yogi, to thoughts on love! The bulk of the third canto of the art-epic Kumarasambhava is devoted to the effect of the advent of spring on even birds, beasts and celestials in the outskrits of Shiva's penance-groove. Here is a specimen of Kalidasa's poetic account of it:

In one flower-vessel the black bee drank honey, following his own beloved mate. The black deer scratched by his horn the female deer, her eyes closed in bliss at his loving touch. The female elephant gave out of love to her beloved male elephant a mouthful of water scented with lotus-dust. The chakravaka treated his spouse with a half-eaten lotus-stalk. Even the trees received from their beloveds, viz., creepers, with reddish flowers and shoots for their lips, the joyful embrace of their bent branch-arms!

What deserves particular mention is the fact that Kalidasa has the originality of weaving into his epic story itself the conventional motif of spring and raising it to the high level of a hero's bosom companion!

The same adroitness of fancy and genius are revealed even in the lyric genre by Kalidasa. The Meghaduta has transformed the cloud into a very able love-messenger; and if we closely analyse the poem we will see how the cloud is none other than the season of rain itself as symbolised by the cloud. Of story, there is little in the lyric because it is first and foremost a panegryic of love-in-separation, capturing its variant moods and its greatest intensity. That the rainy season acts an an uddipaka-vibhava or excitant of the love of separated lovers is almost a trite kavi-samaya or convention of Sanskrit poets. In the hands of Kalidasa it becomes a whole poem of more than a century of verses brimming with the sentiment of vipralambha-shringara in the drawling metre of Mandakranta which lends itself to be sung melodiously in tune with the emotion. The thin story of the semidivine Yaksha, banished from the dream-city of Alaka beyond the Himalayas, to serve a sentence of separation from his beloved, in earthly Ramagiri in Central India, is a pure invention of the poet to distil the emotional intensity of this very heart-rending sentiment, enlivened only by the hope of reunion after the agony holds a mirror to the beauty of the city and the countryside, the joy of birds and animals, the welcome by peasants and belles representing different sections of Indian society, at the advent of the rainy season. The grandeur of the mountains with clouds resting on their crests as also of the wives pining for love! What is more, the palace of devotional worship and the dates of religious festivals also come in passing; and the vast variety of flowers and scents, in parks and woodlands, is depicted with a masterly touch. This ardour of sensuous perception and the spontaneous exercise of a poetic imagination capable of strong and delicate impression is unique in Sanskrit literature. It inspried a large number of later poets to write their own duta-kavyas and raise it to the stature of a new genre itself.

Though the authorship of the other lyric called Ritu-samhara or The cycle of seasons has been sometimes doubted, its spontaneous flow and directness of appeal reminding one of Valmiki may be deemed a juvenile work of Kalidasa himself. It is the first lyric of its kind in Indian literature devoted entirely and exclusively to a poetic account of the seasons, from the viewpoint of a youth whose love for his beloved has just been awakened. It would appear that the perception of beauty in familiar things is a gift of love; and as things change and put on new faces in the shifting seasons of the year, new discoveries are made by lovers of the kaleidoscopic variety in nature's beauty and bounty in each season. Below are a few respresentative specimens:

Summer

The sun is hot, but the moon is pleasant. The clear waters beckon and invite one for a dip at sight. Delightful are the evenings, and passions are low, now that the summer has set in, my love!

Sweating excessively in every limb, young damsels put away their heavy clothes, and wear light silks about their buxom breasts.

Scorched by the rays of the broiling sun and baked by the burning sand below, the snake lingers with a drooping hood in the shade of the peacock's plume—a dangerous guest!

The Rains

The Rainy Season is here, my Dear, with all the pomp and panoply of a king; the dark clouds are his war-elephants, lightning his royal flag and thunder the rattling durm-beat.

Autumn

Look! Here comes Autumn like a charming bride, clad in a white robe of glossy flowers, with the full-blown lotus for her tinkling anklet. Her slender frame is so lovely with the golden glow of ripening rice!

Like lovely damsels, the streams move slow, with shining girdles of sparkling fish, pearl necklaces of white bird-rows on either bank and rotund hips of stretching sands!

Early winter

The cold season is shedding tears of dewdrops on blades of grass, distressed at the weight of lovers on luscious bosoms, his favourite snug resort!

Winter

This is the season for the warm hearth with windows shut, for basking in the noonday sun, for warm raiment and embrace of youthful maidens!

Spring

The trees are in flower; the lilies bloom in the lakes. Women turn wanton with love and perfumes (of flowers) are wafted in the breeze. The nights are pleasant as also the days. Everything is sweet in May, O Sweet!

The grooves are lit by white jasmines as radiant and ravishing as a coquette's smile. When they tempt even an ascetic's heart, from sense withdrawn, fancy their effect on young hearts filled with thoughts of love!

Even these specimen illustrations are enough to reveal the lyric's merits as well as defects. It is more or less a "Lovers' Calendar" dwelling only on the prospects awaiting each turn of season and unabashedly sensual. It is blind to the other side of nature which is 'red in tooth and claw'. Compared to other works of Kalidasa, we miss here breadth as well as depth. Only we have a pageantry here of passionate pictures of nature in varied colours.

But the same Kalidasa in his mature plays brings in the seasons as excitants of different rasas. All the heart rending ravings of the mad hero Pururavas are depicted against the backdrop of the louring clouds in the Vikramorvashiya. The Shakuntala opens with summer whose description covertly suggests self-forgetting and ultimate joy in the words:

Prachchhaya-sulabha-nidrah divasan parinamaramaniyah (1.3). It is indeed winter which has led to King Dushyanta's rejection of Shakuntala in the IV Act and when he remembers her with an equally unaccountable intensity in the VI Act, spring has surely set in. But an equally consummate art of structuring the plot is seen in the Malavikagnimitra too. In this play the princess mistaken for a servant-maid and yet loved by the king is proved to be a princess to the satisfaction of even the suspicious co-wives by the irrefutable testimony of the Ashoka tree blossoming at the touch of Malavika's foot. A poetic convention becomes an essential thread in leading the play towards denouement in this play.

This example of Kalidasa inspired Bana also to give suggestive descriptions of the seasons, in keeping with different events, in the plot of both his immortal prose works, viz., Harshacharita and Kadambari. But his imagination is so mythopoeic that when he thinks of summer ending the twin months of winter and all white with jasmine flowers, the image of the terrible god Shiva as Mahakala destroying the entire universe at one sweep and performing the tandava dance with outbursts of high-pitched laughter presents itself before his mind's eye simultaneously: "atrantare kusuma-samaya-yugamupasam haran ajrimbhata grismabhidhanah phullamallikadhavalattahaso Maha-kalah. (Harshacharita, II) Ananda vardhana, the doyen of Indian literary critics, has cited this as an example of 'suggested simile' based on polysemy of words (Dhvanyaloka), II 21f.)."

Vishakhadatta, the author of the celebrated play Mudrarakshasa, is inspired by Bana and improves upon him in his description of the autumn as rivalling the glory of Shiva. The autumnal sky is white with all-white 'kasha' flowers; and so is the body of Shiva with ashes! the clouds lose their darkness in autumn; the dark elephant-hide of Shiva is made to shed its darkness, bathed as it is in the white radiance of His moon on the crest! If the autumn displays its white swans, so does Shiva display his garland of skulls! (Loc cit. III 20). Such is the ornate handling of the season's glory which had become almost a fashion by the time of post-Kalidasian writers. This fondness of overlaid and high-flown conceits develops almost into a mannerism increasingly in the Mahakavyas of Bharavi, Magha, Kumaradasa and Shriharsha. But it should not be forgotten that farfetched conceits were held high in the esteem of erudite scholars. The popularity of these is evidenced by the vast space devoted to them in every Sanskrit anthology of memorable verses compiled in the medieval period. Special mention might be made here of Vallabhadeva's Subhashitavali and Shridharadasa's Saduktikarnamrita,' as also Sharngadhara-paddhati by Sharngadhara. Besides verses by well known authors, they include also quotes from anonymous poets. Among lyricists who composed Shatakas or 'centuries' of verses, Bharitrhari's century on Love contains a section describing the seasons. His first verse may be given as a specimen:

> Breezes waft an agreeable scent. Branches of trees are adorned by tender shoots. Even birds and beasts sing sweet and delight their female mates in agony of love. The moon-faces of damsels are free from stains of the gush of perspiration. With the advent of spring, what is there on earth which does not get added excellence?

Similar is the strain of self-contained verses in the Prakrit anthology of King Hala called Gathasaptashati. They breath a natural simplicity enjoyable even today. Here are a few of them:

Spring

> No blossoms on the mango, no cuckoo call. Nevertheless, My heart, wanting him, says spring.

Rain

> The downpour is so heavy, it's like the cloud using drawropes to lift the earth, With ropes of rain, and, failing, darkly scowls.

(S. Vastsyayan and V.N. Misra, The Indian Poetic Tradition).

This trend presents such a glaring contrast from the farfetched fancies of later decadent poets.

From this survey, the main points of interest in the handling of the theme of seasons by different genre-writers in Sanskrit can be easily seen. Soon they grew into a kavi-samaya or classical poetic convention and it became a theme for writing in extenso by that polymath writer Rajashekhara in his famous Kavyamimamsa. It sums up beautifully and briefly the traditions to be observed by poets in respect of flowering trees, directions of wind, seasonal fruits, birds and animals activated, etc. We might conclude this study by some specimen illustrations therefrom:

"The wind is an easterly one in the rains. In autumn the direction of the wind is unspecified. But in winter it is a westerly wind. Some opine that it might be from the east also. However, in spring it always blows from the south. But in summer it may blow from any direction.

In the rains, the cranes become pregnant. Bamboos will put forth tender shoots. Dust will be ended. The military marches of kings will cease."

It makes the creeper sallaki, the sala tree and the mushrooms to bloom. From the parched earth, now drenched, issues forth a sweet perfume.The woodlands shine green. The mountains washed by rain become strikingly beatiful. Rivers get flooded and overflow their banks. The turf is crowded by glow-worms.
The hosts of travellers turn homeward. The sky is overweighed by clouds. It delights the chakora birds. It ends the ramblings of mendicants. The wives separated from their husbands look forward to their early return. The chataka sports about excitedly. The deer gets passionate. The frogs croak in chorus. The serpent becomes tipsy. The peacocks dance and the swans rejoice. It fills lovers with anxious thoughts.

The kutaja is in full flower as also the 'nipa'. Other flowers of the season are: 'dhava, arjuna, kadamba, ketaki' and 'nicula'."

In the same strain Rajashekhara gives minute details of the other five seasons also which will be very useful guides for practitioners of poetry. It will be readily seen that all these kavisamayas relating to the six seasons became the stock-in-trade of all traditional poets in almost all modern Indian languages too. The convention was kept alive in Sanskrit also till the 17th century, since we find its sensitive appearance in the works of Panditaraja Jagannatha, especially, the Bhaminivilasa, not to speak of imitative poems like Sadritu-varnana-kavya by Vrajaraja Dikshita, Durlabha and others.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, A History of Sanskrit Literature, London, 1961. K. Krishnamoorthy, Kalidasa, Delhi, 1982. Rajasekhara, Kavyamimamsa, Baroda, 1934. Sachchidananda Vatsyayan 'Agyeya' and Vidya Niwas Misra, The Indian Poetic Tradition, Agra, 1983. V. Raghavan, Ritu in Sanskrit Literature, Delhi, 1972.

K. Kr.

D

DABIR, MIRZA SALAMATALI (Urdu; b. 1803, d. 1875) was the son of Mirza Ghulam Husain. Mulla Hashim Shirazi 'Nassar', an eminent writer and an ancestor of Dabir had migrated to India from Iran during the reign of Mughal Kings. One of his ancestors was appointed as Munshi at the Mughal Court. This was a hereditary office and was inherited first by Dabir's great grand-father and later by his grand-father Ghulam Muhammad, who relinquished it and became a recluse. Dabir's father Ghulam Husain was born in 1776. He shifted to Lucknow when Dabir was about five years of age.

Dabir was a scholar of Arabic, Persian, Hadith (sayings of Prophet) and of Islamic jurisprudence. He had acquired great proficiency in theology, metaphysics and medicine. He was married to the grand-daughter of Insha, the renowned Urdu poet.

Mirza Dabir took to writing poetry at an early age and at the instance of his father became the disciple of Mir Zamir, the famous elegy writer. Lucknow was at that time the cradle of Urdu poetry and the age of such great poets as Mir Khaliq, Dilgir, Mir Zamir et al. During this period the elegy became very popular and many poets of eminence perfected the art of elegy writing and gave it a style and a form of its own. Dabir began by writing ghazals. According to Akbar Hydari, Dabir has left an anthology of ghazals which is now available with his grandson. Dabir, however, gained prominence and popularity as an elegy writer. While most of his elegies have since been published his ghazals have remained unpublished so far. He also composed a Masnavi (in which he recounted the exploits of Nadir Shah Durrani) and a small book on prosody. Both these are still in their original manuscript form and bear an eloquent testimony to Dabir's scholarship.

His greatness as an elegy writer had been acknowledged by all contemporary poets and writers including Rajab Ali Beg Suroor, Atish, Nasikh and Mir Zamir. His fame as an elegy writer had reached the court of Ghazi-ud-Din Hyder, King of Oudh who had invited him to recite elegies at the Royal Imam Bara. By this time, Nasir-ud-Din Hyder had taken over as King. Mirza Dabir reached the zenith of fame and popularity. He also recited elegies at the palace of Malika-e-Zamani and at almost all important gatherings. During the reign of Amjad Shah when Anis arrived in Lucknow the two poets recited their elegies by turn on alternate days.

In 1857 when the British conquered Oudh and the scholars, writers and poets left Lucknow, Mirza Dabir also followed suit. He went to Sitapur (U.P.) along with his family. When normalcy returned to Lucknow, Dabir came back but found the city quite changed. Gone were the days of Oudh Kings. Gone was also the pomp and grandeur of the Oudh Darbar. Dabir's fame had, however, gone far beyond Lucknow and he was invited to recite elegies at Kanpur, Allahabad, Varanasi, Faizabad and Patna. In his old age Dabir had to bear the sorrow of the death of his young son Husain Atarud, and of his elder brother Ghulam Husain Nazir. These tragic incidents made him dejected. He went to Patna on the insistence of Imam Bandi Begam and fell ill there and after a few days of his return from Patna died at Lucknow.

Dabir was a great poet and became a legend during his life time. His fame reached such far off places as Iran and Iraq. Muhammad Hussain Azad has rightly said that Dabir took the art of elegy to new heights. Despite his fame and popularity, his poetry has often been the subject of an unending controversy. The audience of Lucknow and its suburbs were divided into two groups called 'Anisiye' and 'Dabiriye'. The former claimed that Anis was an undisputed master of elegy while the latter were all out for Dabir. The same was the case with critics. While Shibli Nomani had expressed himself in favour of Anis, Raddal Mawazana of Afzal Ali Zau and Al-Nizan of Fauq Mahabani (1914) contradicted Shibli's thesis and claimed that Dabir was for too superior to 'Anis' as a poet. Mirza Dabir and Mir Anis were contemporaries.

The poet who composes elegies has to pay special attention to incidents and characters and depict their emotional state in the most effective manner to ensure the involvement of the audience. Dabir's elegies possessed these qualities in abundance. His characters are life-like and situations so detailed that the audience feel as if all action is taking place before their very eyes.

Sarfraz Husain Khabir has compiled a Razm-Nama-e-Dabir (1964), a study of which convinces the reader of the greatness of the poet.

It is not known how many elegies were composed by Dabir. According to S.A. Siddiqui the number of Dabir's published elegies is 390 while 285 of his elegies are unpublished. The total number of his elegies thus comes to 675. Muhammad Záman Azurda, on the other hand, gives the number of Dabir's published elegies as 411 and that of the unpublished as 39, totalling 450.

Most of his elegies are included in the twenty volumes published under the title Daftar-e-Matam. Nawal Kishore Press, Lucknow also brought out two volumes of his elegies. Besides about six volumes of his unpublished elegies are in the personal library of Masud Husain Rizvi Adib.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Afzal Husain Sabit, Hayat-a-Dabir., Azurda M. Zaman, Mirza Salamat Ali Dabir., H. Faruqui, Dabistan-a-Dabir., Kazim Ali Khan, Talash-e-Dabir., Naqvi Zamir Akhtar, Ishria Mirza Dabir., S.A. Siddiqui, Mirza Dabir Ki Marsiya Nigari.

B.V.

DADHAWADIYO, MADHAUDAS (Rajasthani; b. 1553, d. 1621) was the son of the famous poet Chundo and a resident of the village Balunda ka Basa in Jodhpur state. Maharaja Sursinha of Jodhpur had granted him the village, Napawasa (Sojata pargana - i.e. district) in 1597. He died at the battle of Mugadada in the Vikram year 1678, on the 9th day of the bright half of 'Jetha'. This battle was fought between Thakur Kisansinha Khinwawata and Abu, on the latter's abduction of cows. Madhaudas fought on the Thakur's side. It is said that he was one of the four poets who had offered their opinions on Veli-Krishna Rukmani Ri by Rathaud Prithviraj, and that his remarks were favourable to Prithviraj. His available works are Ramarasau, a number of manuscripts of this work are avialable. Nisani Gajamorkha is a small devotional work based on Gajendramoksha episode narrated in the Bhagavata Purana. There is a beautiful description of nature in the beginning of this work. There is much difference in the texts and volume of the various manuscripts of this work. The poet has presented an interesting account of the event in a fluent language. Hadamana-gita is composed as a prayer to Hanumana. His descriptions directly connected with the subject are brief, artistically constructed, impressive and picturesque. His diction is fitting to the occassion, fluent and meaningful. Both these qualities distinguish the poetry of Madhaudas from others.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari, Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya., Motilal Menariya, Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya.

Hi. M.

DADOBA, PANDURANG (Marathi; b. 1814, d. 1882) was one of the early Marathi grammarians and social activists. Dadoba was born in a well-to-do family from Tarkhad (Taluka Vasai, Dist. Thana). He later settled in Bombay. Educated at Elphinstone Institute, Dadoba got an appointment as tutor to the Prince of Jarroa, a post which he occupied for 3 years. In his autobiography, which was discovered after his death, he has given a vivid account of his journey from Bombay to Jarroa which took a full month. On his return to Bombay on relinquishing his job at Jarroa, he was given the post of an assistant teacher in the Elphinstone Institute. In 1840, he became Head Master of the newly opened Surat High School, in which job he remained till 1850. He was invited to be a lecturer in the Elphinstone College, and towards the close of service, Dadoba was appointed Inspector of Schools of the Northern Division of the then Bombay Presidency. Dadoba retired from service in 1862. He was also made a Rai Bahadur.

Dadoba's greatest contribution to the study and teaching of Marathi language was his grammar. Marathi Bhashesched Vyakarana was written by him when he was still a school student. It was first published in 1836. Being the only book of Marathi grammar (besides William Carey's book, which, however, was little known in Maharashtra) based on the scientific and accurate study of the Marathi language, Dadoba's grammar came to be recognized by the Education Department as a standard text book and was prescribed for schools. Naturally the book ran into many editions. A diminutive edition of the book was also published in 1865 at the instance of the Bombay Government. For nearly 75 years Dadoba's grammar remained a standard Marathi grammar and being printed over and over, was studied by generation after generation in Maharashtra.

Later in his life he wrote only two major literary books. The first Yashodapandurangi (1865), thus named to commemorate his parents, Pandurang and Yashoda, is a prose commentary on Moropanta's Kekavali written in chaste Marathi; it is an extremely readable book, worthy of the eminent man. His autobiography Atmacharitra Charitra Ani Athavani published years after his death, is a fine piece of literary writing and provides many a glimpse into the contemporary life in Bombay. His Sanskrit essay on widow remarriage which is appended to Baba Padamanji's Yamunaparyatana is a masterpiece and enhances the value of the first social novel in Marathi.

A.T.

DADU (Hindi; Rajasthani; b. 1544, d. 1603) was a mediaeval 'Sadhak' and saint poet. His spirit of compassion earned him the suffix 'Dayal'. According to prevalent belief, he was found floating in the river Sabarmati as a newly born by one issueless Nagar Brahman Lodiram of Ahmedabad, who brought him up. The other view is that he was a cotton-carder, probably a Muslim. Janagopal, in his Sri Dadu Janmu Lila Parachi says that while at Amer, Dadu took to cotton-carding for Buddhan who initiated him into the faith at the age of 11 and 7 years later again initiated him into 'Sant-Sadhana'. Nothing definite is known about this Buddhan. Dadu performed his penance (Sadhana) at Kardala (Kalyanpur) hills (Near Parbatsar, Nagore) and then at Sambhar (Jaipur) where at the age of 25, he started preaching. In 1575, he came to Amer and stayed there for about 12 years. He is also said to have delivered religious discourses to Emperor Akbar for 40 days. When he died his body was taken to Bhairana hills nearby. He was said to be a family man, had two sons—Garibdas, Miskindas and two daughters.

The small assemblage at Sambhar where he used to preach was first called Brahma sect, then Par-Brahma sect and finally as Dadu Sect (Panth). Later the Sect (Panth) got divided into four branches—'Khalsa', 'Naga', 'Uttardha' and 'Virakta', the basic ideology of all being similar. The chief seat of the Sect is at Narayana, where his discipular tradition still continues. Many prominent saint poets have adorned this Sect. A few such names are: Bakhana, Pragdas Biyani, Jagjivan, Janagopal Rajjab, Sundardas (Junior), Jagannathdas, Raghodas, Chatardas, Swarupdas and Dhyandas. The language of Dadu's poetry is mainly Rajasthani with occasional tinges of Western Hindi, Gujarati and Punjabi. All his available poems were finally collected by Rajjab, who classified them under different topics; over 2500 'sakhis' (couplets) under 37 topics and 445 'padas' (devotional songs) under 27 different musical modes and notes. The collection became a model for all future editions including the published ones.

Dadu propounded the devotion of 'Nirguna Brahma' and expressed the realized truth. To him barriers of caste, creed or profession are unreal. Solution to problems of life lies in picking up truth and discarding untruth. Elimination of the ego and violence, equation between body and mind, self contemplation and universal love are the essence of his preaching. He was humane and sweet. According to him penance could lead to self-realization and emancipation. His mystic and yogic expression, particularly Submersion Yoga (Lay-Yog) are also explicit. Submersion of matter with infinity 'Prakriti' with 'Purus' through the Sadhana of 'Nad', 'Bindu' and 'Dhyan' is the central point of his Submersion Yoga (Lay-Yog). Another note of his poems is the depiction of separation (virah) and love towards God or Rama. Such expressions are intensive, spontaneous and effective. His philosophy is that of Vedanta and Yoga. Although several editions of his works have been published yet there is still a real need for a critical edition.

Hi.M.

DADU DAYAL (Hindi) was a significant saint poet. There is a good deal of controversy about his descent. Some regard him as of Brahman origin, while others say that he was a Muslim. Similarly, there is no unanimity regarding his profession also. This much, however, can be said with certainly that among the saints of the 'Nirguna School' he is second only to Kabirdas– both in influence and literary output. Kabir's name occurs in some of his 'banis'. Some people are, therefore inclined to think that he may have been a disciple of Kabir. This hypothesis becomes untenable in view of the fact that Dadu set up a sect of his own initially under the name of 'Brahma Sampradaya' which was later known as 'Dadu Panth'.

Dadu's only available work is Anabhaivani a collection of his 'sakhis and 'padas'. His philosophy is more or less identical with that of Kabir. Dadu is very liberal in his outlook. He is free from narrow sectarianism and very willing to accept the truth from any quarters. Thus he is a saint in the real sense of the term. His 'banis' are replete with divine love and spiritual sincerity. He has no interest in quibbling as Kabir has. All pervasivensess of the Lord, glory of the guru, rejection of the caste-system, plea for Hindu-Muslim unity, transitoriness of the world and self-realization are some of the themes of his poetry. He cares little for aesthetic excellence; he believes in straightforward communication of the innermost feelings. Consequently, his style is simple, effective and appealing. The language of his 'banis' is western Hindi mixed with Rajasthani.

Dadu has had a fair number of famous disciples like Sundardas (Junior), Rajjab and Jagannath. Towards the end of his life he stopped his wanderings and settled down in Darava where he died at the age of 59.

De.S.

DAFTARY, KESHAV LAXMAN (Marathi; b. 1880, d. 1956) was one of the great oriental research scholars. He was educated at Nagpur and Calcutta. After taking a law degree he started practising at Nagpur. But soon he turned to oriental research and joined national movement for independence. He participated in Tilak's Home rule League's activities alongwith Munje and finally left the legal profession when Gandhiji gave a call for such an action in the non-co-operation movement. He had to fight againt many odds throughout his life, but he never gave up his unwavering devotion to the study of the scriptures. He also studied in depth the three important schools of medicine. Allopathy, Homeopathy and Ayurveda, and evolved his own system through the combination of these, which he felt to be the most effective. He practised his own pathy for the welfare of the masses. In spite of his great learning and research his was a life of many hardships and sheer poverty. He was honoured with the title 'Vidyaratna' (A gem among the learned) by Lokamanya Tilak, and D.Litt. by Nagpur University.

Astronomy was his forte. Taking into consideration his command over the subject Tilak requested him to prepare a Karan-Granth, for the proposition of his new almanac and Daftary did it, with such an accuracy that he was recognised as one of the great mathematicians of the day. Shankar Balkrishna Dixit's History of Indian Astronomy in Marathi is recognised as one of the momumental works in the field of astronomy. Daftary's critical evaluation of the book, Bharatiya Jyotishastra Nirikshana (1920), established him as an expert in the field. Daftary was appointed a member of the Committee of Indian Alamanac-Reforms by the Government of Independent India along with Meghanath Saha. Following Tilak's Gitarahasya, Daftary wrote a book Dharmarahasya (1926) wherein he examined the concept of religion from the rationalist point of view. The point of view expressed in this book gave birth to the pragmatic reformist school of religions in Maharashtra. Karankalpalata (1926) and Jaimishyartha Dipika (1941) are his other important books in oriental research. Daftary proclaimed his belief in socialism and secular state. His commentaries on Upanishadas and lectures delivered in London (1906) on Swami Vivekananda's Vedanta prove his deep study of oriental literature.

Bh.K.

DAGH, NAWAB MIRZA (Urdu; b. 1831, d. 1905) real name Nawab Ibrahim, was the son of Nawab Shams-ud-Din Ahmad of Jhirka Ferozepur who was executed by the British on the charge of engineering the murder of the British resident of Delhi, William Fraser in 1835, after which incident Dagh lived in Rampur and after the re-marriage of his mother with the then Crown Prince Mirza of Delhi lived in the Red Fort for some time. After the death of the Crown Prince in 1856 he continued to live in Delhi but left for Rampur after the 1857 holocaust and settled there as a poet under the patronage of three successive Nawabs. As a disciple of poet Zauq , Dagh dedicated himself to the lucidity of poetic language and diction and the depiction of sensuousness of poetic experience. After serving the Rampur court for 24 years, he migrated to Hyderabad (Andhra Pradesh) in 1888, where he was appointed Court poet in 1891.

His poetic works are: Gulzar-i-Dagh (1878), Masnavi Faryad-i-Dagh (1882), Aftab-i-Dagh (1885), Mahtab-i-Dagh (1893) and Yadgar-i-Dagh (Posthumous, 1905).

'Dagh' was basically interested in maintaining the simplicity and chastity of spoken Urdu in poetry. His emphasis was on correct idiom and usage. His flawless expression and sensousness go deep into his poetry. He made his poetry a vehicle of sensuous delight. He was the product of an age when gaiety was not a taboo and love, even physical gratification, and its manifold aspects were deemed as elements of culture. Dagh was the high priest of such a sensuous poetry. What was really creditable was that he expressed wide range of sensuous experience in flawless idiomatic language of common day speech. This combination of chaste diction with sensuous delight made his poetry so popular that he till then was the poet with the largest number of disciples throughout the sub-continent and among them was no less a poet than Iqbal.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Firaq Gorakhpuri, Andaze; Muhammad Ali Zaidi, Mutala-i-Dagh, Lucknow, 1974., Niaz Fatehpuri (Ed.), Nigar Dagh Number, Lucknow., Nurul Hasan Hashmi, Delhi ka Daliestan-i-Shairi.

M.H.

DAHASU (Sindhi) is one of the forms of folk-poetry in Sindhi. The word 'Daha', in Sindhi means 'ten'. The word 'Daha' when followed by a suffix - su, means 'of ten'. In Sindhi folk poetry Dahasu is used as a technical term denoting a couplet or stanza containing ten synonyms which refer to the beauty of a beloved, or to objects generally used in poetry as standards of comparision of female elegance. In Dahasu, the folk poet generally prefers to use ten synonymous terms selected from ten different dialects or languages, although the second condition does not fall under compulsion. Thus, a Dahasu normally contains synonyms from four or five different sources. Nonetheless an ideal one should have terms from ten different languages.

Dahasu verses are very significant from linguistic point of view, for they show rich vocabulary used in the Sindhi language. It is said that Jalal Khati (18th century) was the first folk-poet who composed Dahasu type of verses artistically. A collection of Dahasu is called Dahasnamo. There are some poetic compositions containing about thirty synonyms on the pattern of Dahasu called Sisu (i.e. stanzas of thirty synonyms:'si' means thirty in Persian and suffix-su denotes of). A collection of 'Sisu' is called Sisnamo.

Dahasu verses form the basis of another main trend in Sindhi folk poetry called Singaru, Sanskrit Shringara, (beauty; love). In this form of poetry the folk-poet delineates in detail the physical grace of his beloved. These two types of Sindhi folk-poetry are directly influenced by the love poetry of Hindi mainly composed during 'Riti' period. It is highly probable that the Sindhi folk-poets got the idea and technique of using synonymous words in stanzas from Khaliq-Bari, a Hindi work of Amir Khusro (1255-1325), where the poet exhibits his knowledge of different languages by using synonymous words in a single verse.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Abdul Karim Sandeelo, Dahasnamo (1971).

M.K.J.

DAHIKATARA (Assamese) is a collection of twentyfive poems by Raghunath Choudhuri (1878-1967). The collection was published in 1931 by Ekata Sabha of Gauhati with the preface written by Banikanta Kakoti, the Assamese scholar of great erudition.

Raghunath Choudhuri is one of the leading poets of the Romantic Era in Assamese poetry. He is popularly known as Bihagikavi, the bird-poet of Assam. Though the ideals of romantic revival of the West influenced him to a great extent he drew inspiration from Indian philosophy which in turn taught him to bear all the sorrows and sufferings of the world stoically.

Dahikatara is undoubtedly the best of the four collections of his poems. The poems in the collection were composed towards the end of his creative life. The first poem of this collection is Dahikatara and as such the collection is also named after this poem. Dahikatara is a tiny bird not very significant in the world of birds in Assam. But in the composition of Choudhuri this tiny bird appeared, apparelled with all the beauties of the universe. Ketaki, (the Assamese Nightingale), another favourite bird of the poet on whom he wrote a beautiful poem, leaves Nature with the advent of Sarat, the autumnal season. It is only Dahikatara who prepares Nature even in the bitter winter to welcome the spring. The bird is the symbol of love and union for a lover suffering from the pangs of separation but ever eager for union.

Few other beautiful poems in the collection are 'Girimallika', 'Puwati Tara', 'Bairagyar Katha', 'Antim Jyoti', 'Fula Sajya', 'Vikshya', 'Govan he elar mor', 'Priya Bihangini'. 'Giri mallika', etc. Girimallika is the second poem in the collection. The poet actually saw this flower in the Manikarneshwar hill of North Gauhati. The very sight of the flowers brought to his mind the glories of ancient India. A few poems of the collection are an expression of his accumulated grief, the result of the sad experiences he had to undergo in life. The description of nature as found in 'Dahikatara', or 'Girimallika' is not merely the description of the beauties of nature as such. One can find here a lot connected with many interesting anecdotes of the life of the poet. A few poems like 'Vikshya' or 'Fulasajya' are the expression of a feeling of renunciation in keeping with Indian philosophical attitude towards worldly life. For Choudhuri the engulfing fire of funeral pyre is as it were the bridal bed (Fula-Sajya), composed of red lotuses.

In this collection Choudhuri has adopted the classical style of poetry. The influence of Kalidasa is very prominent in his poems. He used the similies and metaphors of classical drama in Sanskrit.

Most of the poems in the collection are poems of love. In these poems out of every ten words the reader will definitely find a word for love. But the love of the poet transcends all earthly barriers, a love which pervades and permeates the entire universe. Here there is no smell of personal desire whatsoever.

Ar.S.

DAHIWALA ABDUL GANI ABDUL KARIM (Gujarati; b. 1908) is a poet, ghazalist and singer. Born at Gopipura, he obtained his primary education upto vernacular standard three at Surat. Thereafter, he got occupied in the business of 'Jari' and embriodery work. He is well-known in Gujarat for his profound knowledge of metres of ghazal, his impressive style of representation of a ghazal, and also ghazal compositions.

His anthologies of poetry include Mahek (1931), Gata Zarna (1953), Jashne Shahadat (a poetic ballet, 1957), Madhuram, Nirant, Ganimat, etc. In these volumes, largely songs and ghazals are compiled. He selects any single aspect of anguish or tragedy of human life, and then moulds it artistically in his poetic composition. Most of his poems are imbued with the transient nature of human life. Despite being a traditional poet, he has obtained power to express modern sensibility. His successors have aptly adopted the various experiments which he has carried out in the form of a ghazal. He is a notable poet of post-Independence Gujarati poetry. The emotion, diction and expression of his ghazals have deeply influenced the Gujarati ghazal. Many of his compositions are very popular indeed, and are presented time and again by musicians.

B.J.

DAHYABHAI DHOL SHASI 'NAVEEN' (Gujarati; b. 1867, d. 1902) was born in Ahmedabad. He joined as a clerk in a salt contractor's firm after passing the Matriculation Examination (1884) but was soon dismissed for correcting his boss who mis-spelt the word October. Subsequently he worked as Sanskrit teacher in Mission High School, Ahmedabad. Intitially he wrote poems like 'Atmashiksha' (1883) and 'Champasmaran' (1884, in memory of his first wife). Later he composed long narrative poems like 'Premine Patrika' (1889) and lyrics for plays. In 1888, he took up the challenge of running a theatrical company, thrown by an artist. He worked as partner of Keshavlal Shevlal, the proprietor of Deshi Natak Samaj and produced Sangit Lilavati as Pavitra Lilavati. In 1891, he became the sole proprietor of the company and produced Sati Samyukta and Subhadraharan in a special pandal created for the purpose, which later caught fire destroying all the property including costly costumes and ornaments. Dahyabhai revived the company by selling his wife's ornaments, but his economic condition did not improve. He had to leave his father's house and give up his right of inheriting father's property as the father did not approve of son's activity, which was looked down upon by the high-brows in those days.

Dahyabhai stuck to his mission. He staged Municipal Election and Ashrumati in Baroda under the patronage of Sayajirao Gaikwad. He built pakka theatres, Anand Bhavan (1893) and Shanti Bhavan (1896), in Ahmedabad. In 1895, production of Ashrumati proved a grand success in Bombay, where he built Zaveri Theatre. This was followed by Veenaveli, Umadevi, Tarasundari, Sardarba and Mohinichandra.

Dahyabhai used theatre as a means of social service and upliftment of the poor. He organised charity shows of his popular plays in Bombay and collected Rs. one lakh for the famine relief fund in 1900.

Dahyabhai's contribution to Gujarati theatre is two-fold: as a playwright and as a director. Under the pseudonym Naveen he wrote more than 20 plays. He worked on a variety of themes—mythological, historical, social. His plays exhibit niceties of human sentiments effectively. He has exploited dramatic devices of Kalidasa and Shakespeare in his own way. He composed songs with poetic fervour which had lasting appeal to his audience. As mentioned in the prologue of the play Sati Parvati he treated drama as a mirror of contemporary life. His foremost contribution to Gujarati theatre is the creation of comic villians like Dhamlo Mali (Veenavali) and Dhana Desai (Mohinichandra). He appended a sub-plot of humorous episodes to the main plot. He was the first Gujarati playwright to exploit a variety of shades of Gujarati language to weave dialogues of dramatic significance and theatrical display. In his plays like Veenavali and Ashrumati the balance of dramatic and theatrical appeal is maintained, but, later it degenerated into theatrical artificiality, which became a chronic malady of professional Gujarati theatre. As a producer, Dahyabhai excelled his contemporaries in erecting gorgeous settings and clever trick-scenes, which again turned into a weakness of Gujarati theatre. Dahyabhai took Gujarati play from narration to action. He passed away in the prime of his youth, when he was at the height of his glory. He lifted Gujarati theatre from vulgarity to artistic excellence.

Bh.T.

DAI, LUMMER (Assamese), born in Arunachal, started writing in the fifties in the pages of the Ramdhenu and soon established himself as a novelist of worth. Till date, he has written four novels: Prthivir Hanhi (Smiles of the Earth, 1963), Man aru Man (Mind and Mind, 1968) and *Kainar Dam (*Price of a Bride, 1983).

Dai depicts in his novels the life of the Arunachalis in its changing socio-economic setting. In Prthivir Hanhi, the manners and customs of the Adis get reflected as the novel shows the decadence of the traditional Adi society against the inroads made by the modern civilization. The second major novel, Man aru Man suggests the need for welcoming the changes that replace many old ways of life of the tribes of Arunachal. It tells a refreshing story through the relationship of an old widow and her dog. Dai's Assamese (his adopted language) has also a refreshing style that is simple and plain and yet adequate and moving.

go.S.

DAKA (Maithili; 800-1000) was an aphoristic poet. Born in the Ahira (milkman) community of Mithila, Daka also known as Ghagha in Uttar Pradesh and as Danka in Rajasthan–flourished sometime before the 14th century A.D. and has left an ineffaceable mark on the rural life. He wrote a number of his verses now found in old manuscripts of Mithila preserved in the Raj Library (now S.S. Sanskrit University Library) of Darbhanga. Some scholars believe that he was the son of Varahamihira, the great astronomer and flourished sometime in the 6th century A.D. a period which is even earlier than the composition of the Buddha Gana o'Doha. Others, however, place him in the 10th century A.D. In view of these conflicting evidence we are not in a position to determine the exact period of his birth and death in the present state of our knowledge.

The writings of Daka belong to the earliest stage of Maithili though his language has been undergoing changes from generation to generation. A good collection of the sayings of Daka has been published by J. Christian in the Bihar Proverbs (1891). The aphorisms of Daka relate mainly to astrology and agricultural life and pithy sayings of various kinds, and forms probably the most popular branch of the useful folklore. He appears to have been a great astronomer of his age and all his sayings are based entirely on the numerous astronomical works such as Muhurtta-chintamani, Kasyapa Samhita, Bhrigu Samhita, Narada Samhita, Varahi Samhita, etc. which is clear from a study of his various sayings and predictions collected by scholars like J. Christian and Jivananda Thakur.

Though a historical personality, Daka has now passed into a legend and a cycle of stories have been woven round his personality which make confusion worse confounded as regards his identity. In any case, it cannot be doubted that he was probably the most popular folk-poet of his time whose sayings found their way into other parts of India like the poems of Vidyapati. However, it is difficult to say as to how far the sayings of Daka can be taken to be the compositions of a single individual.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Christian, Bihar Proverbs (English, Patna, 1891)., Jivananda Thakur, Maithila Daka (Darbhanga, 1949-50)., M.M. Umesh Mishra, Daka (Hindi)., Praphullachandra Goswami, Dakavachanamrita.

U.T.

DAKGHAR (Bengali) is a playlet by Rabindranath Tagore, first staged on 10th October, 1910 at Bichitra Bhavan, and first published in 1912. It belongs to the allegorical-symbolical genere with necessary touch of reality. It is one of the best plays of Tagore. The plot is short, but it contains the elements of tense human drama and a deeply suggestive spiritual symbol. Amal, the hero of the play is a sick child. Madhab Datta his foster father, thinks that Amal is a stranger to his family and it is very difficult to save his life. The doctor (Kabiraj) thinks that the outer wind, the autumn sun and the dampness are harmful to the ailing boy. Accordingly Amal is confined to a room and not allowed to go outside. But the boy has a powerful imagination and a strong sense of beauty. He looks at the outer world from the window of his room and is charmed by the colourful spectacle of life. He sees that a curd-seller is coming from a distant village near the hills, the watchman is going on his beats, a little girl is passing by with a basket of flowers and the children are playing nearby. All these make Amal joyous and fanciful. He discovers romance in the daily activities of the people. He also invests them with his romantic longing. Day by day Amal enjoys all these things and pines for the far-away. He is so much sensitive that he can see the King's postman coming down the hillside. Thakurda informs Amal of the state-physician (Raj-vaidya) under whose treatment he will be completely cured. He also assures him of the letter from the King. At the end of the play the Royal Physician comes at midnight. The doors and windows of Amal's room are all thrown open. Amal gets full comfort by the touch of the Royal Physician and he falls asleep. He is apparently dead. The boy gets the moment of union with the King or God. The play Dakghar (The post office) moves on two planes. Outwardly in the story of Amal there is yearning of the mind for the things afar. But there is also a deeper meaning underneath. It suggests the yearning of the soul. In the light of the spiritual significance Amal is an allegory of human soul. As our soul is a stranger to this world, so Amal had connection with none. Madhab stands for a worldly wise man. The headman symbolic of a blind society devoid of great ideal, high thought and aim of life. Amal gets a call from the King to go home. Thakurda is a connecting link between the human soul and the greater soul. At the ripe moment, the Royal Physician brings the message of emancipation and Amal is in union with God. So the shadow of death cannot darken the play.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Durgashankar Mukherjee, Rabindra Natya Samiksha., Edward Thomson, Rabindranath: Poet and Dramatist., P.N. Bisi, Rabindra Natya Prabaha.

Du.M.

DAKKANI URDU (Urdu). The age-old confusion as regards the origin, scientific classification and clear cut demarcation of Urdu and the Dakkani language and literature persists till date as no systematic study of the subject appears to have been made by linguistic and research scholars. But for the patronage and large scale material help accorded to Urdu by the Nizam of Hyderabad and his government the question might never have been raised. There is, however, enough historical evidence to show that the language (Urdu) evolved primarily in the South Indian States of Golconda and Bijapur. This evidence, which is available in the form of the literature of the period, is quite helpful although not altogether reliable to trace the history of the Dakkani (Urdu) language and literature.

Urdu emerged as an independent dialect towards the end of the 14th century with Khari Boli as its base and was called by the earlier writers as Zubane-i-Dehalvi or Hindustani. That is to say that like Hindi it is Indian in origin and has the same grammar and basic vocabulary. In their literary (written) form, however, the two languages have separate identities on account of their different scripts. As against Devanagari adopted by Hindi, Urdu which developed under Muslim influence, adopted the Perso-Arabic script which facilitated the introduction into its vocabulary, idioms as also its the literary terms and themes of Persian–which itself had imbibed many Arabic and Turkish elements. It was thus a mix and served as a medium of intercourse between the people of India and elements of Muslims from the Islamic countries. The cradle of Urdu literature was the South, where it was transplanted, first by Alla-ud-Din Khilji (whose arm ies had conquered and annexed Maharashtra, Andhra and Karnataka to the Khilji Empire) and later by Muhammad Tughlak (who had transferred his capital and its population from Delhi to Daulatabad in 1326-27) and it flourished in the quiet and peaceful atmosphere of the kingdoms of Golconda and Bijapur. In its homeland, namely Delhi and the adjoining areas, Persian, the court language of the Mughals, continued to reign supreme.

The fusion of the spoken language of the North (imposed upon the South by its Muslim conquerors) and the southern languages resulted gradually in the evolution of a somewhat peculiar form which came to be known as Dakkani Urdu. The Bahmani kingdom, the first independent Muslim State in the South (1347-1526) despite its long rule did not contribute much to Dakkani literature as such, but its adoption of this new language as its court's language in preference to Persian, helped the process of its gradual growth and development as the dominant linguistic force of the area, and continued to draw strength and sustenance from the cultures of both the North and the South. Ferozeshah, the 8th Bahmani king, who himself was also a poet, was regarded as the founder of Dakkani Urdu. The earlist available works in Dakkani-Urdu, namely Miraj-ul-Ashiquin, Khulasa-e-Tohid, Risala-Sharha, Qalma Tibia, Tamshil Nama and many geets and Suhaile are attributed to Syed Muhhamad Husaini, better known as Khawaja Banda Nawaz Gesu-Daraz (a mystic saint). His father, Syed Yusaf Husaini alias Shah Raju Qatal (Pen name-'Raja') was also an accomplished poet of Persian (Risala Shah Raju named after him, still exists in Gulbarga). Theirs was one of the eminent families of Delhi who had shifted to Daulatabad, the new Metropolis of Muhammed Tughlak. Such was its linguistic refinement that the Dakkani Urdu was also made the national and court language in Golconda and Bijapur, two of the five Muslim states that had risen on the ruins of Bahmani dynasty, a century and a half before Urdu acquired a literary status in the North. During this long period (1590-1730). Dakkani which had undergone a process of independent growth and development borrowing inevitably and freely from Marathi, Tamil, Telugu and other local languages and dialects had a flourishing literary career.

The kings of Golconda and Bijapur were fine scholars and generous patrons of the arts. They attracted many great poets and scholars from far and near. These scholars made splendid efforts to refine Dakkani Urdu, modelling it on Persian patterns. Except for the Ghazal which followed the Hindi tradition, all other forms of poetry ('Qasida' and 'Masnavi' mainly) were adapted from Persian with its diction, imagery and metres. Despite this wholesale dependence on Persian, the Dakkani literature was able to retain its southern identity.

'Masnavi' was by far the most popular of the poetic genres of Dakkani Urdu and there was hardly any poet who did not contribute his bit to enriching it whether by way of direct translations from Persian or by writings based on its romantic and historical works. The language of many of these 'Masnavis' very often presents compounds of Hindi and Persian or Hindi and Arabic discarding original spelling in favour of phonetic spellings.

Two Adil Shahi poets of Bijapur, Kamal Khan Rustami and Nusrati, are considered very important. Rustami, son of Ismail Khan, who held hereditary title of 'Khattat Khan', was the author of the Masnavi Khawar-Nama (1649), a romantic adventure on the pattern of Dasten-e-Amir Hamza and a free rendering of an earlier Persian poem (bearing the same title) composed by Ibn-e-Hasan in 1470. That Persian poem, in turn was modelled on the Shah Nama of Firdousi. This 'Masnavi', which was written at the instance of Princess Khadija Begum, wife of Muhammad Adil Shah of Bijapur, comprises 24,000 lines and is regarded as the longest 'Masnavi' in Dakkani Urdu. Two manuscript copies of this 'Masnavi' are preserved in the India Office Library and the third in the British Museum, London.

Nusrati of Karnataka on whom Abdul Haw has written an informative book flourished in the reign of Ali Adil Shah and was the Court's poet laureate. He was a prolific writer who besides Ghazals and 'Qasidas' wrote Gulshan-e-Ishq, Ali Nama and Tarikh-e-Sikandari. While Gulshan-e-Ishq as the title implies, is a long drawn tale of the conventional type, Ali Nama is a long historical poem dealing with the wars of his patron, Ali Adil Shah with the Mughals and the Marathas. Nusrati's narrative is vivid, forceful and full of flights of poetic imagination. It has the ring of an epic and reveals the poet's religious zeal and intense patriotism. Ali is presented as a defender of the Faith, as well as a patriotic prince who holds his own against the mighty Mughals and chastises the Marathas.

Tarikh-e-Sikandri, composed in a minor key, is a comparatively slender work dealing with the successor of Ali Adil Shah when Bijapur had lost much of its military greatness.

Among other writers of Bijapur, the two mystics, Shah Miranji Shamsuluhaq (d. 1496) and his son, Burhan-ud-Din Janam (d. 1582) also deserve mention : the former for his poems 'Khush Nama' and 'Khush Nazh' and the latter for 'Irshad Nama' and 'Wasiyat-ul-hadt'. One may question the literary merit of these poems, but their linguistic significance is beyond doubt.

The literary scene in Golconda was distinctly richer as its rulers were not only patrons of the arts, but themselves literary craftsmen of calibre. Muhammad Quli Qutb Shah, the greatest of the Golconda kings who reigned for 31 years (1580–1612), was indeed an accomplished poet. He was the first ever Sahib-e-Dewan poet of Dakkani Urdu who brought its poetry out of the obscure groves of the mystics into the open sunshine of normal life and introduced secular note in a poetry that had all along been mainly religious.

Other outstanding Qutb-Shahi poets of Golconda include : Vajhi, the famous author of the Masnavi Qutb-o-Mushtari (1609) and the first prose work in Urdu Sab Ras (1635), Ghavvasi, author of Qissa-e-Saif-ul Mulak-o-Badi-ul-Jamal and Tuti Nama (1639), Ibn-e-Nishati, who wrote Phul Ban in 1655 and Tabi of Qissa-e-Behram-o-gul-Andam (1670) derived from Nizami's Haft Paikar.

Qutb-o-Mushtari of Vajhi tells the tale of a prince who falls in love with an unknown princess in a dream and after many great dangers and hardships is ultimately successful in winning over her love. It is generally held that the poem tells indirectly the love story of Sultan Muhammad Shah (the poet's patron) and his courtesan Bhagmati and was written with the primary motive of pleasing the king. Vajhi's style, as also his smooth, fluent and speedy narrative are indicative of his great skill and literary craftsmanship. His Sab Ras, an allegory of love, in rhyming prose is full of archaisms, grammatical peculari-ities and tricks of style, which, however, are not beyond comprehension. Abdul Haq, who is perhaps the only scholar to have devoted time and attention to a systematic study of the Dakkani Urdu literature and tried to make it available to the reader in a suitable form, finds this work an unacknowledged translation, with a few omissions and additions, of a Persian Masnavi by Yahya Ibn Sabek Fattahi (d. 1448). The allegory, according to him, also bears a remarkable resemblance to that of the Raman de la Rose which also like Sab Ras, sums up the conventions of love in the age of chivalry in Europe.

Ghavvasi's Qissa-e-Saif-ul-Muluk-o-Badi-ul-Jamal is a 14000 lines long poem telling the story of the love of Saif-ul-Muuk, an Egyptian prince, with a Chinese princess. The plot of the story in traceable in the Arabian Nights. His Tuti Nama (the tales of a Parrot) is a clever poetical rendering of a Persian work of the same name by Ziya-ud-Din who in turn had derived his story from Sanskrit.

Nishati's Phul Ban also a long drawn romance (spread over 3000 lines) is the translation of Basatin, a Persian work of Ahmad Zubairi who flourished in the reign of Muhammad Tughlak.

The second half of the 17th century was a time of political unrest resulting from the disintegration of Deccan. Ahmadnagar and Khandesh having already fallen to Akbar's forces in 1600, the Nizam Shahi Kingdom of Daulatabad was an easy job for his grand son Shah Jahan to annex it in 1633. Bijapur and Golconda were similarly annexed to the Mughal Empire a little later. These conquests brought in their wake devastating changes and almost the entire Deccan, including Gujarat where Aurangabadi, an offshoot of Dakkani, was the dominant language, came well within the cultural and linguistic orbit of the North. As a matter of fact Aurangabadi form of Dakkani-Urdu had already imbibed the influence of the North over a period of time becoming almost identical with the Urdu of Delhi. Vali Dakkani (1667-1741) and his contemporaries like Siraj-ud-Din (1715-1763) and Mirza Daud among several others who had adopted Aurangabadi for literary expressions wrote in the Delhi type of Urdu barring a few differences of idiom, phraseology and pronunciation. Thus fully colonised by the North, the South per force had to accept changes in their language dictated by the North. The Aurangabadi poets, especially Vali with his Diwan, emerged on the literary horizon of Delhi.

Vali Dakkani (or Aurangabadi), Siraj-ud-Din (who wrote Siraj-e-Sukhan) and Mirza Daud along with other poets and scholars of Dakkani-Urdu, fill the gap of some two centuries between the original emergence of Urdu as a distinctly recognisable idiom in the North and its ultimate evolution into a literary language. To many scholars Dakkani-Urdu was the solid foundation on which was raised the magnificent edifice of Urdu-e-Mualla of 'Ghalib' or the Urdu as we find it today–the language of the composite culture of India.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Maulana Muhammed Husain Azad, Ab-i-Hayat., Muhammad Sadiq, A History of Urdu Literature, London, 1964.

B.V.

DALAL CHIMANLAL DAHYABHAI (Gujarati; b. 1881) a research scholar and editor of medieval literature, ardent student of Indian poetics, and compiler of the Index of Manuscripts, was born at Kheda (Kaira).

He obtained his primary and secondary education at his native place, and later on at Ahmedabad. He studied upto M.A. Because of his knowledge of the scientific usage of library and manuscripts store-houses, he had been allotted the task of the survey of store-houses containing ancient and rare volumes, by the erstwhile Baroda State. He was also appointed as the Director of Prachya Vidya Mandir (Oriental Institute) of Baroda State and organizer of 'Prachin Gujar Granth-Mala'.

Out of a number of ancient books annotated and edited by him, mention may be made of Kavyamimamsa of Rajshekhar, Linganushasan of Vaman, Vasant-Vials of Balchandrasuri, Rupak-Shatak of Vatsraj, Mohraj Parajay Natak of Yashpal, Hammir mad-Mardan of Jaysinh, Uday Sundari Katha of Soddhal, Bhavissayattkaha of Dhanpal, Gankarika of Bhashrvagna, etc. He has edited all these volumes in a scientific manner.

While editing the ancient theory of poetics or a book.

his erudition, his devotion to study and his minute sense of extreme carefulness are clearly visible from his critical evaluation, as also his style of representation. In the introductions of these books, scholars have found the appropriateness of Dalal's research technique. Over and above this, he has also edited the anthologies such as Narnarayan, Parth-Parakram-Vyayog, etc.

He rendered guidance to Lalchand Bhagwanji, a renowned scholar of this subject, in the matter of preparing the lists of manuscript-volumes of Jesalmer, and of Palm-leaf manuscript-volumes preserved in the Jain store-houses of Patan. In this way, his accomplishments as well as his services rendered as an expert in Indology, as a research scholar and as an editor are of immense value.

B.J.

DALAL, JAYANTI (Gujarati; b. 1909, d. 1970) was a Gujarati dramatist and story writer. As his father Ghelabhai was the organiser of the Deshi Natak Samaj, he practically grew up on the stage. The impressions so formed contributed greatly to his being equipped as a dramatist and also as a director and actor. He studied at the Gujarat College of Ahmedabad. He had a brilliant academic career, but, after joining the national movement, he left college in 1930 during the final year of the B.A. course. Thereafter, he was associated throughout his life with nationalist activities and with the theatre and literary activities. He was an intellectual socialist thinker and also an active social and national worker.

He was a front rank writer who, in the field of one-Act plays, showed creativity of a high order and introduced numerous innovations, with a complete knowledge of the stage craft. Works such as Soi nun nakun, Draupadi no sahkar and Joiye-chhey, Joiye chhiye are examples of his innovative power. A theme that is very close to life, dialogues marked by brilliant satire, forcefulness resulting from scintillating conversation, terseness of diction and an unconventional style of depiction, effective presentation of theme on the stage–are his peculiarities. Because of his very terse style which is subtle, his dialogues have occasionally remained difficult to understand. Javanika (1941), Pravesh Bijo (1950), Pravesh Trijo (1953) and Chotho Pravesh (1957) are collections of his one-act plays. He has also written some four or five collections of children's plays including Rangtoran and a three Act play, Avtaran (1949).

As a story-writer also, Jayanti Dalal was innovative. He wrote stories with a technique which depended more for their appeal upon psychic states than external incidents. Of his art as a story writer, the principal characteristics are–spontaneous creation of symbols, depiction of various levels of feeling heightened by visual imagery and the use of language which has the naturalness of conversational speech and is yet pregnant with meaning. Although he often experiments with technique, his stories centre on genuine experiences and intellectual conviction. By nature, he was reflective and he had a living contact with society. He had a capacity to understand the society and to grasp the internal world of each individual. This also widened the canvas of his creativity. With this experience and a knowledge of formal technique he has given us excellent stories.

Ra.S.

DALAL, SURESH PURUSHOTTAMDAS (Gujarati; b. 1932), poet, critic, essayist, writer of children's literature, editor and translator, was born at Thana. He passed his B.A. examination in 1953 from St. Xavier's College, Bombay and his M.A. Examination in 1955 from Bombay University with Gujarati as his principal subject. He obtained the degree of Ph.D. from Bombay University in 1969. He worked in K.C. Arts College, Bombay from 1956 to 1964, simultaneously working as a part-time Lecturer in Gujarati, in Kirti College, from 1958 to 1960, and in H.R. College of Commerce, from 1960 to 1964. He joined K.J. Somaiya College, Bombay, in 1964 as a Professor and Head of Gujarati Department and later on, joined S.N.D.T. Women's University, Bombay, as a Professor and Head of Gujarati Department.

His poetry-collections include Ekant (1966), Tarikhnu Ghar (1971), Astitva(1973), Nam Lakhi Daun (1975), Hastakshar and Symphony (1977), Skyscraper (1980), Ek Anami Nadi (1982) and Ghatna (1984). Suresh Dalal enjoys a conspicuous position as a song-writer among Gujarati poets. Nam Lakhi Daun is a collection of his songs, whereas Skyscraper includes his poems selected from his previous collections.In his poems, we constantly come across the narration of love, dejection and undulations of city life. His poetic diction, embellished with harmony, images and symbols has won him popularity. His sonnets, longer poems and some of his prose-poems are noteworthy.

His critical works include Apeksha (1958), Char Kavi (1980), Prakriya (1981), Impressions (1984), etc. He gives appreciation of poetry with exhaustive quotations. He has published a number of monographs including those on Narsinh Mehta, Khabardar, etc.

His essays are compiled in a number of volumes, such as Mari Bariethi, Part 1, 2 (1975), Sav Eklo Dariyo (1978), Chaheraona Vanman (1978), Mari Aaspaasno Rasto (1981), Paqlaothi Panth Ek Footyo (1981), Sami-Sanjna Shamiyanaman (1981), Bhoora Aakashni Aasha (1982), Mojane Chindhwa Sahela Nathi (1984), etc. His essays are marked by poetic expressions. His personal essays and character-sketches evaluating the life and character of individuals are worth mentioning.

He has, to his credit, about fifty books consisting of poems and stories for children which won for him immense popoularity. He has contributed to the enrichment of children's literature in Gujarati. His stories are collected under the title Pin-Cushion (1978).

He has published selections from the poetry of Sundaram, Umashankar, Harindra Dave, Balmukund Dave, Jayant Pathak, etc. His introductions to these edited works reflect his love for poetry.

Uphar (1957), Kavino Shabda (1958) and Tapovan (1959) are critical anthologies on Kant, Umashankar and Sundaram edited by him. He has also compiled and edited some short stories by Sundaram and Jayant Khatri. Kavya Vishwa edited by him contains translations of Indian and the European poems into Gujarati by various writers.

From 1958 to 1963, he had worked as Editor of a poetic journal Kavi Lok, from 1967 onwards he has been editing a bi-monthly Kavita published by Janmabhumi group of papers.

His adaptation and translation of Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra in a short-form, his translation of Borden Dill's Dunbar's Cove under the title Matini Mamta (1963), and yet another translation of Nathaniel Hawthorne's novel The House of Seven Gables under the title Chandni-ni-Loo (1967), as also his translations of the books of Marathi poetry by eminent poets like P.S. Rege and Mangesh Pandgaoker, all these aptly reflect his interest and skill in translation work.

B.J.

DALGADO, MGR. SEBASTIAO RODOLFO (Konkani; b. 1855, d. 1922) was an Orientalist and Lexicographer. He studied at Rachol, Goa, took his doctorate in Canon and Civil Law, Rome. He was a Lecturer of Sanskrit, Lisbon University, a Fellow of Academy of Sciences, Vicar General of Ceylon, Bengal and Honawar (India). A polyglot of repute he mastered nearly a dozen languages of East and West. A scholar of Sanskrit and Konkani, he carefully brought out points of similarity between the two. He wrote Rudimentos da Lingua Sanscritica (Rudiments of Sanskrit Language), Nala Damayanti (Nala and Damayanti, 1916), translation of an episode from the Mahabharata, Hitopadesha, Instrucao Util (Hitopadesha, Useful Instruction) the first ever work from Sanskrit to be translated into Portuguese. His Diccionario Komkani-Portuguez (Konkani-Portuguese Dictionary, 1983) and Diccionario Portuguez-Komkani (Portugese-Konkani Dictionary 1903) with a scholarly introduction are landmarks in Konkani lexicography. His Florilegio dos Proverbios Concanis (Bouquet of Konkani Proverbs, 1922), a compilation of over two thousand proverbs in Konkani is a monumental work. His manuscript of Gramatica da Lingua Concani (Grammar of Konkani Language, 1922) written in Portuguese follows a scientific approach. His frequent contributions to the then Heralo (Portuguese magazine published from Goa) on linguistic topics are examples of fine scholarhsip and logical mind. In Influencia de Vocabulario-Portuguez em Linguas Asiaticas (Influence of Portuguese Vocabulary on Asiatic Languages, 1913) and Glossario Luso-Asiatico (Luso-Asiatic Glossary, 1921) he examines Portuguese vocables coming into Asiatic languages and he explains nearly 5,500 Oriental words that became part of Portuguese language and how according to the usage amongst Portugese they came to be in vogue among Portuguese writers. Glossario based on dictionaries and vocabularies of fifty languages, on 400 authors makes the work unique. This work was later translated into English by Antonio Xavier Soares, for Oriental Studies, Baroda. Contribuicao para Lexicologia Luso-Oriental (Contribution for Luso-Oriental Lexicology, 1916) and Gonsalves Viana e a Lexicologia Portuguesa de Origem Asiatico-Africana (Gonsalves Viana and Portuguese Lexicology of Asian-African Origin, 1917) are monographs integrated in the aforesaid glossary and commentary. Dialecto Indo-Portuguez de Ceilao (Indo-Portuguese Dialect of Ceylon), Dialecto Indo Portuguez de Damao (Indo-Portuguese Dialect of Daman, 1903) Berco duma Cancao (Birth of a Song, 1917) are some of his further contributions to the study of the dialects.

A.P.S.T.

DALIT LITERATURE (Marathi) is mainly the product of socio-cultural changes in Maharashtra accelerated after independence. A new awareness was already kindled among the downtrodden classes through the efforts of Mahatma Phule and Ambedkar. As a result literature of protest emerged in Maharashtra. The process of the liberation of the downtrodden, started in the 19th century, gained momentum through the efforts of Ambedkar in the 20th century and found its expression in the Dalit literature. This literary movement though partially influenced by Marxist thought and Negro literature of America, is rightly called a 'Ambedkarite movement' as the thoughts and actions of Ambedkar remained its major guiding force. Ambedkar kindled a spirit of dignity and freedom, first through the agitational methods and then through the Indian constitution which he was instrumental in framing. After the death of Ambedkar, the downtrodden community was frustrated and its hopes were shattered. It started experiencing that whatever it was entitled to by law was denied to it in practice by society. The younger generation started reacting against the society with hatred and anger.

Thus the Dalit literature is not a just literary event. It is the outcome of social injustice meted out to a class which has not remained what it was for the ages. A class of impatient and articulate young men are at the centre of this movement. When they found out that the strata of higher class remained unchanged and engaged constantly in tormenting and humiliating the untouchables as in the past, it reacted bitterly and forcefully. Literature has been one of their chief mediums. It has reacted with brutal frankness, exposed the atrocities of higher society with burning anger and hatred and called for ruthless vengeance against the society and people who have created such inequality and inhuman atmosphere.

Though this literature aims at total revolution and uplift of the entire lower classes, it has remained primarily a movement of Mahar Community in Maharashtra to which Ambedkar belonged. To challenge the established code of society and organize revenge against it has remained its main character. To express powerfully, the injustice meted out to this community, its pangs and affliction has remained the main characteristic of this literature. It is modelled on the lines of Black Panthers of the United States. Though the majority of Dalit wrtiers come from the rural areas they refuse to associate themselves with provincial, regional or pastoral literature. Mood of darkness and violence is often exhibited with full force in it.

It calls itself a literature of action. It takes upon itself the responisbility of complete social change. As such it thinks of itself as a powerful instrument of such a change. Its emphasis is on realistic exposure of the society. Thus it has become a literature of extreme situations. Anger, affliction, protest and refusal are the main features of this literature.

As it has been engaged in portraying the specific experiences of a particular community, it has become propagandist and collective rather than individualistic in nature.

Fifty per cent or even more of the Dalit literature consists of poetry. It is in free or blank verse. Younger generation has found this form convenient to express its aspirations and frustrations, convictions and courage.

Namdeo Dhasal, Daya Pawar, Waman Nimbalkar, Keshav Meshram and Yeshwant Manohar are major poets. Short-story comes next. These stories aptly describe the pangs and vibrations of this community. Shankarrao Kharat, Baburao Bagul, Arjun Dangle, Yogiraj Waghmare, Amitabha, etc. are the important story writers. Compared to short story, the Dalit novel is less developed. Dalit theatre is a recent phenomenon. Though one of the early plays Yugyatra by M.B. Chitnis was staged during 1956, it gained momentum in the eighties. Kalokhachya Garbhat, Pani Naslele Gao, Aata Ramrajya Yetaya are the important Dalit plays staged recently. Street plays written by Dalit authors have been most successful. An atmosphere of social change is a common ground of expression in these plays.

Dalit literature has made its significant contribution to Marathi literature through its autobiographies. Balute by Daya Pawar, Upara by Laxman Mane, Aathavaniche Pakshi by P.E. Sonkamble, Mukkam Post Devache Gothane by Madhav Kondvikar, Taral Antaral by Shankarrao Kharat, Phanjar by Nanasaheb Zodge are some of the renowned autobiographies.

Compared to the above forms, thoughtful and serious literature is less in quantity. Raosaheb Kasbe, Gangadhar Pantawane, Keshav Meshram, Baburao Bagul, Yeshwant Manohar have contributed to serious literature and literary criticism.

It can be seen from this that within 25 years of its existence Dalit literature has become a major literary movement in Marathi. Its distinct nature has extended and enlarged the horizon of Marathi literature.

G.M.K.

DALPAT BHAI DALPATRAI (Sindhi; b. 1769, d. 1849) was a Sindhi saint poet born in a Hindu Amil family of Sevhan, the place where the shrine of Sufi saint Pir Usman Shah Marvandi, better known as Lal Shahbaz, is located. In the absence of any recorded evidence, very little is known about the life of Dalpat. It is, however, evident from his poetry that he had acquired proficiency in Persian, Sindhi and Hindi languages, and that he had good knowledge of Sufism and Vedanta philosophy. Dalpat was in the service of Talpur rulers of Sindh, but when he came in contact with Bhai Asardas of Hyderabad, who was a well known Sindhi saint poet, his company had impact on Dalpat which in turn changed his attitude towards life. He left his job, gave up worldly affairs and became a disciple of Bhai Asardas. Dalpat spent the rest of his life in the service of his master, acquiring more and more knowledge from his Guru as a seeker on the path of spirituality and self realization.

Dalpat's poetry has been compiled and published by Mulchand J. Thakur with the title Sufi Dalpatram Ja Sindhi Saloka (Sindhi poetry of Sufi Dalpat, 1938). The major thought of Dalpat's poetry is a synthesis of Sufism and Advaita Vedanta. He was highly influenced by the poetry of Hindi saints following the tradition of Nirguna Bhakti (worship of the supreme soul having no form and qualities). Like Kabir, he has often criticised evils prevalent in the society and has propagated equality and unity of different castes, classes and communities.

M.K.J.

DALPATIRAI (Hindi; 18th century) was a poet of 'Ritikal'. The dates of his birth and death are not exactly known. However, the book which Dalapatirai wrote in collaboration with Banshidhar, viz, the Alankar-Ratnakar is said to have been composed in 1735. Thus his birth can be placed either in the last decade of the 17th century or the early years of the first decade of the 18th cent... Dalpatirai was a resident of Ahmedabad (Gujarat) but finally settled in Udaipur (Rajasthan) as he became the court poet of Maharaja Jagatsingh of Udaipur.

Dalpatirai is famous for his commentary named Alankar Ratnakar on Bhasha Bhushan of Maharaja Jaswant Singh which he wrote along with Banshidhar. The Alankar Ratnakar is an authentic work of figures of speech and, according to Ram Chandra Shukla, Alankar Ratnakar is related to Bhasha Bhushan in the same way as Kuvalayananda, is related to Chandralok. Braj Bhasa prose has also been used in the book in explaining the illustrations of various figures of speech alankars in different verses, some of which are written by other poets also.

Ma.C.

DALPATRAM (Gujarati; b. 1820, d. 1898) belonged to the Swaminarayan sect and studied poetics under a saint of the sect Devananda from 1834 to 1841. He was very much impressed by the mediaeval story reciter, Shamal and in his young age he wrote two stories in the same strain but after the study of poetics and under the influence of ethical standards of Swaminarayan sect, he destroyed his earlier writings, thinking of those works as sub-standard. Besides writings in Gujarati, he also wrote in Brij dialect of Hindi and produced Jnan Chaturi (Easy passage to knowledge) and Kavya Chaturi (Easy way to poetry). He has also written about the life of Sahajananda Swami–founder of the Swaminarayan sect–in Brij dialect. He came in contact with an English officer Forbs who engaged him for working for the development of Gujarati literature. They developed intimacy and indirectly through Forbs Dalpatram got himself acquainted with European literature. He was appointed Assistant Secretary of Gujarati Varnacular society founded by Forbs. He then started a periodical Buddhi Prakash (light of the intellect), in 1850 and was its editor till 1878.

Dalpatram has by his essays like 'Bhutnibandh' (an essay on ghost, 1849), 'Jnatinibadh' (an essay on caste 1851) and 'Balvivah Nibandh' (an essay on child marriage 1854) substantially contributed to the development of Gujarati prose in the initial stages, but he has a permanent place in Gujarati as a poet loved and respected by intellectuals and illiterates alike. He had mastery over expression. Many poets who succeded him took their inspiration from him. He is considered to be one of the two top ranking poets of his age. Forbs used to call him Kavishwar (Lord of the poets), because of his popularity with the masses as a poet.

He has written hundreds of short poems like Garbis (poems to be sung while dancing) lyrics, couplets, dialectic poems, humorous poems, nature poems, poems on social reforms; and almost on every subject on the earth. As he studied poetics for years, the formal side of his poetry was flawless. Even his diadectic poems are able to entertain because of his mastery over style. He had so much mastery over the language and versification that he could instantly compose a poem in an assembly.

In his longer poems also we find a variety. 'Hunnerkhanni Chadhai' (1851) is an allegory on the extinction of Indian industries and crafts because of the onslaught of foreign goods. 'Vena Chartia' (1868) is a narrative poem, its central theme being widow remarriage. Its speciality is that he has adopted mediaeval style of large narrative poems called Akhyana. 'Forbs Viraha' (1865) is an elegy on the death of Forbs, his patron and it is the first elegy in Gujarati literature.

He has also written songs to be sung by women at the time of wedding ceremony in his Manglik Gitawali.

He also prepared a primer for students and wrote stories and poems with the object of educating and entertaining them. In 1855 he wrote a book on metres which is named Dalpat Pingal. It was the first book of the kind in the Gujarati literature.

Based on the story of a Greek drama, which he heard from Forbs he wrote a drama entitled Laxminatak (1851) and on the basis of a folk tale wrote the original play Mithyabhiman (Vain Ego, 1871). Its dramatic style is that of a folk drama known as Bhavai.

He compiled two books of mediaeval Gujarati poetry-Kavyadohan, Part I & II (1860-1862).

He was a bridge between mediaeval and modern era. Utmost simplicity of diction and style is the most noteworthy feature of Dalpatram's poetry. There is nothing ambiguous or complex in it, and it provides healthy entertainment to the masses.

C.M.

DALPATVILASA (Rajasthani) is a prose work dealing with the life of Dalpatsingh, heir-apparent to the 'gaddi' of Bikaner during Akbar's reign. He was born of Jasamade, daugher of Rana Udaysinha of Chittoda, married to Maharaja Raysinha of Bikaner. It is a small little fragmentary book written in the late 16th century. Dalpatsinha was born in the year 1564. Though the description contained in the book abruptly ends when he was nearly 13-14 years old, the writer mentions three of his sons—Udaysinha, Sabalsinha and Tulsidas—as adorning the court by their presence. This means that the minimum age of the youngest son must be about 12 years. It may, therefore, be inferred that Dalpatsinha must have attained the age of at least 33 years when the book was written. The year at that time may, thus, be taken as 1597. His father, Maharaja Raysinha, died in the year 1611. It was Jahangir who favoured Dalpat and granted him the chiefship of Bikaner. The term 'Sriji', used in the book for Akbar, denotes that the work was drafted before 1605; the year of Akbar's death. Thus broadly speaking, the period of writing assigned to the work may be from 1597 to 1605. It may also be interesting to know that Dalpatsinha died while fighting, when he was liberated from his captivity at Ajmer, by Hathisinha Champavat in the year 1613. He could hardly rule for twenty two months. He had the rare honour of fighting against the imperial forces. But Dalpat was deceived by his own man who overpowered him while sitting at his back on the elephant, when he was engaged in fighting. The details contained in the book relate to the early childhood of Dalpatsinha and his elder brother Bhopat, their visit to the imperial court and the hardships faced by them, both at home and at court. The court politics, hunting expeditions, some peculiar phases of Akbar's life and behaviour, and a variety of other contemporary topics dealt with make interesting reading and place the book among the trustworthy contemporary records of the period. There is no such book in the entire Rajasthani prose works. Dalpatvilasa may be safely called a 'Khayat' in the strict technical sense of the term, thus clearly differentiating it from other forms of prose such as, 'Vat', 'Hal' 'Hakikat', 'Vrittant', etc. To be more particular, it is a sort of biography, as the name-Dalpatvilasa itself denotes, perhaps attempted on the pattern of Humayunnama, Akbarnama, etc. This style of biographjy or authobiography was never adopted in Rajasthani prose-writings, and the present book is the only exception.

The prose used is the standard Marwadi form of Rajasthani with a tinge of the Bikaneri dialect. The use of the words 'Etha' and 'Otha' is a clear indication that the writer belonged to the border of the state adjoining Jayasalmer where these words are in prominent use. This is a fine specimen of the earliest standard prose written in the 16th century. The author has freely used the traditional archaic phraseology found in the Sanskrit works as well as original Sanskrit words like 'Ahankar', 'Nabhikamal', 'Prastav', Ayurkal', etc. Words of Arabic and Persian origin are also in considerable quantity, as they had become part and parcel of the language by then. Politcs and administration of the period, along-with the life of the upper class elite, were much influenced by the Muslim rule and intermixture of cultures. It was, therefore, quite natural that the language also got the necessary impact. 'Fauj' (Army), Topach (Gunner), 'Aphim' (Opium), 'Araj' (Request), 'Laskar' (Battalion) etc. are some such examples. The major portion of the vocabulary, however, consists of words derived and evolved for Sanskrit. This is a rare trait, as the later works began to adopt more words from Persian and Arabic languages which may be seen in Naisnai ri Khyata (17th century). Some quaint uses of words like 'Huvant' (Page 18) 'Padant' and 'Karant' (Page 58) are seldom seen in prose works. Rajasthani prose is known for its peculiarity of short and complete sentences, which throw flashes of picturised descriptions and are capable of providing absorbing interest. This trait has been maintained throughout the history in numerous prose writings of history, culture, literature and even of technical subjects. The book also contains specimens of prose, as might have been prevalent in the army-markets, Urdu Bazar, specially used in references to Muslim characters. The main characteristic of this prose is the grammatical structure of 'Khari Boli' or Urdu. Even words of Rajasthani orign used therein are so fashioned that they conform to the aforesaid form. Thus, these references may be called the earliest examples in Hindi prose, being about 500 years old.

The best contribution of the book, apart from its historical and linguistic importance, is the rich cultural material.The internal feuds of the royal house, the cunning part played by the advisory merchant class, the entirely subdued attitude of the princes, and the factual position of the so called feudal lords, bereft of all subequently imposed glory, are some such aspects. Viewed from all these angles, Dalpatvilasa rates much higher than most of the others of its category. The only defect is that it is an incomplete work and no other text has been traced out so far.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Rawat Saraswat (ed.) Dalpatvilasa (Bikaner, 1960).

Raw.S

DALURAI JI NAGIRI (Sindhi) is the first ever novel in Sindhi written on a well-known Sindhi legend of a king Dalurai and the downfall of his kingdom. The novel is written by Nirmaldas Fatehchand Sujansinghani (1866-1940), one of the famous scholars of Persian and Sindhi. It was published posthumously in 1944 by the Central Advisory Board of Control for Sindhi literature.

There are well-known ruins of Alore and Brahmanabad in Sindh, which have great archaeological importance. It is also a historical fact that the river Sindhu has shifted its original course. In earlier times it flowed in the eastern part of Sindh and in due course of time shifted its course towards the west. These facts have given rise to some legends, one of them being a tale of King Dalurai.

Dalurai was a degenerate Vama Margi Hindu ruler, who as is generally believed, lived in the early part of either the second half of the 10th century or the 11th century. It is held by some that his capital city was Alore, by others it was Brahmanabad. It is said that a terrible cyclone followed by a mighty earthquake changed the flow of the river from the capital to its present course and destroyed Dalurai's capital and all the inhabitants including Dalurai.

It is said that King Dalturai was a devil incarnate of insatiable lust. He deflowered the virgins of his kingdom and ordered that any virgin that was married must spend her first bridal night with him. As a result, a good many families left the city to save their honour. The lust of Daldurai reached its climax, when he wanted his own daughter to come to his bed on her bridal night. On hearing this, prophets and star-readers prophesised a calamity. The daughter of the king prayed to God to save her from the evil design of her own father. It is said that on the night of the marriage of the princess, a terrible cyclone and a tremendous earthquake destroyed completely the capital of Dalurai.

Nirmaldas Fatehchand taking this legend as the main plot of his novel, has also added one more legend to explain the change in the bed of the river Sindhu. A few days prior to the marriage of the princess, a Seyyed on his voyage through river Sindhu had anchored his ships at the capital of Dalurai. On knowing the beauty of Seyyed's daughter, the king tried to requisition her for one night. But Seyyed swiftly ordered to raise the boat's anchor and started his voyage down the river. He prayed to God to save them from the evil designs of the king. As a result of Seyyed's honest prayers, the river Sindhu flowed into another bed leaving Alore, the capital of Dalurai, high and dry so that no pursuit of the runaway boats was possible. The destruction of the city came thereafter. These legends are quoted in Sindhi literature as a warning to the lascivious and evildoers.

Nirmaldas has artistically narranted various natural scenes and incidents of the battles. The fall of Dalurai's capital has been delineated in a powerful language. Several pieces in the novel are full of alliteration and rhyming prose—a style often found in many early prose writings in Sindhi. The author shows his proficiency in writing the most difficult and extraordinary Sindhi prose. The language is overloaded with archaic and uncommon words. Hence, a long list of difficult words along with their meanings is given at the end of the book. Such language has marred the simplicity and lucidity of the style to a great extent. However, Dalurai Ji Nagiri (The kingdom of Dalurai—1944) provides a good specimen of the peculiar and difficult Sindhi prose of the time.

M.K.J.

DALVI, JAYWANT (Marathi; b. 1925) is a prolific and proficient writer. He spent his childhood in Vengurle, a village in south Konkan, Maharashtra which provided many of his novels and plays their background and characters. Though he started his career as a journalist and short-story writer, Dalvi has written novels, one-act plays, plays, humorous articles and a travelogue. His fourteen novels include Chakra, Sare Pravasi Ghadiche, Wedgal, Dharmanand, Adhantari and Swagat. Out of his nine short-story collections Gahivar, Jalatil Masa, Rukmini, Sparsh and Swapnarekha deserve mention. Kavale (one-act-play) Lok Ano Loukik (a travelogue) Fajitwada, Mishi Utrun Dein, Kashasathi Potasathi and Sarmisal (collections of humourous articles) and eight plays which include Sandhya Chhaya, Suryast and Purush show the versatility of Dalvi's writing. His recent books Album (1983, a novel), Shri Mangalmurti Ani Company (1983, humour), Purush (1983, a play) show that a writer who started his literary career back in 1957 is still writing with the same zest and proficiency. All his writings reflect contemporary life. His depiction of the undercurrents of human mind and abnormal characters specially appeals to the reader.

Under the pen-name 'Thanthanpal', Dalvi used to write a column 'Ghatka Geli Pale Geli', which was a major attraction of Lalit magazine. This column was Dalvi's satirical commentary on the personalities and happenings in the Marathi literary world. These articles were published in two volumes—Thanthanpal and Ankhi Thanthanpal.

With the same artistic proficiency, Dalvi can write humour as well as describe impressions of complex experiences lying deep down at the bottom of the mind. With the exception of Chakra (1963, a novel), all the themes of his writing are taken from the life and experiences of the middle-class people. In Chakra, Dalvi's portrayal of slum-life is very realistic, disturbing and thought-provoking. Chakra was filmed in Hindi and was well-received. Mahananda, a novel, was transformed into a play, Guntata Hriday He by S.N. Naware. Mahananda was later filmed in Marathi. Dalvi himself transformed his novel Sawalya into a play Durgi.

Dalvi is quite successful as a playwright. Sandhya Chhaya, a play about the life and problems of an old couple, was his first play. His plays mainly reflect social problems. Suryast, a play with a political theme and Purush introduce us to Dalvi's forthright and independent views. Dalvi has also competently edited a selection of P.L. Deshpande's writings, Pu.La.-Ek Sathwan (P.L.: A collection).

L.G.

DALWADI POOJALAL RANCHOODDAS (Gujarati; b. 1901), a poet and translator, was born at Nama in Kheda district.

He studied at Godhra, Nadiad and Gujarat College, Ahmedabad. He failed in Inter Science in 1922, and hence, gave up studies. He joined Gramshala of Kosindra town as a P.T. Teacher in 1923. He went to Pondicherry for some time in 1924, but came back. From 1926 onwards he settled in Pondicherry. He had come into personal contact with Aurobindo and the Mother.

His poems are scattered in a number of books, such as: Parijat (1938), Matajina Moti (1944), Gitika (1945), Jaymala (1945), Kavya Kishori (1946), Shubhakshari (1947), Prabhat Git (1947), Aradhika (1949), Kavya Ketu as also in Urmimala, Gujari, Padma, Nandi, Praharshini and Bhagwati.

His Parijat published in 1938 was highly acclaimed. Poojalal's Kavya Ketu a successor to Parijat separated by a long period is a remarkable volume. Kavya Ketu is a collection of longer poems 'Vindhyachal', 'Aburaj', 'Himalaya', 'Suvarnamay Dwarka' etc., on the themes of nature, love etc. For quite some years Poojalal's poetry was confined to the modes and imagery associated with devotional poetry based on Aurobindo's and the Mother's vision. In Kavya Ketu however Poojalal seems to have extended his store of poetic images. His philosophy of life finds an eloquent expression in his poetic diction saturated with emotion. His sonnets, marked with solemnity of sentiments, fine texture of language and artistic expression have acquired a remarkable place in Gujarati poetry. Pictorial descriptions of seasons and harmony of metre and rhyme are significant aspects of his poetry.

Among his other works mention may be made of Lotus Grove, an anthology of his English poems, and Stotra-Samhita, a collection of his Sanskrit poems. Moreover, his voluminous book of verse, Maha Bhagwati, has won appreciation from all quarters.

He has translated into Gujarati, Savitri the epic poem by Aurobindo, running into six parts. He has been awarded Aurobindo gold Medal by Gujarati Sahitya Parishad for his verse translation of Savitri. Equally prominent is the version of Aurobindo's Durga Stotra. He has succeeded to a large extent in bringing out the original moods and sentiments into Gujarati, which bears ample testimony to his achievements as a translator.

Besides, he has also prepared, in a very simple and lucid language, a gist or quintessence in Gujarati, of Aurobindo's epic poem Savitri which has been published under the title Savitri Sar Samhita. Another book by him, Chhand Pravesh, explaining metres, has acquired wide popularity. He has thus secured for himself a position as a poet who has given new dimensions and imagery to Gujarati Poetry.

B.J.

DALWAI HAMID (Marathi; b. 1932, d. 1977) was born in a lower middle-class Muslim family in a village Mirjoli in Ratnagiri district. While at school, he was attracted towards Rashtra Seva Dal, a Nationalist Youth Organisation with an egalitarian philosophy and as such he was drawn towards Ram Manohar Lohia as his political mentor. When he moved to Bombay in the early fifties in search of a living, he started expressing his views on his community.

During the sixties, he was engaged in studying the culture of Muslims of Maharashtra. He toured the length and breadth of India and met the leaders of his community. In 1970, he founded a Muslim Satyashodhak Mandal, a non-political organisation and launched a movement regarding the Muslim personal law, the Shariat Dalwai's two books, Laat (1961) a short story collection and Indhan (1965) a novel, have been recognised as landmarks in regional literature of the sixties. Stories from Laat exhibit in depth the deep rooted, age-long inhibitions, prejudices, customs and beliefs prevalent in village communities. He stirs, agitates and moves the readers. Indhan describes a village life changed considerably after independence wherein the minds of village communities are tending more and more towards communalism and groupism. The novel is autobiographical in nature. Abolition of Khoti system and introduction of Land Ceiling Act had a wider impact on the area of Mohamadans and middle class gentries throughout the coastal life of South Konkan. A new awakening among lower castes and farmer communities led to constant clashes between them, which shattered the mutual understanding that was a part of village life for ages. Dalwai has described the structure and face of a new village with a remarkable detachment. The Marathi language spoken by Mohamedans has a beauty of its own.

Dalwai's articles on Muslim issues have been published in a book form posthumously. Muslim Jatiyateche Swarupa: Karane Va Upaya (1978) and Islamche Bharatiya Chitra (1982) show his strength of courage and conviction and his innate urge for rationalist outlook.

Bh.K.

DAMAYANTI SWAYAMVAR (Marathi) was composed around 1681 by Raghunath Pandit. We seldom find such a small but popular poem in ancient Marathi poetry inclined towards elaboration. We do not have much of authentic information about Raghunath Pandit. From internal evidence it seems that he was a contemporary of Shivaji and well acquainted with the Tanjavur politics. He was a devotee of Ramdas and well versed in Sanskrit and Persian. His Damayanti Swayamvar has made him famous though he composed similar poems including Ramdasvarnan and Gajendramoksha.

The story of Nala-Damayanti is given in the Vanaparva of the Mahabharata. It is again told in the Naishadhiyacharita of Sriharsha. Raghunath Pandit follows Sriharsha. He has condensed the contents of 1750 shlokas of first 14 sargas of Naishadhiyacharita into 254 shlokas only. Raghunath Pandit intended to narrate the entire Nala story but could only go upto Damayanti's marriage with Nala. Naturally erotic sentiment found more scope in it. Swayamvar is a theme popular with Marathi poets. They have depicted the swayamvars of Sita, Rukmini and Draupadi with great relish. But peculiarity of the Nala story is that it based on realistic portryal. This has made Damayanti Swayamvar stand out in devotional Marathi literature. He narrates various episodes with such skill that they, while expressing various sentiments reveal the nature of characters involved. His hero and heroine belong to Dhir-Lalit category. In the character of bird Hansa we find reflected various shades of human emotions. Raghunath Pandit's narration is racy. He creates dramatic situations. The dialogues between various characters are charged with dramatic element. Beauty of various figures of speech like utpreksha, arthantaranyas, swabhavokti enchant the readers. In two hundred and fifty four shlokas, there are sixty six dindis, twenty one ovis, fourteen padas and one churnika. The beauty of the composition is achieved by the poet who has command over various conventional poetic devices. The poet has followed the Sanskrit model in this respect. The composition is embellished by dramatic episodes, neat characterization, racy dialogues, brilliant display of imagination, use of various poetic metres. Damayanti Swayamvar is artistic in every sense of the term.

R.B.M.

DAMLE, MORO KESHAV (Marathi; b. 1868, d. 1913) was a reputed Marathi grammarian and younger brother of Kehavsut. Damle hailed from Konkan. He secured his Master's degree from Poona in 1893 and joined the Madhav College, Ujjain as a Professor of Logic and Moral Philosophy. After its closure in 1902, he accepted position as the Principal, Neil City High School, Nagpur and worked there until his untimely death at the age of 45 in a railway accident. He began his career as a Marathi writer by translating some speeches of Edmund Burke (1894-99), and produced Nyayashastra, a work on Logic in two volumes (1896, 1902), before he turned to orthography (Shuddha-lekhana-Sudharana, 1905) and grammar. He published his major work, the Shastriya Marathi Vyakarana in 1911. The most extensive (pp. 1000) grammar of Marathi produced till today, the Shastriya Marathi Vyakarana was a source of inspiration to many including Kamataprasad Guru, who fashioned his renowned grammar of Hindi after Damle's model. Damle's reputation as a grammarian rests chiefly on a thorough and systematic compilation of grammatical material from the works of his predecessors and his critical evaluation of views on controversial issues in Marathi grammar.

K.S.A.

DAMODAR (Punjabi). Damodar's biographical details are not fully known. According to Bawa Ganga Singh Bedi, he belonged to Walahran, Tehsil Chanyot and lived during the reign of Akbar to whom he alludes at several places. He left his village and settled as a shopkeeper at Ghang, where he composed the kissa of Hir, the first of its kind. He claims to have witnessed the happenings of most of the events with his own eyes, but that seems to be only a poetic device, just to earn authenticity for his composition. He has given a comic end to his narration, whereas Waris Shah makes it a tragedy.

This work of Damodar has literary as well as historical significance in the annals of Punjabi literature. It is written in Lehnda, a western dialect of Punjabi. Damodar seems to have acquired a fair mastery over the narrative art by maintaining suspense, writing crisp dialogues, and using dramatic situations. He does not even forget the use of humour on proper and befitting occasions. He has composed his entire work in couplets with ease and has used fresh similes and new metaphors.

A literary work is the true index of the time in which it is written. Damodar's Hir is a true and authentic commentary on the social, religious and cultural happenings of the time. Damodar was the real pioneer who has the credit of being the first to introduce a new genre to the Punjabi poetry and the fresh legend of Hir Ranjha which in due course of time became the most popular legend in Punjabi literature. Dozens of Punjabi poets have composed their poetic compositions by borrowing this tale with necessary and artistic alterations. Waris Shah excels all of them. All this enhances the significance of Damodar's poetic art.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bawa Ganga Singh Bedi, Hir Damodar., K.S. Kang, Punjabi vich Kissa, Hir Ranjha., S. Amole, Hir Damodar (1949).

S.S.U.

DAMODAR PANDIT (Marathi; 14th century) belongs to the class of the early Mahanubhava poets who wrote longer narrative poems after the tradition in Sanskrit. His Vacchaharana (1316) is one of the early seven such Mahanubhava poems known as 'Sati Kavya'. It is based on an episode in the early life of Lord Krishna which occurs in the 10th skandha (book) of the Bhagavata. It narrates the story of Lord Krishna bringing back the cattle and cattle herds of Vrindavan stolen away by god Brahma and gives ample scope for depicting Krishna-bhakti. It is a small but neatly done work of about 500 verses in the Ovi metre and brings out the drama of the life of Lord Krishna which presents all the nine poetical sentiments. This is the 'navarasa nataka' that he enacted.

"When he danced Ras with the gopis, it was amour, and when they fondled him playfully, it was humour. When frightened by Yashoda, he showed the sentiment of compassion, and when he defeated the poisonous Kaliya, he became rage itself. When he opened his mouth for his mother, it was wonder, and when he showed the vision of the universal Atman, it was fear personified. When he killed the demons, disgust and heroism appeared, while the sentiment of composure is, of course, ever with him."

The Vacchaharana shows a peculiar practice of the Mahanubha poets of assigning their works to each other's names and thus creating problems about their authorship for the historians. Damodar mentions Kesiraja in several places as the author of the Vacchaharana though we know for certain that the mention is only symbolical of the friendship between the two.

Damodara was a musician as well and was specially permitted to sing devotional songs in spite of a direction of Chakradhara forbidding music. He composed some Chupadis which are a mixture of Marathi and Hindi.

S.G.T.

DAMODARAGUPTA (Sanskrit), minister of King Jayapida of Kashmir (779-819) is the author of an amusing treatise on erotics, the Kuttanimata. The Kuttanimata (or Sambhalimata)–"Advice of a Procuress" written in 1059 Arya verses is extensively quoted, and enjoys high literary reputation. The story is trivial. Malati, a young and beautiful courtesan of Benares, failing to attract lovers, seeks advice of an old bawd Vikarala, who gives her a long discourse on the art of ensnaring rich young men and depriving them of their riches by flattery and feigned love. The discourse frames (1) the story of Haralata who dies immediately after separation from her lover Sudarshana, and (2) the story of Manjari who impoverishes King Samarabhata by ensnaring him and of (3) Harsha's play Ratnavali, the story of which is also included. The work falls under Nidarshana variety of tale, didactic in purpose, and as such, is supposed to instruct in and illustrate the social vice of harlotry. The theme is coarse, and dangerous, and the author's animated, rather frank, descriptions of heroines and their love-events reveal his intimate acquaitance with erotics and Vaishiki Kala from Vatsyayana and Bharata. But his treatment of the theme is elegant. The metre and the story move at a slow but graceful pace. The author's command over the language is commendable, his diction melodious, style simple and effective, and poetic endowments of no mean order. His characters, though not always agreeable, are yet drawn vividly and skillfully from certain recognisable social types; they are slightly heightened but essentially realistic, not caricatures of social types. The work is unique in presenting a picture of the droll life of the upper strata of the contemporary society from direct observation with wit and humour but without much moralising.

R.N.

DAMODARAN K. (Malayalam; b. 1912; d. 1976) was an economist, Marxist theoretician and dramatist. After his higher education in Zamorin's (now Guruvayurappan) College at Calicut he went to Benares and took his title of Sastri from the Vidyapith there. During his college days, Damodaran was drawn to politics. He courted arrest, participating in the Salt Satyagraha' and was jailed for about two years. Initially his activities centred around labour movements. He was a member of the AICC but later left the Congress and became a member of the communist party of India, of which he became State Secretary. He was for many years the editor of the Communist party weekly Navayugam. He was also a member of the State Library Association Granthasalasamgham and the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. He was elected to the Rajya Sabha, while working in Jawaharlal Nehru University at New Delhi as a Fellow.

Damodaran was considered to be one of the foremost theoreticians in the communist circles of Kerala. Most of his publications in Malayalam are on political philosophy and economic theory. He has not experimented much in creative literature but his play Pattabakki (The rent dues, 1937) was a tremendous success and was staged all over Kerala. His inspiration for such a play, as he himself has stated, was V.T. Bhattathirippad and M.R. Bhattithirippad who had urged Namboothiri youths through their writings to shed their outmoded customs and practices. Pattabakki specially written and staged on the occasion of the conference of agriculturists in Ponnani Taluk in 1937, had a tremendous impact on the social drama in Malayalam. The purpose of the play is apparently double-edged. It depicts how the poor and vulnerable agricultural labourers were exploited by the heartless, arrogant landlords. It also suggests the futility of anti-social and immoral activities. The hero of the drama goes to jail for theft and his sister is molested by the landlord. When the brother returns from jail, both of them rise in revolution against the feudal.

FURTHER WORKS: Manushyan (Philosophy, Trichur, 1946), Dhanashastrapraveshika (Economics-Trichur, 1951), Intyayute Atmavu, (Philosophy, Erankulam 1957).

M.K.P.

DAMODARAN PILLAI, P. (Malayalam; b. 1906, d. 1979) was a critic, linguist and a translator. After taking his B.A. degree in 1928, he worked successively as a journalist, as an officer in the Public Relations Department, as a Supervisor in Malaylam Lexicon and finally as Assistant Supervisor in the Public Relations Department of Kerala University, Trivandrum.

He was a prolific writer. His main forte was literary criticism and linguistics. He has also published a book of pen-portraits. Many of his articles both in Malayalam and in English remain unpublished. As an editor of old texts, he has shown critical acumen and originality as can be seen in his edition of the 14th century Malayalam Sandeshakavya, Unnunilisandesham. One of his unique theories about the status of Dravidian languages is that the Dravidian family of languages is genetically related to the Indo-European. He terms the combined family the 'Dravido-European'.

M.K.P.

DANDIN (Sanskrit), ancient poet and poetician in Sanskrit, belonged to Kanchi in South India. From his Avantisundarikatha it is known that his ancestors migrated from Gujarat to the South during the Pallava period. He was the son of Viradatta and Gauri and grandson of Manoratha. His great grandfather Damodara was a friend of Bharavi (author of the Kiratarjuniya). Dandin lost his mother when he was seven and his father when he was quite young. It is said that he had friends like Matridatta in Kerala. The Avantisundarikatha refers to the Kadambari and follows Bana's version while dealing with the story, but not Bhusanabhatta's version of the Uttarabhaga. The introductory portion gives the contemporaneity of Bharavi with the Eastern Chalukya King Kubja Vishnuvardhana, the Ganga King Durvinita, the Pallava king Simhavishnu and poet Damodara, the great grand father of Dandin. Hence Dandin has to be assigned to the middle of the seventh century A.D. The controversy regarding the relative priority of Bhamaha and Dandin is now settled with the discovery of Avanmtisundarikatha.

Dandin is the author of three famous works according to a eulogy of Rajashekhara (trayo dandiprabandhas cha). One of them is definitely the Kavyadarsha also called Kavyalakshana on literary criticism. The Dashakumaracharita was considered as his second work; now with the discovery of Avantisundarikatha, it is taken as the second work; the Dashakumaracharita is now considered by many scholars as the missing portion of the second part of Avantisundarikatha. The third work is said to be Dvisandhanakavya dealing simultaneously with the story of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. Bhoja quotes from this work and refers to it as a work of Dandin.

Dandin's popularity was such that the Bhojaprabandha makes him a contemporary and equal of Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti and Bharavi.

His Kavyadarsha, also called the Kavyalakshana, is in three chapters. Dandin is considered as the exponent of the guna school; but he stands midway between the alankara school of Bhamaha where all the ten gunas are said to be perfectly balanced; the names of the gunas are the same as those given in the Natyasastra but there is not much agreement in the defitions; some of these gunas pertain to sound and others to the sense. He describes 35 alankaras, some with subdivisions. Doshas, or flaws of literary compositions, are also described under ten types, generally following Bhamaha. Literature is classified on the basis of the language used and of the type adopted.

The Dashakumaracharita or the Avantisundarikatha, belongs to the katha-type of prose literature in Sanskrit. The available portion of the Avantisundari seems to be the earlier section and the Dashakumaracharita, excluding the introductory burvapithika section, the second part. There is difference of opinion among scholars about the exact prose text written by Dandin.

The Dvisandhanakavya is lost; all that we know about it is from the reference and quotation found in Bhoja's Sringaraprakasha.

In his prose kavya Dandin followed the sweet vaidarbha marga which he advocated: he is famous for his padalalitya. Influence of his Kavyadarsha is clearly seen in the Tamil work Dandialavankara of the ninth century and the Sinhalese treatise Sivabaslakara (not later than the ninth century) and the Kannada work Kavirajamarga ascribed to the Rashtrakuta king, Amoghavarsa Nripatunga. A Mangolian translation is also known.

BIBLOGRAPHY: D.K. Gupta, A Critical Study of Dandin and his Works, Delhi 1970; Society and Culture in the Time of Dandin, Mehrchand Lacchmandass, Delhi 1972; New Catalogus Catalogorum entry on Avantisundarikatha.

K.K.R.

DANCE OF SHIVA, THE (English). Certain writings become world classics overnight and one such was The Dance of Shiva, one of the essays in the collection bearing the same title, published from New York in 1918. With its publication, Ananda Coomaraswamy was ushered into the hall of fame, though he had already other scholarly writings to his credit.

The essay, 'The Dance of Shiva' opens with a quotation from the Tiruvachagam:

"The Lord of Tillai's Court a mystic dance;
what's that, my dear?"

The question is answered. "The dance, in fact, represents His five activities (panchakritya), viz Srishti (overseeing, creation, evolution), Sthiti (preservation, support), Samhara (destruction, evolution), Tirobhava (veiling, embodiment, illusion,), and Anugraha (release, salvation, grace). These, separately considered, are the activities of the deities Brahma, Vishnu, Rudra, Maheshvara and Sadashiva." Shiva's dance was present in the minds of those first dancing in the frantic and perhaps intoxicated energy of the pre-Aryan hill-god, afterwards merged in Shiva. Whatever the origin of Shiva's dance, it became in time the clearest image of the activity of God. Ananda Coomeraswamy speaks of three dances of Shiva. The first is an evening dance in the Himalayas, with divine chorus, described in the Shiva Pradosha Stotra thus: "Placing the Mother of the Three Worlds upon a golden throne, studded with precious gems, Sulapani dances on the heights of Kailasa, and all the gods gather round him. All the beings dwelling in the three worlds assemble there to witness the celestial dance and hear the music of the divine choir at the hour of twilight." The evening dance is also referred to in the invocation preceding the Kathasarit Sagara.

It may be fruitful in this connection to remember Karaikkal Ammaiyar's description of the Twilight Dance as Antiyin ma natam–the Great Twilight Dance.

"While the mulavu of gods of yore sound without any flaw,
The Lord who is the God of Beauty performs the Twilight Dance."

The second is the tandava dance performed by Shiva in His tamasic aspect in cemeteries and burning grounds with His Consort, accompanied by groups of capering devils. Amongst the greatest names of Shiva is Nataraja, Lord of Dancers, who dances the third Nadanta dance in the golden hall of Chidambaram or Tillai, the centre of the Universe, first revealed to gods and rishis and later to Adi Seshan. This is related in the Koyil Puranam.

Coomaraswamy draws a pen-picture of the South Indian copper images of Nataraja typically represented in that of Shiva in Chidambaram. "The images represent Shiva dancing having four hands, with braided and jewelled hair of which the lower locks are whirling in the dance. In his hair may be seen a wreathing cobra, a skull, and the mermaid figure of Ganga; upon it rests the crescent moon, and it is crowned with a wreath of cassic leaves. In his right ear, he weares a man's ear ring, a woman's in the left; He is adorned with necklaces and armlets, a jewelled belt, anklets, bracelets, finger and toe-rings. The chief part of his dress consists of tightly fitting breeches, and He wears also a fluttering scarf and a sacred thread. One right hand holds a drum, and the other is uplifted in the sign of "do not fear": one left hand holds fire, the other points down at the demon Muyalaka, a dwarf holding a cobra; the left foot is raised. There is a lotus pedestal, from which springs an encircling glory (tiruvasi), fringed with flame, and touched within by the hands holding drum and fire".

With the assistance of copious contemporary literature, Ananda Coomaraswamy dives deep into the interpretation of the Nadanta dance. "Our Lord is the Dancer, who like the heat latent in firewood, diffuses His power in mind and matter, and makes them dance in their turn." Cosmic activity is the central motif of the dance. He quotes Chidambara Mummanikkovai: "O my Lord, Thy hand holding the sacred drum has made and ordered the heavens and earth and other worlds and innumerable souls. Thy lifted hand protects both the conscious and unconscious order of Thy creation. All these are transformed by Thy hand bearing fire. Thy sacred foot planted on the ground, gives an abode to the tired soul struggling in the toils of causality. It is Thy lifted foot that grants eternal bliss to those that approach Thee. These five actions are indeed Thy handiwork." A diligent philosophic study follows, supported by extensive quotations from Tirumular's Tirumantram and other Shaiva Literature.

The dancing foot, the sound of the tinkling bells,
The songs that are sung and the varying steps,
The form assumed by our dancing Gurupara–
Find out these within yourself, then shall your fetters fall away.

Shiva bears the name Sudalaiyadi Dancer of the burning ground. He is a destroyer. What does He destroy? Where then is the burning ground? That is the crematorium where the ego is destroyed, signifying the state where illusion and deeds are burnt away.

It may be relevant in this context to remember Karaikkal Ammaiyar's description. In the cremation ground on the outskirts of Tiruvalankadu, our Heavenly Father dances, the kalal and the anklet on his legs producing a musical and jingling sound. While He dances, all the worlds keep in tune with Him, whirling, rotating and revolving.

Ananda Coomapraswamy refers to the Mother-aspect of God by quoting a Bengali hymn eulogising Kali, the Dark One dancing Her eternal dance in the Burning Ground. God is referred to in Tamil hymns as Tayumanavan. He who became the Mother also. "The perpetual dance is His play", says Tirumular. Coomaraswamy spots the spontaneity of Shiva's dance clearly expressed in Skryabin's Poem of Ecstasy. He summarizes the whole interpretation thus.:–

"The Essential Significance of Shiva's Dance is threefold : First, it is the image of his Rhythmic Play as the source of all Movement within the Cosmos, which is represented by the Arch : Secondly, the purpose of his Dance is to release the countless souls of men from the snare of Illusion : Thirdly the place of the Dance, Chidambaram, the Centre of the Universe, is within the heart."

From philosophic heights, Anand Coomaraswamy comes down to aesthetic plains. He calls attention to the grandeur of the conception of the Nataraja image as a synthesis of science, religion and art. He marvels at the range of thought of those rishi-artists, who conceived such a type as this, affording an image of reality, a key to the complex tissue of life, a theory of nature not merely satisfactory to a single clique or race or acceptable only to the thinkers of one century only, but universal in its appeal to the philosopher, the lover and the artist of all ages and all countries. It was no wonder therefore that Auguste Rodin burst into poetic ecstasy, when introduced to the world-famous Tiruvalankadu Nataraja Bronze. "These two hands separating the breasts from the belly are admirable. Indeed their gesture can compare in gracefulness and elegance with the gesture of the Venus of Medici protecting its charms with its arms, while Shiva seems to protect Himself with this ingenious gesture. There is above all what no one seems to have noticed, the mysterious depths, the depths of life itself. There is elegance in the gracefulness and above this gracefulness there is an admirable modelling. And one cannot find words." Rodin speaks of "the lips like a lake of pleasure, the mouth sinuous like a snake, the eyes like precious enamel and the legs with their lengthened muscles jealous in their obscure mystery."

Coming back to Coomaraswamy, we hear him talking about reconciling Time with Eternity. "Inert Nature cannot dance till Shiva wills it. Rising from His rapture, he sends through inert matter pulsing waves of awakening sound, and lo! matter also dances. In the fullness of time still dancing, he destroys all forms and names by fire and gives new rest. This is poetry; but none the less science. The figure of Nataraja has commanded the adoration of many generations past; familiar with all scepticisms, expert in tracing all beliefs to primitive superstitions, explorers of the infinitely great and infinitely small, we are worshippers of Nataraja still, concludes Ananda Coomaraswamy in his classic.

Though the study here is restricted to the essay, 'The Dance of Shiva', we may aptly recall Romain Rolland's observation in a foreword; "the purpose of Coomaraswamy's book is to show the power of the soul, to show all the riches that it holds stored up, with which to ennoble and render happy the human race. The whole vast soul of India proclaims from end to end of its crowded and well-ordered edifice domination of a sovereign synthesis. All the forces of life are grouped like a forest, whose thousand waving arms are led by Nataraja, the master of the Dance."

Ananda Coomaraswamy's 'Dance of Shiva' is studied as a piece of literature all over the world. It stimulated a global interest in the Nataraja theme, with a sizeable literature since produced, as a sequel; gave a fillip to an indepth study of South Indian bronzes, particularty the Chola bronzes which became favourites among connoisseurs of art for acquisition; and induced scholars to look from close quarters at the Southern Schools of Shaivism, particularly the Shaiva Siddhanta Philosophy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Auguste Rodin: Sculptres Cicaites (Ars Asiatica III Brussels and Pais, 1921., K.C. Kamaliah: Ananda Coomaraswamy–Wise Man From the East, Madras. 1977. Karakkal Ammaiyer's Mutta Tiruppatikankal (Eleventh Tirumurai)., T.A. Gopinatha Rao: Elements of Hindu Iconography, (Madras, 1914-16).,

K.C.K.

DANCE SONGS (Assamese) are usually associated with the Ojha-Pali and Bihu dances. The Ojha-Pali (a sort of Hari-Katha group) recites Vaishnavite and Manasa-cult compositions to the accompaniment of certain dance movements and mudras and the tinkling of cymbals. Similar religious verses are sung accompanied by various dances in fertility rites like kati-puja and Hudum-puja by women-folk in the Goapara district. Perhaps the real dance songs are the Bihunam or Bihu songs.

The Bihunam are quatrains with alternate rhymes. While minor modifications to suit individual purposes may be made, the songs on the whole circulate like much-handled coins and boys and girls repeat them in certain melodic patterns appropriate to the rhythm of the Bihu dances. The singing may be of two kinds, choric and anti-phonal. When just two girls dance symbolising the male and the female, being surrounded by a group of other women, it is the surrounding women who sing. In the other form, a few girls may dance accompanied by malefolk on horn pipes and drums, and while one of the girls sings out a verse and dances, a male counterpart responds and then plays the drum.

These songs constitute a language of love and there are hundreds and hundreds of them. They describe beauty, adore the sweetheart, express yearning, and speak of frustration and sorrow in life. They evince also a developed sense of beauty, and in their references to local physical features including the mighty Brahmaputra, they are suggestive of the people's affection for their land of birth. Here are a few specimens:

To see you in a flash I am no lightning
nor am I a flowing river, flying to see you I am no bird with two wings to my sides.
High you tied your long hair,
as you walked you crushed the grass, as I looked into your eyes you smiled,
my mind is distracted now.
Who made you so beautiful?
there's a smile on her face, would you see her hands and her face,
rose petals are her cheeks.
A jacket suited to your body, parted hair suited to your head,
a jewelled Keru in your ear, without sight of you hardly a day can I pass, how to pass a whole year?

Bihunam and Bihu dances are associated with the shades of large trees or open fields, but Huchari singing and dance are a part of the spring festival associated with the courtyards of village people. In the first few days of the Hindu New Year menfolk form into bands, visit different households and with dance-like movements sing songs of a religious nature, wishing the well-being of the households visited, getting in return some presents in kind or coin. A typical song goes like this:

Being soaked in the dew on the head of Krishna the bakul unfolded its petals,
O Govinda, Rama.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nakulchandra Bhayan, Bohagi, Shillong, 1963, Praphulladatta Goswami, The Springtime Bihu of Assam, Gauhati, 1966, Birendranath Datta, Goalpariya Loka git samgraha, Jorhat, 1974.

Pro. G.

DANCE SONGS (Dogri) Different types of dances and accompanying dance-songs are prevalent in Duggar. Some are limited to particular regions of Duggar while some are common all over. Bhangra and Tilakani are common in the areas adjoining the Punjab. 'Bhangra is danced on the occasion of Baishakhi festival as in the Punjab. It is a group dance like the Punjab Bhangra except that the dress of dancers is different and the language of accompanying songs is different. These songs are called Boliyan in Punjabi Sabdan (from Sanskrit Shabda) in Dogri. They are composed by the dancers, who are all men, on the spur of the moment. Tilakani dance is very much like its Punjabi counterpart Kikali. It is danced by girls and women in twos to the accompaniment of singing. Two girls stand in front of each other, hold each others hands, turn round and round, first slowly, then fast. An example of a Tilakani song:

'Tilakani talai di, loon mirch la-yi di
Aun kuri raje di, tur kuri shapahi di'

and so on. There is no particular occasion or dress for this dance and can be danced at any time of the year or day.

Kudd and Phummani dances are popular in the hills, although the latter is danced in other parts of Duggar also like Kandi. Both have religious associations. With Phummani, there are no accompanying songs, the dancers moving with sounds of ha-ha, si-si which provide the rhythm to the movements. Kudd which is particularly popular in Bhadrawah area, is danced at shrines of deities, and after the harvest is over. Sometimes it is accompanied by its particular type of songs also called Kudd, and sometimes there is no song, just movements. Musical instruments used in this dance are the flute, cymbals and a local drum called Dhanus. Fire is lit at the shrine of the deity and the dance begins after the dancers go round the fire.

Then there are havest dance-songs called Sohari and Chal or Chauki. Sohaki is like Gujarati Tapani and Chal is like Bengali Jatra. In Sohari, harvested paddy sheafs are placed between a group of men on one and a group of women on the other side and beating the paddy sheafs, they start dancing to the beat of their sticks. Chal or Chauki is danced after the new wheat is brought home and offered to the deity on Jayestha Asthami or Ekadeshi. Songs are sung to the accompaniment of narsingha, turhi and drum like this one:

O Sacheya, mera Dhyan tere ull
Mera hath maye chhapan Neuthigan, mere peer sacha, meri mein jhoothiyan.

Geetarus are songs of gaddis, wandering shepherds of the hills, which are sung usually without any instrument, to the beat of feet. Sometimes an earthen pitcher or a brass plate is used if available easily. Sometime a drum may be used. They are entertaining and contain references to hard realities of life like this one:

Ghah di baddhani lari lari, mere dokhimarade jali jali
Is ganne di kareyo bind bind, mere dhol, neen landa jind jind.

(I cut blades of grass, jealous people are burning with jealousy, ... cut this sugarcane into small bits, my husband does not apply himself).

Nati is another type of dance and also dance song that is very popular in the hills of Himachal Pradesh. This dance and accompanying songs express feelings of religious devotion, valour and love. It is danced in five stages and the song comes with the second stage. The accompanying instrument used is narsingha. Dancers put on garlands, hold shining swords in hand and make a show of fighting with swords while dancing. They form into two groups and then into smaller and more groups and then join together, leavig the swords on the ground and form a circle. There are nearly twenty variations of Nati danced and sung in different parts of Himachal Pradesh.

A dance, usually danced on the occasion of marriage, with accompanying songs, all over Duggar is Dhamachar, also called Jagarana and Pheri. This is danced and sung by women folk of the bride-groom's household. There is lot of fun and laughter and mimicry in this type of dance. After the bridegroom's marriage party leaves for the bride's house, women burst into dancing and singing, in twos. facing each other, moving different parts of their bodies and turning round and round and singing.

Meri bachi ch chura chandi da, mera-kun lar pharaya jandi da,
Meri banhi nau nau chooriyan neen, dinailarada te ratin gallan goorhiyan-neen.

(I have put on bangles of pure silver, who caught hold of my garment in the way. I have nine bangles in each of my wrists, (my lover) quarrels during day time but at night he gets intimate).

Sha.S. and Ram.S.

DANCE SONGS (Tamil) The vast corpus of dance songs figuring in folk dances, folk dramas and folk festivals in India includes the Oyil, Pally, Nondi Natakam, Kuravanji Natakam and Muluve Natakam of Tamilnadu. Besides, there are the songs of the dancing gypsies, wandering minstrels, fortune tellers and puppet show troupes which are too numerous to be enumerated.

But few ancient dance compositions have survived the ravages of time and exist today in their original form.

The earliest songs which are employed today in the Odissi and other styles of dance are the ones figuring in Jayadeva's Gita Govinda (12th-13th centuries). The next landmark in the history of dance compositions is the writing of songs specifically for the Bharata Natyam style of dance of South India. During the time of Raja Serfoji II (1798-1832), the Maratha ruler of Thanjavur, 17 such forms appear to have been in vogue and these are:

Jaya Jaya Sollu, Padam, Tillana, Prabandham, Kavuttam, Saranu, Sabdam, Svarajati, Jakkini, Triputam, Mangalam, Sevai, Varnam, Abinaya Padam, Gitam, Slokavarnam

These dance compositions were later reduced in number by Ponniah, Sivanandam and Vadival, better known as the 'Tanjore Quartette' who were court dance masters under Raja Serfoji. The present day dancers in the Bharata Natyam style adopt only seven of these forms and these are (1) Alarippu (blossoming forth), an invocation dance in which only syllables are used (2) Jatisvaram in which the notes of the raga chosen are set to the desired tala (3) Sabdam, a song in praise of a deity or a patron (4) Varnam, the piece de resistance of a performance, a song that describes usually a motif based on the Nayaka-Nayika relationship (5) Padam, a song sung in a slow tempo, used for abhinaya alone (6) Javali, a light type of Padam sung in a quicker tempo, often containing numerous situations and (7) Tillana, performed toward the end of a recital, containing a mixture of syllables and words. Recently some of the old forms like the Kavuttuvams are being revived. Ragamalikas or songs using more than one raga are also popular in the dance field particularly when they depict stories from the Ramayana and other epics.

Even rulers like Maharaja Svati Triunal of Travancore and Raja Serfoji of Thanjavur composed songs to be employed in dance recitals.

In addition to classical dance, dance dramas employ songs specially composed for the purpose. These dance dramas employ special songs like the Daru, Dandakam, Gitas, Tarangams, Sabdams etc. particularly when the different characters of the plays address each other.

T.S.P.

DANDAKA METRE (Telugu). Almost all dandakas in Telugu are composed of 'ta–ganas' only, though Appakavi stipulates that they should begin with a 'ha-gana' or a 'na-gana or a 'sa-gana, only ending on a guru and then run into 'ta-gana' The ten varieties of Dandaka mentioned in Sanskrit prosody and Appakaviyam are not practised in Telugu. The maximum length of 999 syllables prescribed by Sanskrit prosodists is also dispensed with by Telugu poets. Though it is mentioned as one of mala–vrittas in Sanskrit prosody, many scholars wonder if it is not a deshi metre originally. Its counterpart in Tamil is tandava metre. Though it is a metre most suitable for prayer, in the skilled hands of artists, it becomes secular, erotic or humorous. There are poets who wrote entire Kavyas in this metre, making their patrons their heroes. There are others who wrote the Ramayana, the Bhagavadgita etc. in this metre. Some dandakas like Anjaneya Dandaka said to have therapeutic powers, are popular even among illiterates. Their popularity led to innumerable parodies like coffee, tea and cigarette dandakas.

G. Sr.

DANDEKAR, GOPAL NILKANTH (Marathi; b. 1916) is a versatile writer who has contributed significantly to various literary genres. He has more than hundred books to his credit, on various subjects like religion, culture, mythology, history and literature. Dandekar has enriched Marathi literature by his prolific writing.

He was born at Paratwada in Amaravati district and had his education upto English fourth class. He left his house at the age of thirteen and participated in the National Movement. During his wandering he met Saint Gadage Baba and was very much influenced by Baba's thoughts. He accepted Baba's discipleship and preached his thoughts through the Kirtanas (religious discourses) in a number of villages. For understanding the Jnaneshvari in detail, he went to Dhulia and studied it under the able guidance of Sridharshastri Pathak. On his advice, he performed the Narmada Parikrama a piligrimage along the banks of Narmada river. In 1946, he went to Oundha, the then princely state of Maharashtra, and helped Pandit Satavalekar in editing the periodicals, Purushartha (Marathi) and Vaidika Dharma (Hindi).

He is a writer with variety of experiences and finds solace particularly in past culture. His hobbies are photography, wandering and seeing the historical forts. His book Dugra Darshana is an outcome of this hobby. In order to aquaint the readers with the Shivaji era and the culture of that time, he wrote a series of novels such as Kadambarimaya Shivakala, Baya Dar Ughada, Hara Hara Mahadeva, Darya Bhayani, Jhunjara Machi, He to Shrichi Ichha. Historical romance is a very popular trend in the contemporary Marathi novels in which the cultural revivalism is emphasised as a reaction to the crisis of values in the modern world. This nostalgic attitude is also reflected in Shitu (1955), Padaghavali (1956), Pavanakathacha Dhondi and Machivarala Budha (1958). In these novels he has expressed his deep sorrow for the world going out of existence, heading towards Laya (extinction), as he says. His characters are obsessed with the disease of change. In Udoni Hansa Chalala, the love affair of Nala and Damayanti, and in Ajuni Nahi Jage Golula, the love affair of Shrikrishna and Kubja have been described beautifully. Mrinmayi and Mogara Phulala relate to Saint Jnaneshvara. Kuna Ekachi Bhramangatha is his best work describing his experiences during his Narmada Parikrama. It reveals his strength and limitations as a writer. His style of writing is descriptive, picturesque, intensive and interesting. Amhi Bhagirathache Putra (1959) is a novel on the tremendous efforts of the people for the construction of the Bhakra Nangal dam in Punjab. The purpose of this novel is to throw light upon the constructive efforts in the post-Independent India. He has also written the biography of Saint Gadage Baba. For his autobiographical writing, Smaranagatha, he was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1976.

Av.S

DANIEL, K.M. (Malayalam; b. 1920) was born in the Kunnumpurathu family, which has produced many Sanskrit scholars and Malayalam poets, of whom K.V. Simon is the best known. He had a brilliant educational career with scholarships and distinctions. He took his M.A. degree in Malayalam from the Travancore (now Kerala) University in 1942. After serving in the Defence Department for about five years, he entered the teaching profession and continued in it till retirement as Professor of Malayalam in 1975 from the University College, Trivandrum.

Daniel is essentially a literary critic proficient in Oriental and Occidental theories with little partiality for either. His works, mostly studies of well-known books and authors, bear the stamp of his deep erudition and objective judgement. They are Sankhanadam, Vimarsaveedhi, Veena Poovu Kanmumpil (A critical analysis and study of Kumaran Asan's 'Veena Poovu'), Kaladarsanam (Philosophy of Arts, which won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in 1969), Navachakravalam Naliniyilum mattum (A critical study of Kumaran Asan's major love poems, which won the Sahitya Pravartak, a Co-op Society's award for the best critical work published in the years 1972-74) and Veda Viharapathanangal (studies based on Vedaviharam). Besides these, he has published a revised version of A.R. Rajaraja Varma's Kerala Paanineeyam and has been a regular contributor to the leading Malayalam periodicals.

K.S.N.

DARABAR (Oriya) is a long poem (744 lines) by Radhanath Ray (1848-1908) and was published in 1897. It is a satirical poem, first of its type in Oriya, and dealt directly with the then contemporary Oriya society. The occasion was the gathering of feudatory kings of Orissa as well as other rich and powerful people at Cuttack, inside the Barabati fort to felicitate the new Lt. Governor of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa on his first visit to Orissa. The poem is written with end-on-rhyme couplets having 12 letters in each line. The poem begins with a reference to the historic past of the Barabati fort and ends with eulogistic accounts of Samanta Chandrasekhar, the great astro-physicist and writer of Siddhanta-Darpana , who was being honoured for his remarkable achievements. But the poem does not so much refer to incidents and events or even to persons, as (generally) to the habits and manners of people as well as to their attitudes towards life, all of which have been penetratingly assessed and analysed and severely castigated and disapproved. In the context of pomp and opulence, flaunted by almost everybody present there, through booming of guns and proud movement of kings with their retinues, the poet's attention is arrested by the smallness as well as the unethical and immoral conduct of men. Hence his voice becomes full of resentment and anger-'The old men grow mad for positions like children for toys; they fight as children fight for sweetmeats! Some show off their long heritage, whereas others boast that they are commanders of army and killers of men–"These hands have played with innumerable heads and burnt numberless villages; and the queen has honorned me with medals. Tell me, who is greater than me". The picture of police is interesting–"And he says, 'I am the police, I can create a thunder without a cloud; whether innocent or guilty, everybody is afraid of me—who does not shiver seeing me? Who fears not the hissing snake?.... I am the greatest." Elsewhere it is a reminder that in the final reckoning the judgements will be different and they will be based on now ignored criteria of virtue and goodness. Therefore the final poetic vision is one of understanding and wisdom–"Don't rot yourself in the dark hole of pride, rise slowly to the hill of dharma. In the eyes of dharma all things of the world are equal, as trees below appear equal from a hill-top. Sit there, on the hill of dharma, alone, always, and see how the world dances around you." Darabar (The Court) has been a very important and influential poem, and it has initiated a strong tradition of satirical poetry in the subsequent Oriya literature.

Jo.M.

DARD, KHWAJA MIR (Urdu; b. 1717, d. 1785) was the son of a reputed mystic, Khwaja Muhammad Nasir Andalib. He was also a renowned mystic saint of Delhi. He did not migrate to any other place even when Delhi passed through the worst days of political turmoil and economic distress.

He is deemed as one of the main architects of Urdu ghazal in Delhi. His main contribution was the use of simple, colloquial language of everyday speech and employment of short metrical forms in his ghazals in which he combines not only the usual themes of love (physical and metaphysical) and human relationships but also some intricate concepts of mystic experience. Apart from being a very important poet, he also distinguished himself as a writer of several treatises including an exhaustive book Ilmul Kitab on the philosophical aspects of Mysticism.

In Urdu literature, Dard will be remembered for his felicity and ease. He always appears to be spontaneous and effortless. Even without the ornamentation of similies and metaphors, he manages to give his ghazals the radiance of his personality, which is attractive without being ostentatious. His tone is intimate and conversational; his works simple, colloquial and jingling with friendly sounds.

In his poetry, which is intimately personal, there is a mystical insight born of deep experience and mature outlook on life. The simplicity of style and depth of Dard's poetic vision not only left an impact on his contemporaries but also found favour with the literary historians and teachers of the language, as also the Orientalists, one of whom, John Gilchrist translated into English a number of his couplets in his Grammar of the Hindustani Language such as:

Afsus ahle did ko gulshan mein ja Nahin
Nargis ko go ke ankhen hain par sujhta nahin (Alas, the enlightened enjoy not a place in this garden, for although the Narcissus hath eyes, nothing is visible to it)

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Manju Gorakhpuri Nikat-i-Manju; (Aligarh). MuhammadHusain Azad,Ab-i-Hayat;(Lahore-1917). Zahir Ahmad Siddiqui, Diwan-Khwaja Mir Dard., (Delhi-1971).

(M.H.)

DARIYAVJI (Rajasthani; b. 1676, d. 1758) was mediaeval sadhak' and saint poet and founder of the Ramsanehi sect of the Rain branch. Nothing definite is known about his parentage and caste. It is said that his mother's name was Giga or Gigan and that of his father Manaji alias Manasaram. Though he is believed to be a cotton-carder, his identity as a Hindu or a Muhammedan is disputed. The names of his parents being of the Hindu style, his birth as a Hindu may be taken for granted. He lost his parents in the childhood and was brought up by his maternal grandfather at the latter's village Rain. Rain became the place of his 'sadhana' where he founded a Ramdwara. A life-long celibate, he took initiation from Premdasji a Rajput of village Khinyasar (Bikaner). Premdasji was a disciple of Santdasji Gudadpanthi of Dantada (Bhilwara), and according to others Balakram, a disciple of Santdas, was his 'guru'. Both the Ramsanehi sects of Rain and Shahpura trace their decent from Santdas II who was the fifth in the disclpular tradition of Agradas of Ramanand Sect. Of Dariyavji's many disciples, nine were women. Of these Purandas, Kishandas, Sukhramdas, Nanakram and Harakharam were famous 'Sadhakas' and poets. Besides, there had been many other poets in this tradition, such as-Hemdas, Haridas, Ramkaran, Sanvatram, Khetaram, Sivkaran, Premdayal, Madaram Sahajram, Tejaram, and poetess Abha or Ambha Bai.

His work is said to be considerably voluminous, but at present only 412 'sakhis' (couplets) and 33 'Padas' (songs) divided respectively into different topics and music modes and notes are available in published form. After his death portions of his messages committed to memory by his disciples, was collected and put into writing to be handed down to us. A critical edition of the vani is yet needed.

He was a follower of 'Nirgun Brahma' whom he calls Ram. According to him 'Ram-smaran' is the ultimate truth in all scriptures, and this alone leads to ultimate realization, 'Jiva' can get eternal repose through 'smaran' alone. His preaching presents a beautiful synthesis of the 'Nirgun' (formless) and the 'Sagun' (formed). 'When to praise and whom to malign, as 'Nirgun' and 'Sagun' are equal in weight. 'Nirgun' is my father and 'Sagun' is my mother says he. His state of 'sadhana', experience and ideology have been revealed in selected words with brevity, clarity and force. Liveliness, lucidity, depth of thought and experience, expressed in effective similies are the qualities of his messsage. The language is spoken Rajasthani.

According to him, one need not desert home to become a saint, one can acquire sainthood even at one's home. This requires straight forwardness. fearlessness and thorough equation between the interior and the exterior. The practice of 'Sankhya-yoga' is like the zigzag movement of an ant, full of interruptions and dangers, but the 'Bhakti' is like a straight flight of a bird free from such hurdles. Exaltation of the Guru, the Saint, Rama and the glory of his 'smaran', ways of 'sadhana' and indications of his mystic state mostly form the subject matter of his messages. He does not believe in dogmas but in the realisation of the ultimate truth. He was soft and sweet, he deprecated ostentations and was respectful towards women.

Hi.M.

DARSHAK (Gujarati, b. 1914) is the pen–name of Manubhai Rajaram Pancho. He is a Gandhian thinker historian, educationist, novelist and dramatist. He is editor of Kodiyun (earthen lamp) a monthly magazine. He teaches Gujarati history and political science in Ambala and Sanoshara institutions. He was given Ranjeetram gold medal for his essays and novels in 1964. In his young age he was inspired by Gandhian ideology which he has interpreted through different genres. One of his novels Zetropithan Chhi Jani Jani (1952) is written against the background of freedom struggle led by Gandhiji. Gandhiji is brought as one of the characters of the novel to show how he tackled various problems.

His first novel Banojghar (Prison, 1931) gives us an inkling of his dormant qualities in the field of novels. His second novel Prem Ang Puja (Love and Worship, 1939) shows the impact of love on the ideals of freedom and equality. Bandhan Ane Mukti (Boundage and Freedom, 1939) a historical novel with the background of freedom struggle of 1857 established him as a novelist of repute. The Deep Nirvan (Lamp and emancipation, 1944) is also a historical novel, giving us the picture of city republics in ancient India, in which fundamental rights of the common people were not only guranteed in the written constitution but also implemented. The author recreates the glory of ancient India in an impressive manner. It is one of the top ranking historical novels. In Zerto Pidhan Chhe Jani Jani Part I & II (Poison is taken willingly 1952-1958) he has chosen the theme of India's struggle for freedom in the third decade of twentieth century and it was acclaimed as one of the great novels of post Gandhian era. Socrates (1964) is a historical novel on the successful working of the democrary. It is for the first time in Gujarati literature that a period of Greek history has been depicted in a novel. It is a glorious illustration of Gujarati prose in which sentiments and thoughts are happily and efficiently blended.

His play Paritran (Protection, 1907) depicts the conflict of Pandavas and Kauravas as a conflict between brutish strength and ethical values. The drama has been successfully staged. The Soda Ane Antim Adhyaya (The deal and the last chapter, 1982) is a historical play on the background of second world war where there is a trial of strength between the demonlike strength of Hitler and the strength of the soul force. The dialogues are catchy and the conflict is well depicted.

Greece and Rome (1946) are historical stories. Apno Varso Ane Vaibhav (Our heritage and glory, 1953) is a historical work on the cultural heritage of India and Madhyakalin Santono Sankriti Falo (contributions of saints in the mediaeval period, 1980) is a research work of a high standard. The Ithihas Ane Kelavani (history and education, 1973) is a treatise on the teaching of history, his pet subject. Vagiswari Nan Karnafulo (The flower ornaments of the ears of the goddness of learning, 1963) is a collection of his essays on literary criticism which gives us an idea of his critical faculties and his width of knowledge as he has discussed some of the best literary works of East and West. Be vichardhara (two schools of thought, 1945) a comparative study of Gandhism and Marxism. Shantinan Paya (Foundations of peace, 1973), 'Lokshahi' (Democracy, 1973) are his essays on political system having Gandhian background. In the 1978, Mahabharatno Marm (Essence of Mahabharata, 1978) the writer has elaborately explained the significance of Mahabharata and Karma theory (action therory).

Ma.S.

DARUWALLA, KEKI. N (English; b. 1937) is an eminent Indo-English poet and short story writer. Son of N. C. Daruwalla, who taught English literature, Keki also had his Master's Degree in English literature from Punjab University. As a visiting Fellow he went to Oxford in 1980. He entered government service in 1958.

His professional career as a police officer and his inherent penchant for poetry, perhaps accentuated by his somewhat disturbed and unsmooth schooling–hopping from one medium to another, have produced a sort of sceptic attitude which is reflected in his writings also. Despite his professional training and avowed aim of avoiding the 'maudlin mud' of sentimentality, Daruwalla is never a detached observer–he is rather, unlike so many of his compatriots of the Indo-English scene, deeply moved by the maladies, deprivations and miseries of the society he lives in and has written, often satirically, about them. One of the most versatile and substantial modern Indian English poets, Daruwalla's first collection of poems Under Orion was published in 1970, which immediately drew the attention of both the critical as well as the common readers for the fresh and forceful imagery. This was followed by Apparition in April, Crossing of Rivers, Winter Poems and The Keêper of the Dead which incidentally won him the Sahitya Akademi award in 1984 for its thematic variety, vivid imagery and poetic sensibility. He has to his credit a collection of short stories Sword and Abyss and several articles of criticism too. He has also edited an Anthology of Indian Poetry in English.

Daruwalla's originality lies in his depiction of the social scene which he does with rare verve and his use of subtle, sometimes ironic, imagery. He can ingeniously exploit a quite commonplace image while describing the climax of a fornication: "I enter her/ the way a boat starved of fresh water/enters a harbour" (The Night of the Jackals); or uniquely thread his boyhood memory with his grown up experience of consigning his first-born child to the flames in Fire-hymn.

A Zoroastrian, one of Daruwalla's best known poems centres round the assassination of Charvaka: in the poem of the same name he takes up the theme from the Santiparva of the Mahabharata, though his view of religion, on the whole, is "characterised by a modern scepticism tempered by a lively human curiously."

In his later poems, particularly in the poems of The Keeper of the Dead, Daruwalla seems to shift his stance; instead of depicting the society incisively, he appears to have moved towards a more personal and inward kind of poetry and his imagery which previously were of turbulance, have given place to the intense and comparatively calm ones.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M.K. Naik: A History of Indian English Literature., K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar: Indian writing in English,

M.D.

DARYANI, HARI GURDINOMAL 'DILGIR' (Sindhi; b. 1916) is a distinguished Sindhi poet. After obtaining Bachelor's degree in Science in 1939 and in Civil Engineering in 1942, he joined service in Sindh Public Works Department. He had worked as Executive Engineer at various places before migrating to India in 1958. He took to teaching and became the founder Principal of Tolani Polytechnic, Adipur in 1959. Dilgir imbibed the rules of poetic art under the guidance of Navazail Niyaz. But the content of poetry was deeply influenced by 'Bevas'. With the publication of his collection of poems 'Kod (Shells-1942), he made a mark as a promising young poet. His Harish-Chandra Jivan Kavita was published a year earlier (1941). He won the Sindhi Adabi Board Award in 1941 and 1942 for the books mentioned above. Both the books bear an unmistakable stamp of 'Bevas's influence. Mauji Git (Joyful Rhymes-1942) is a book of poems for children authored by both 'Bevas and Dilgir'. He has written many poems for children which are yet to be compiled in a book form. Mak Phura (Dewdrops-1953) is a collection of poems by 'Dilgir and Shyam'. Dilgir's other two collections are Mauj Kai Mahran (Ecstasy of the Indus-1966) and Pal Pal Jo Parlau (Music of Life's Moments-1977). He received the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1979 on the collection of his poems Pal Pal Jo Parlau The latest collections of his poems entitled Rolu Avaza (the wandering voices) was published in 1984. He introduced Hindi Git form in Sindhi which has stayed as an important form. He was the first to have experimented with Triolet, a French verse form, and has used many other forms: Wai, Doha, Bayt, Sonnet, Free verse, Ghazal, Rubai and other Persian verse forms and various metres. He has made a good use of pure Sindhi rhymes. His language is simple, full of grace and tenderness. 'Dilgir' is basically a romantic poet. Love and life are the main themes of his poertry. He is a seeker of beauty who finds an ecstasy in living a full life. He always looks the bright side of life, though at times he adverts to the injustice being done to the women by the society as also the pitiable condition of the poor. His is the poetry of hope, promise and awakening, his optimism being deep rooted. He calls himself an incorrigible optimist. He has inspired and guided many a young poet.

N.G.N.

DARYANI, KHANCHAND S. (Sindhi; b. 1898, d. 1965) Sindhi playwright, graduated in Agriculture from Poona on merit scholarship and joined Sindhi Government service in 1919. He was much influenced by Gandhiji's movement and used drama as a vehicle for social awakening. He is hailed as the father of social realism in Sindhi drama.

Khanchand founded in 1920, the 'Deti Leti' Committee to fight the evil of dowry. He wrote and presented his first play 'Gulab Jo Gul' (Rose Flower) in 1922 under the auspices of this Committee in which he played the heroine's role. This was the first full-length play on this subject. In 1923 he, alongwith like-minded writers and artists, founded the Rabindranath Tagore Literary and Dramatic Club. One of its objectives was to promote socially relevant plays. Daryani was their main writer-director.

During the active innings of over a decade, Daryani wrote 20 plays, most of these being original creations. Besides dowry and domestic conflicts and turmoils, he dealt with the problems of hunger and unemployment, the tyranny of landlords and the rich as also the travails of the farmers and the industrial labour. He later moved over to the wider and glamourous world of Hindi films. The original Plays written by the author are: 'Ratna (1924), Zamindari Zulum (1928), Maya Jo Andh (1930), Bukha Jo Shikar (1932) and the translations Mulka Ja Muddabar (Ibsen's Pillars of Society, (1923), Desha Sadpu (Materlinck's (Monna Vanna, 1927.

H.N.

DAS, ACHYUTANANDA (Oriya) is a medieval Oriya poet and one of the Panchasakhas. The year of his birth is generally placed between 1460 to 1512. According to S.N. Das, it is 1489.

Achyutananda was the son of Dinabandhu of village Tilakana in Cuttack district, belonging to 'Aho' family designated by some as 'Karana' and others as 'Gopala'. Dinabandhu was an officer of Prataparudradeva and got the designation of 'khuntia', signifying his work of supplying dresses and other articles of decoration to the deities at Jagannath, temple. His grand father Gopinatha was also an official under the king. Achyuta's mother, Padmavati was a princess of a royal family. Dinabandhu, childless for a long time, dedicated himself to Lord Jagannatha and was blessed with the son Achyuta.

His childhood was quite mysterious. He was always unmindful and some times stared at things like an idiot. He began studies at the age of five but was quite an indifferent student. His father, being much worried finally took him to Puri where he came in contact with Srichaitanya and was much delighted by his kirtan. He was then initiated by Sanatana Gosvami at the instance of Srichaitanya.

Achyutananda, on Guru's instruction, travelled to different places to propagate the doctrine of Jnanamisra bhakti. Then he joined Balarama, Jagannatha, Yasovanta and Ananta and was recognised as one among the Five Associates. Traditions believe that Achyutananda had visited the whole of India and during his itinerary he established his abode (hemitage) at Majjhikhanda or Akhandachala very close to the Maninaga hill in the state of Ranapur. Achyutananda composed Oriya Bhagavata Lahiri-Harivamsa under the patronage of Padmanabha Narendra, the king of Ranapur.

Achyuta still remains as the patron-saint of millions of Gopalas (cowherds), for whom he wrote a series of 'Ogalas' (Riddles for the cowherds).

He wrote 36 samhitas, 78 gitas, 27 vamsanucharitas, besides 7 volumes of Harivamsa, 22 Upavamsas, 100 malikeas, some koilis, some chautisas, tikas, vilasas, nirnayas, ogalas and bhajanas depicting the excellence of Srikrishna. Many of his books have not yet been printed. But his works like Bhagavatalahari Harivamsa, Sunyasamhita, Grurubhakti Gita, Anakara Samhita, Paramagupta Gita, Anantagoi, Ogala, Agata Bhavisya, Sisuvedasaptanga, Anakara Brahmayantra, Ekakshare Samhita and others have been greatly appreciated by the critics and the general readers.

Ni.M.

DAS, ARAKSITA (Oriya, d. 1846), an Oriya saint-poet, was born in B.K. Raj family. His real name was Balabhadra Deva. Like Buddha he developed a detached attitude towards the luxurious life and left the palace in quest of truth and self realisation.

Not witnessing any divinity in the so-called man-installed god, (like Dayananda Sarasvati), he propagated his faith against idolatry. Realising the pointlessness of the baneful caste-system, he began to take food from the neglected down-trodden, low-class people irrespective of caste, creed and religion. After 18 years of travel and practice of penance, he settled down in the cave of Olasuni hill which has become a holy place for his disciples after his death. Like an 'Abadhuta' (one who is free from bondage) he was nirbikara (unaffected). He realised God everywhere; in the words of Bhagavad Gita, he was a Samadarsin (one who had equal vision). He has advocated the worship of the omnipresent Nirakara Brahma (Brahma who is formless).

In the true sense of the term he was a real saint like the Panchasakhas (five associates) in Oriya literature. The essence of Orissa's religious culture is the path of Bhakti which has been reflected in the works of the spiritual exponents and saint-poets of Orissa. Araksita has expressed the doctrine of Pinda-Brahmanda (body, the same as universe) and Jnana Bhakti (Devotion by knowledge). In religious doctrine he was more akin to the great Achyutananda Dasa, author of Sunya Samhita (Text on the Void). He was well versed in Srimad Bhagavata and other major puranas (mythology). Though he built up the doctrine of his religious faith on the basis of Orissa's rich tradition, he was quite independent in spirit.

The tenets of his religious experience have been expressed in his works namely 'Mahimandala Gita (Poem of the Universe) and Bhakti Tika (commentary on devotion) in a very simple language and lucid style. In his Mahimandala Gita he has depicted the mystery of the universe and human body and their similarity in the form of a dialogue between Mana (mind) and Chaitanya (consciousness) as well as the glory of Nama (name of Nirakara Brahma), the traditional guru vandana (worship of Guru), devotion, equal vision and tolerance alongwith his reformative attitude towards untouchability. He is more a religious teacher than a poet. Araksita and Bhima Bhoi (saint poet of the Mahima Dharma) stand on an equal footing in relation to religious experience. Both of them have advocated against idolatry and untouchability like the Brahmo reformists of Bengal viz. Ramamohan Ray and Kesabchandra Sen.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mrityunjaya Ratha, Araksita O Mahimandala Gita (Cuttack, 1327), Mayadhara Mansimha, Odia Sahityara Itihasa (Cuttack, 1967).

G.B.

DAS, ARJUNA (Oriya; 15th-16th century) was an early medieval poet. Nothing is known about his parentage or the place of his birth. His pious attachment to Lord Jagannath and the lively descriptions in his works, of the details of daily worship and important Yatras (ritualistic festivals) of the Lord lead to the surmise that he lived in Puri. His time is likewise uncertain. However, his ideas of pre-Chaitanya Jnanamisra Bhakti and his language including the obsolete words used by him as well as the profuse references to his lines in the works of poets posterior to him are fairly sufficient evidence to place him around 1450-1525.

Of the two Kavyas of Arjuna Das discovered so far, Ramabibaha (literally, the marriage of Rama, published in 1931) is doubtless the earlier one. A kavya of twelve cantos its theme has been taken from the Ramayana ending with the return of king Dasaratha's party to Ayodhya after the marriage. The style is puranic. There is otherwise little poetic excellence, nevertheless in Ramabibaha he carves out a canto-based Kavya form followed by his successors afterwards.

In his other Kavya, Kalpalata (literally, the creeper fulfilling all desires, published in 1961) so named after its Nayika (heroine), Arjuna Das writes on an original love theme, detatched from the Puranas, the epics and religion, with fictitious characters on the model of the traditional Sringara (erotic) Kavyas in Sanskrit. In course of treatment he divides it into thirteen cantos with guidance as to Raja (metre) and/or Vani (tune of an earlier popular song). His concept of this erotic Akhyayika Kavya (verse-tale) has become, as it were, to his medieval successors in matter of form and content, of technique and development, a finished model to be copied with marginal variations only.

Arjuna Das was thus a pioneer poet who assimilated into Oriya Akhyayika Kavya literature the structual peculiarities of the Samskrit Mahakavya with a view to producing Sringara Rasa (erotic relish). Although so astoundingly original, he was too simple and unsophisticated in language as well as presentation, so that both his works had the indigenous Puranic touch but lacked the characteristic excellence of the courtly Sanskrit Kavyas.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Artaballabh Mahanti: Ramabibaha (Introduction); Kedaranatha Mahapatra, Kalplata (Introduction); Nilmani Misra, Kalpalata O Kabi Arjuna Dasa., The Nabajibana–Vol. III No. 6; Surendra Mahanti, Odia Sahityara Madhyaparba.

G.C.U.

DAS, ATIBADI JAGANNATHA (Oriya; b. 1490), the author of Oriya Bhagavata is a house-hold name in Orissa not only as a poet of devotion (Bhaktakavi) but also as a translator of the Bhagavata into Oriya in sonorous couplets. Sanskrit was the predominant language in Orissa before the time of Jagannatha Das. The Brahmins recognised it as the official language by composing outstanding works in Sanskrit. The masses however, could not understand the significance of the Vedas, Vedangas, Puranas, Dharmasastras, etc.. written in Sanskrit. The Brahmins influenced the rulers mainly to encourage composition in Sanskrit.

Although Gajapati Kapilendradeva of the Suryavamsa was himself a patron of Sanskrit he was never indifferent to the Oriya language. He incorporated Oriya songs in his Sanskrit drama Parasurama Vijaya. During his period Sarala Dasa could become a Ganakavi for his Mahabharata, Ramayana and Chandipurana. Thereafter, Balarama Dasa also earned the same reputation for his Oriya Ramayana.

During the time of Prataparudradeva, the common people in Orissa were immediately attracted towards the Oriya language. Born in the Kausika family, one Bhagavan Dasa of Kapileswarapur near Srikshetra (Puri) was a professional reciter of the Puranas (Purana-Panda). His wife Padmavati, was extremely pious and devoted to him. To them was born Jagannath Das in 1412 Saka era (1490 A.D.) on the eighth day of Bhadra bright fort-night. As he was intelligent and interested in learning, he could acquire considerable knowledge of Sanskrit and Philosophy within a very short time. Being deprived of parental care in his early youth, and having devotion towards Lord Jagannatha, the poet began to recite puranas under the Banyan tree (Kalpa-Vata) within the precincts of the Jagannatha temple.

It is learnt that to fulfil his mother's pious desire, Jagannatha Das began translating the Bhagavata into Oriya in 1508, at the age of eighteen years. He completed the Gopalila portion of the Dasamaskandha. When Chaitanya reached Puri in 1509-10 he was charmed to listen to the episode of Krishna's Rasalila and praised him along with his other disciples.

Jagannatha Das wanted to be initiated by Chaitanya who had been greatly impressed by his spirit of devotion and intellect, but Chaitanya advised him to get his initiation from Balarama Dasa, the greatest Oriya Vaishnava poet. This has been corroborated by the Jagannatha Charitamrita and Dibakara Dasa's Nityagupta Chudamani. Chaitanya was extremely pleased with him and conferred upon him the title 'Atibadi' (greatly great) indicating his saintly character. He is, therefore, popularly known as Atibadi.

Besides his Bhagavata, Jagannatha Das also wrote a number of books such as Krishnabhakti Kalpalata, Krishnabhakti Kaopalataphala, Nityaguptamala, Upasana Sataka, Niladri Sataka, Sri Radharasamanjari, Prema Sudhanidhi and Nityachara Upasanavidhi in Sanskrit, and Saivagama, Golokasaroddhara, Solachaupadi, Brahmanda Bhugola, Tula bhina, Artha Koiliet in Oriya. He has also composed numerous Bhajans in honour of Lord Jagannatha and Krishna and many others on Brahmajnana. The first chapter of his Dwadasa Skandha bears hint that the poet died after the completion of his Ekadasa Skandha. Dwadasa Skanda was subsequently completed by his disciple, Mahadeva Dasa. He has left behind him a Matha at Puri, called the Bada Odiya Matha. He was one of the Pancha Sakhas (Five Associates) of Orissa.

As time passed, the Sanskrit pandits became increasingly jealous of the immense popularity of Jagannatha Das's Bhagavata among the masses in Orissa. They devised ways to create scandalous stories about him on every occasion. Nevertheless, by the grace of Lord Jagannatha and his association with the Gajapati Prataparudradeva and his queen, he emerged unscathed from all attempts of defamation.

Ni.M.

DAS, BACCHA (Oriya, 16th century) is an early medieval Oriya poet. Nothing absolutely is known about his family and place of residence. The only work attributed to his authorship is the Kalasa Chautisa (first discovered and included in the Prachina Gadyapadyadarsha of Artaballabha Mahanti in 1932) which was not known to the earlier historians of Oriya literature. Mahanti happened to come across a phrase-Kalasa Padhanti (literally, read or recite Kalasa) in the Mahabharata of Sarala Das and supposed that by Kalasa, Sarala Das referred to this hitherto unknown Kalasa Chautisa of Baccha Das. Accordingly he argued in the critical introduction of his work that in order to be so mentioned by Sarala Das this literary piece must have attained sufficient popularity and hence concluded that it was written a century earlier i.e. in the middle of the 14th century. For about two decades Mahanti's view was accepted and Kalasa Chautisa was held to be the earliest specimen of extant Oriya poetry. But in the early fifties Mahanti's argument was challenged and the time of Kalasa Chautisa as well as Baccha Das became an interesting controversial issue. The work was studied in its various aspects such as theme, ritual discipline, diction, poetic pattern and music and it is now generally believed that the word kalasa in the Mahabharata did not mean the title of this poem. On the contrary it meant benedictory verses, recited on auspicious occasions like marriage. Hence Baccha Das was not anterior to Sarala Dasa. Its subtlety of poetic concept and the logical and more polished use of idioms, despite some archaic words and phrases, suggest that the work may belong to a more developed period, the early 16th century.

Kalasa Chautisa is in fact a panegyric to Shiva although cleverly written in the form of a satire. As a Chautisa it contains thirty four stanzas composed in the alphabetic order peculiar to that poetic pattern. The theme is the marriage of Shiva and Gaura (Gouri: Parvati). But the bridegroom has been described as old and decrepit and as he rides on his old haggard bull bending almost double in tense asthmatic fits, he is unable to recognise men from a close distance, nor can he hear their voices. An incarnation of poverty, the bearded rustic has besmeared his body with ashes, and has a wreath of serpents on the heavy braids of hair on his head. The wretched looking man is unable to hold himself erect while sitting on the altar. The daughter of King Himavanta and her mother take a glimpse of this gaunt man from aside and both burst into tears while Gauri swears that she would commit sucide if her hand is given in marriage to this old man. They allege that although there were so many young princes, the father has picked up this old man as suitor to his beautiful young daughter with a motive to make money out of it. But soon the king comes and consoles them saying that Gauri was a really fortunate girl in getting for her spouse this God of the gods. The king's order was carried out and the marriage solemnized. After the rituals were over, Shiva dropped his disguise and appeared as a handsome young man and the couple had a happy honeymoon.

The style and diction are mainly archaic, but the satire is based on the social evil of selling young maids to rich and lustful old man and in this context the realistic depiction of the bridegroom in near-death condition and strong resentment of the young maid in juxtaposition make this poem a unique piece of art, although some critics feel that the traditional character of Uma has been lowered thereby.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bamsidhara Mahanti, Sahitya O Samskriti, Janashakti Pustakalaya 1955, Gaurikumara Brahma, Samasya O Samadhanas; Kunjabihari Tripathi: Oriya Sahitya Samiksana (1936).

K.C.S.

DAS, BALARAMA (Oriya 15th-16th century), the poet–composer of Jagamohan Ramayana was a contemporary of Gajapati Prataparudradeva and also of Chaitanya. The poet himself has given a few details about his life. From his Jagamohan Ramayana and Srimadbhagavad Gita it is known that his father was Mahamantri Somanatha Mahapatra. In Jagamohan Ramayana, there is a reference to his mother, Manamayi and his family. He neither mentions Gajapati Prataparudra nor Chaitanya in these works. In yet another work Uddhaba Gita, Balarama Das gives some more details about his life. According to it he used to please Lord Jagannatha with his songs during the period of the Lord's stay at Gundicha Mandir during Rathajatra festival. In his other books such as Gitavakasa, Brahma Gita, Bhava Samudra, Bata Abakasa and Panasa Chori, an-exaggerated account of the poet's devotion to Jagannatha can be seen along with references to Prataparudradeva, who on many occasions tried to test Balarama's knowledge of scriptures like Gita, Vedanta, Brahma Vidya as well as his devotion to Lord Jagannatha, Vedantasara Guptagita is his only work in which both Prataparudra and Chaitanya have been mentioned. According to this work, the King Prataparudra accepted Chaitanya as his Guru and Balarama Das as his Parama Guru. But as the work is supposed to have been written in 1510, which coincides with the year of Chaitanya's arrival at Puri the fact mentioned is very doubtful.

Madhaba Pattanaik, most likely a younger contemporary of Balarama, in his Vaishnava Lilamrita mentions that Balarama together with his four friends, accompanied Chaitanya in his tour throughout Orissa. And when Balarama died, the whole of Orissa, especially Puri, was shocked and people felt shaken as though a mighty banyan tree had fallen.

Devakinandan, a 16th century Vaishnava of Bengal, in his Vaishnava Bandana, gives high tribute to Balarama for his supernatural powers.

Divakara Das, the 17th century writer, who authored Jagannatha Charitamrita (the biography of Jagannatha Das) makes a casual reference to Balarama. According to him Balarama was a disciple of Hridaya Narayana in the line of Gauri Das Pandita and was a devotee of high order. Further, Balarama Das was always absorbed in reciting the Lord's name and so was known as 'matta Balarama' (mad Balaram). He was one of the close associates of Chaitanya, who directed him to accept Jagannatha Das as his disciple. He then went on a pilgrimage to Dwaraka.

According to another 17th century work, the Chaitanya Bhagavata (a biography of Chaitanya) of Ishwar Das, Balarama was the son of Somanatha, an officer of the king, and came from Chandanpur, a village near Jajapur. When Chaitanya was passing through this village, Balarama met him and joined his party. Chaitanya initiated him in the 'Rama taraka Paramabrahma'. Elsewhere he says that once Balarama was invited to grace one grand festival (mahotsava) at Cuttack, arranged by Prataparudradeva, where he was honoured as the writer of the Ramayana and Srimad Bhagavat Gita. Chaitanya made him the supervisor of the Nanda Matha. According to Ishwar Das, Balarama having subdued a mad elephant once was called 'matta Balarama' by the people for his dare-devil act.

According to a local tradition reported by Jagabandhu Singh in his Prachina Utkal, in the early part of the present century, Balarama died at a ripe old age, on his way to Puri, at Begunia, near Konarka, on the Akshaya Tritiya day (early April). There is a samadhi of Balarama in this village and every year a festival (mela) takes place on the Akashaya Tritia Day honouring Balarama. In the nearby village, Erabanga, there is a Jagannatha temple, which it is believed was built by Balarama, who used to offer his daily prayers to Lord Jagannatha in this temple, as it was impossible for him to go to Puri due to his debilitating old age. The people, in grateful remembrance of the builder, call this Jagannatha temple the Balarama temple.

Balarama Das is famous as the poet of Jagamohan Ramayana also known as Dandi Ramayana, the first and greatest complete Ramayana in Oriya literature. This Ramayana, because of its immense popularity in Orissa, had influenced almost all the later poets of Rama-kavyas. He is credited with the writing of the following:-

Kanta Koili, Baramasi Koili, Hanumana Chautisa, Kamalalocchana Chautisa, Srimad Bhagavat Gita, Gupta Gita, Vedantasara Gupta Gita, Uddhaba Gita, Brahma Gita (Prose), Pralamba sara Gita (Prose), Amarakosha Gita, Brahmanda Bhugola, Bata Abakasha, Bedha-Pariknama, Bhabasamudra and Karna Dana.

All these works are well known and popular in Orissa, because of their philosophical discussions on the subjects like kaya yoga, Jnana-bhakti marga, and prema-bhakti marga. The poet's devotion to Lord Jagannatha is also to be seen in most of these works, specially in Bhaba-samudra and Bata-Abakasa. A child in Orissa starts his education from a book of Balarama like Kamalalochana Chautisa, makes his life meaningful when he grows up by reading the works like Jagamohan Ramayana, Uddhaba Gita, etc. and meets his death in the old age after listening to Srimad Bhagavat Gita of Balarama.

K.C.S.

DAS, BANAMALI (Oriya, 18th century) a notable poet of Padavali literature in Orissa, lived in the last part of the 18th century. He was a contemporary of Birakishore Deb (1735-1792) of Khurda Raj family. He was known in his day as one of the most popular writers of Orissa. His fame as a Vaishnava-devotee and a poet spread throughout Orissa through singers, devotees, dancing girls and even through common people who wanted to remember his impassioned songs either for their private prayers to god, or to please the gatherings of devotees.

In spite of this popularity he was being often confused with a number of Banamali Dasas, who were also known as poets. One of these Banamati Dasas was the writer of Chata Ichhabati (a poem of romance) who flourished most probably in the 16th century. The other Banamali Das, popularly known as Sisu Banamali, was a poet of the same period and was known for his Rasa Kavya. The third Banamali Das known as the writer of Sachitra Ramayana, a translation of Bhojaraja Champu, was also a contemporary of Birakishore Deb of Khurda. Though these poets were well-known for their Kavyas, they are not to be confused with Banamali Das under discussion, who was and has all along been famous for his extremely melodious devotional songs and fine Padavali lyrics.

From the inadequate materials available about him the following can be said about his life. He was an inhabitant of Puri and was born in a Karana (Kayastha) family. His original family title was Pattanaik. After accepting the Vaishnava cult, he came to be known as Ballavananda Das. But by that time, as he had already been known as a poet, he preferred to retain his earlier name instead of the name given to him by his Guru. A collection of his poems was first published in 1934, long after his death, with the title Banamali Padyabali, under the joint editorship of Babaji Baishnaba Charan Das and Samanta Gaurakrishna Kabiratna Pattanaik. In this collection there were about 200 poems. The editors claimed that they had collected the poems from a manuscript written by the poet himself. In the subsequent editions of this collection, another 34 poems appear, in which the names of Charan Das, a close friend and supporter of the poet, and Birakishore Deb, the patron of the poet, figure.

The time prior to Banamali Das was known as the Riti Schooi of poetry, which almost reached its climax in the works of Upendra Bhanja. Words fascinated the poets of Riti School, and they attempted not mere arrangement but almost played with words wherever they needed and wherever they wished, for the purpose of alliteration and assonance. Banamali did not follow this tradition. He was more interested in thoughts than words. He always geared his language to the need of thought and never permitted himself any indulgence with sound. His use of colloquial and idiomatic language, as also the simplicity of his diction moved him towards clarity and precision so much that his popularity soon reached a new high and even surpassed that of most of his predecessors.

Banamali was a fine lyric poet, and one of the finest in Oriya literature and ranked with Kavisurya and Gopal Krishna for his intense and impassioned emotions and haunting melody.

K.C.S.

DAS, BHAKTACHARAN (Oriya; b. 1729, d. 1813) was an eminent Vaishnava poet. Born in a Karan family, his original name was Bairagicharan Pattanayak. He became famous as Bhaktacharan after initiation to Vaishnava cult in the lineage of Rupa Gosvami. He was well'versed in Sanskrit devotional literature and philosophy, travelled to all the sacred places of India on foot, established many 'maths' in Orissa. His Mathura Mangala (Bliss of Mathura) and Manah Siksha (lesson to the mind) are read and appreciated as his best Kavyas.

Mathura Mangala narrates the departure of Krishna to Mathura, the wailing of the gopis (cowherd maidens) in his separation, Uddhaba's arrival as messanger and consolation to gopis by explaining Vedantic philosophy (jnana), in response the gopi's discarding jnana and placing Bhakti (loving devotion) above all other paths of liberation. Actually the poet-devotee establishes the superiority of devotion to jnana. In Manah Siksha the poet lays down all principles and day to day practices to be followed by an aspirant of Raganuga Sadhana (practice of erotic love to Krishna).

Other popular compositions are Gopa Mangal (Bliss of Gopa), Manabodha Chautisa and Kalakalevara Chautisa. These are so popular that till now, they are read in every house in a Orissan village.

Do.S.

DAS, BHOLANATH (Assamese; b. 1858 d. 1929) was a great rhyme innovator in Assamese. He passed Entrance Examination from Nowgong High School, but could not pursue higher education because of his mother's sudden death. Henceforth, he worked in different capacities, such as those of district surveyor of Nowgong, teacher in the Nowgong High School, clerk in the education department, and teacher in the Sibsagar Survey School. In 1888 he successfully appeared in the Provincial Subordinate Civil Service Examination and became a sub-deputy Collector. Here, he steadily rose to be an assistant settlement officer from which post he retired in 1912. He was connected with several social activities. In addition to that he was interested in painting, sewing, carpentry, etc. He was a quiet soft-spoken gentleman, who lived within his means.

Besides efficiently discharging his official duties he also made notable contribution to Assamese literature where he earned a niche for himself. The noted literary critic Dimbeswar Neog has described him as the fine morning star of Assamese Kavya in blank verse. He may be said also to have initiated the Assamese lyric and epic style of writing.

Assamese literature was passing through a critical stage when Bholanath took to writing. In 1836, the Assamese language was replaced in the schools and courts by the Bengali language. For about 36 years Assamese school children had to read Bengali in the place of their mother tongue. The tussle between their mother tongue and Bengali resulted in the birth of a hybrid language which was not doing any good to anybody. We find regret and misery expressed on this matter by the writers of the time like Gunaviram Barua, Lambodar Bora, Kamala kanta Bhattacharya, Bholanath Das and others. Their writings were also a clarion call to Assamese people to undo this injustice.

Bholanath was educated through the medium of Bengali but he wrote his Sitaharan Kavya in Assamese at that very time of language crisis. His model in blank verse and vocabulary was of course, Michael Madhusudan Dutta of Bengal. A part of Bholanath's Kavya written while he was still a student was published in the Assam Bilasini in 1878. His Sitaharan Kavya was however completed ten years later, in 1888. The use in his kavya of newly coined words and verbs derived from nouns has made his book a little artificial but there are marks of poetic grandeur here and there.

In 1882-83, two parts of his poetical selection entitled Kavitamala appeared. During the next year was published, in two volumes, his second book of poetry entitled Chintatarangini. His incomplete manuscript, bearing the title Subhadra Haran was irrecoverably lost.

In the first part of his Kavitamala there are twenty poems. Though the language is at times a little archaic, there are definite signs of the new romantic age that was gradually coming to Assamese literature during the British period. His poems Megha, Madhuhasi, Kiyono Na Jage Mon, etc. are the earliest attempts and models of modern poetry. In his poems and essays there is the use of Sanskrit and tatsama words and he was the first to employ the blank verse. In several poems of his Kavitamala and Chintatarangini he also uses some unrhymed couplets of which he is reckoned as an exponent.

As a matter of fact it was Bholanath who liberated Assamese poetry from the rigours of the closed rhymed couplet and by employing blank verse infused into it a new verse movement. He is not only the path-finder of this majestic verse, but also its most successful artist. This does not take away from his merit in the rhymed verse to which his contribution is by no means less memorable. He admitted with gratitude his indebtedness to Michael Madhusudan Dutta in this regard.

The chief characteristic of his verse is not the end-stopped line but the end-stopped thought. A second characteristic is its verse paragraph. Here again he showed great skill. In addition to this the use of Sanskrit tatsama words he conferred on his lines not only music and virility but also classical dignity.

The thought content of his poems was not negligible. The model that he set of instructional poems intended for text books was later imitated by several other poets. He wrote a few poems in the form of questions and answers, much in the pattern of the Ojapali system of Assam.

In thought and execution his writings together with those of Ramakanta Chowdhury constitute the first new move forward in Assamese poetry.

Ni.B.

DAS, BIRAKISHORA (Oriya, b. 1896, d. 1973) was a famous lyricist, better known as 'Jatiya Kabi' (National poet) for his patriotic songs. He began to write patriotic poems, when he was serving as a clerk under the British. But subsequently he had to quit the job. His first collection of poems, Mohana Banshi (Mohan's Flute, 1921) was based on the principles of non-co-operation movement launched by Gandhiji. Bidrohabina (Rebellious Harp, 1930) depicted the events of salt satyagraha movement of 1930. His other collections like Ranabheri (War Trumpet, 1932) and Dundubhi (Drum, 1932) were also full of patriotic feelings. These books were banned during the British regime. But the poet did not submit to the British Government and suffered imprisonment in consequence. In the prison, he wrote lyrical poems, collected in Sabuja Sathi (Young Companion, 1934). He was inspired to write poems on Gandhiji's fasting for untouchability at Yerwada prison. The hero of his poem is Bandhua, a harijan friend of his childhood, who was denied the right to worship Goddess Saraswati. This type of poems indicates the social consciousness of the poet. Gandhian ideals like non-violence, love, and sacrifice are the themes of his collection Smriti Kanika (Molecules of Memory). After independence the poet had turned his attention towards the development of children by starting a monthly magazine for children called Mo Desha (My Country). Recently Government of Orissa has established a college at Cuttack and named it after the poet; it is a real tribute to Jatiya Kabi Birakishora.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Binode Kanungo, Jatiya Kabi Bira Kishora, Cuttack, 1977.

S.P.

DAS, BISNU (Oriya; b. 1575, d. 1625) was the poet of the medieval ages. His parentage as well the place of birth are not known. Nevertheless, from references in a Kavya, Lilabati (so far unpublished) by Raghunatha Harichandana (1580-1610), vassal Prince of Banapura, it has been inferred that he was the court-poet of Banapura. This prince, a lover of literature, had in his court a galaxy of writers including Bisnu Dasa, who had 'filled the whole world', as it were, with his poetry. The prince learnt the art of poetical composition from Bisnu Dasa, who was an erudite scholar of Sanskrit Kavya and poetics, a fact very clearly borne out by the standard of excellence in his works. Another vassal Prince, Kunjabihari Bhramarabara of Dhenkanala (1650-1670), mentions in his Kavya Premasila (also unpublished) that his poetry would surpass the poetic glory of Bisnu Dasa and other poets of his rank.

Bisnu Das's Sabitri Charita (Second edition, 1950, Chakradhara Mahapatra) is a Kavya in seven cantos celebrating the popular theme of Sabitri and Satyaban. It is written in the usual Puranic style. But Premalochana, an Akhyayika Kavya of 20 cantos which is his major work bears clear traces of his poetic power. In respect of theme, this kavya is a depiction of the love affairs between Princess Premalochana and Prince Sudhakara. They were introduced to each other through the good offices of a goose, and got married later. In this respect, it has borrowed ideas from Sanskrit kavyas, particularly, Naisadhiya Charita, as well as similar earlier Oriya Kavyas. The author has experimented with the ornate style of the traditional pattern peculiar to the Naisadhiya Charita. In comparison with the earlier Akhyayika Kavyas, the diction of Premalochana has become more alliterative. The depiction is punctuated with more uncommon similies, metaphors and hyperboles. The style shows a transition from the simple Puranic approach appealing directly to the heart, to the more complicated verbose style of courtly poetry calling for greater intellectual exercises. In other words, Bisnu Dasa's Premalochana ushers in a new era of Oriya poetry, the courtly Riti Kavyas of more than two centuries to follow. Bisnu Dasa's other works include a fairly large number of Chautisas including Sumukhi Chautisa (Prachi, 1931), Barsabhabana Chautisa (Prachi, 1931), Mandakini-Chautisa (Prachi, 1931), Ksetrabiraha Chautisa (1978) and Sandesa Chautisa (1979).

G.C.U.

DAS, CHITTARANJAN (Bengali; b. 1870, d. 1925) was an eminent Bengali statesman and poet. Das was a famous barrister, nationalist leader (Deshabandhu) and founder of the Swarajya Party of Bengal. But his contributions in the field of poetry may not be as well known. Even while he was deeply engaged in politics he had within his heart a soft corner for poetry and his love of literature found expression in his sponsoring and editing of the journal Narayan (1914-22) and in a number of books of poems which he wrote during the period. A Brahmo by birth, he turned to Vaishnavism in his later life and he chose poetry as the best vehicle for the outpouring of his emotion, emotion born of this new faith. His Sagar Sangit (The Song of the Ocean, 1913) is the most representative of his books of poems and is noted for its grandeur of sentiment and devotional content. This was translated into English by Sri Aurobindo. Among his other works of this genre are Malancha (The Floral Bower, 1895), Mala (The Garland, 1904), Antarjami (In-dwelling God, 1915), etc.

N.C.

DAS, DANAI (Oriya; 18th century) was a poet. Nothing is known about his parentage or place of birth. Curiously, scholars assign Dasa to the period between the 15th and 18th centuries, but the consensus favours the 18th century. His only kavya, Gopibhasa (literally, the cowhered women speak) published in non-abridged form (Prachi, 1929) depicts the love between Krishna and the gopis. A legend assigns 96 cantos to this Kavya, but the present compilation of 32 cantos gives Gopibhasa a fairly complete look. There are altogether 3610 two-line verses written in a single metre, each line consisting of eleven Aksharas (syllables).

Gopibhasa dwells upon the reminiscences of the gopis after the departure of Lord Krishna form Gokula to Mathura, the city of Kamsa, with Kamsa's minister, Akrura, on an express understanding that he would be back in four day's time. Krishna, however, failed to return. The gopis waited eagerly. The playful Krishna had always delighted them with his naughty pranks. He would mysteriously assume the size of a charming full-grown youth with whom each Gopi spent blissful moments. The first sixteen cantos of Gopibhasa are devoted to the life of the gopis during the sixteen days immediately following Krishna's departure. Sixteen thousand in number, they have sixteen daily meetings under the leadership of the sixteen celebrated gopis, namely, Radhika, Lalita, Bisakha, Indurekha, Mallika and others. In simple poetic lines, the poet has narrated the pangs of lovers' hearts, with accounts of intimate bliss experienced by the individual gopis. The poet has imagined about a hundred such episodes. These are, with dexterity, put into the mouths of the rustic women folk, expressed in simple language commensurate with the natural upsurge of pathos in their hearts. There is repetition, and the direct narration of love-making has, at times, become sickening. Still, the graphic and life-like portrayal of characters, panoramic description, the simple language and the natural settings have earned Gopibhasa a covetable glory and a status parallel only to the most popular folk poetry. Dasa has devoted the other half of his kavya to the Vaishnavite philosophy. As desired by Lord Krishna, Radhika is initiated by Sage Angira and as the queen of Brindabana, guides the gopis to a life of real devotion. Later, Sage Narada instructs the gopis in the objectives of an incarnation, and helps them to reconcile themselves to their present fate with a fond hope that after all, Krishna remains their Lord, and would return to them after eight years. Two Chautisas, namely, Sana Kannada and Bada Kannada Chautisa are also attributed to Dasa's authorship.

G.C.U.

DAS, DEBADURLABHA (Oriya; 16th century) was a devout Vaishnava poet of great erudition. Nothing is known about his parentage and residence.

The only poetical work ascribed to him is Rahasyamanjari (literally, the bunch of mystery flowers, published by Prachi, 1925), a Kavya in twentyfour cantos, based on a religious theme pertaining to the mystery of the cult of devotional love between Sri Krishna as Lord and the Gopis (cowherd women), headed by Radha, as devotees. The story dramatically begins with the malicious curiosity of the queens of Dvaraka, Krishna's consorts, at his estimation of Gopi's love as greater than theirs, and then weaves around their visit in the Lord's company to Brindabana, where they were greatly impressed with the unfathomable love of the Gopis manifested with the celebrated Rasakrida. At last the damsels acknowledged, with all humility, the greatness of Gopibhaba whereupon they were admitted to the presence of Radha. She greeted them with profound honour, as they were her counterparts in Dvaraka, where the Lord had preferred to live in their company. The story, as rightly claimed by the author, is not found in any of the famous Vaishnavite works, and is only cognate to that of Gopichandana by Chanda Dasa. The religious importance of Rahasyamanjari consists in glorifying Gopibhaba and clearly depicting Radha as the chief Gopi, an approach initiated by Chanda Dasa.

But of greater significance is its literary merit. Das's style shows a happy blending of the Puranic directness and the simple lucidity of the pattern of early Akhyayika Kavya, punctuated with the rhythmic requirement of the metre employed, leading ultimately to a neat finish with regard to the sound and meaning sequence. The descriptions of nature and of human forms and movements are graphic as well as suggestive and brief: Das's poetry thus breathes an air of realistic naturalness. Further, here is an example of effective characterization in the portrayal of the malicious Jambabati, the love-ridden Radha and Gopis, the devoted and innocent Garuda etc., a fact which accounts for the rich human appeal sustained throughout. Finally, the poet maintains adequate restraint in the matter of depicting the lovers' conjugal dalliances, a fact which lends the Kavya an appreciable gravity. Rarely is there a Kavya with such marked degree of success as Rahasyamanjari that combines the poet's originality, erudition, impressive exactitute as to religious doctrine and artistic excellence all blended in one.

G.C.U.

DAS, DEBESH (Bengali; b. 1911) was educated in Calcutta and London, passed Bar-at-Law from the Middle Temple and was enlisted in the Indian Civil Service. He served in different capacities under the Government of India and retired in 1969 as a Cabinet Secretary.

A widely travelled man, he started writing since he was a student. His first book Europa (1940) in Bengali was introduced by Tagore, and its Hindi version by Rajendra Prasad; next book Rajoara (1953) earned him the glory of felicitation in the royal court of Udaipur. His first short story book Rome Theke Romna (1954), earned the first prize of German Literary Digest. His first novel was Raktarag (1955).

He delivered lectures on Indian Literature in Oxford, London, New York and Prague and presided over All India Bengali Literary Conference at Jaipur. He was an Associate of the Sahitya Akademi and UNESCO for eighteen years.

FURTHER WORKS: Ardhek Manavi Tumi (1954), Rajasi (1955)., Sei Chirakal (1957)., Pashchimer Janala (1960)., Pratham Dhareche Kali (Poetri, 1960) Brihattara Bangla (1984).

B.M.

DAS, DIBAKARA (Oriya) is recognised as the first biographer in Oriya literature. He was the fifth in the preceptorial descent from Jagannath Dasa. He composed Jagannatha Charitamrita, concerning the life of Jagannath Dasa, the author of Oriya Bhagavata. His other works include Ekadasi Mahatmya and some Chaupadi poems.

Dibakara was a Vaishnava Brahmin. Name of his proceptor was Navinkishor Das. He composed his Jagannatha Charitamrita both in Sanskrit and Oriya. It consists of twenty four chapters. The first, second, eleventh and the fourteenth chapters deal with certain historical events like the meeting of Chaitanya and Jagannatha Dasa, his initiation and return of the Gaudiya Bhaktas to Brindavana, his being accused before the King Prataparudradeva and his being put to test and finally his death. The book also gives details of Jagannath Dasa's education and his desire to compose the Bhagavata. It also tells the reader of the significance of Jagannath Dasa's compositions, his devotion and his disciples, further, it tells of the greatness of Srikshetra, the town of the Lord Jagannatha temple. The book also gives names of certain devotees, who had participated in the discussions during the stay of Chaitanya at Puri. It refers to Chaitanya's worry about the excesses of Kali Yuga, the constant decline of the human character and his being absorbed in the body of Jagannath. It tells of the establishment of the Bada Odia Matha at Baselisahi in Puri town by Jagannath Dasa for the 'Atibadi' sect.

Dibakara's other book Ekadasi Mahatmaya consists of ten chapters dealing with the performance of the Ekadasi Vrata and its significance.

Ni.M.

DAS, DINAKRISHNA (Oriya; b. 1650, d. 1710) stands out among the great poets and devotees of Krishna and Radha cult in the medieval Oriya literature and flourished during the rule of king Divya Singh Dev of Khurda Royal Families. He was of the age of ornate poetry in Oriya. The metaphors and similies were modelled on the pattern and style of Sanskrit Kavya and the hall mark of ornate style was verbal artificialities, pedantries, subtle rhymes, etc. Further, the literary compositions during his period were marked by adherence to the depiction of the theme of Vaishnavite devotion enshrined in the eternal love of Radha and Krishna. Medieval Oriya poetry was overwhelmingly packed with the essence and import of Vaishnavite movement. Besides, the pervading cult of Jagannath had exerted its indelible impact on Oriya literature and it was a force to reckon with. The then Oriya literature and the writings of the medieval poets like Dinakrishna Das emphasised the importance of lord Jagannath or Purushottam who is identified with Lord Krishna of Brindaban.

Dinakrishna Das developed a poetic pattern consituting embellishment of words and imageries and description of the passion of love as displayed between Krishna and Radha. Dinakrishna is credited with a number of worthy literary works among which Rasakallol (Waves of Delight) is his greatest work. The theme of this notable work is derived from the episode of Krishna's departure to Mathura while its craftmanship is characterised by verbal jugglery and the obsession with sex, to the extent of being vulgar.

Rasakallol is divided into 34 cantos each designed in a different metre. The first canto describes the importance of Jagannath, the next chapter is devoted to the emergence and birth of Krishna and the remaining cantos describe the delight of Gopis, the attempt of Putana to kill the child Krishna, the childhood of Krishna and Balaram, the erotic play of Krishna with Gopis, the destruction of Kaliya, the projection of Radha, the most extra-ordinary beauty and youth's enduring symbol, the description of different seasons and its impact on the erotic behaviour of Radha, Gopis, and Krishna, the depiction of Rasalila, the union of Radha and Krishna, then the journey of Krishna to Mathura at the summons of Kansa, the killing of Kansa, the separation of Krishna from the Gopis, the pang of separation suffered by the Gopis, the conversation of Uddhaba with Gopis on the theme of the power of devotional knowledge. One finds in Rasakallol an echo of Jayadev's celebrated love lyric Gitagovinda, a hunger for erotic ecstacy linked with the spiritual quest, a sublimation of massive erotic passion and a profound understanding of the Vaishnavite humility and devotion to the cult of Radha Krishna. Packed with accumulative detail, it is replete with sweetness, and is recognised as a major literary work in medieval Oriya Vaishnavite poetry. Its structure is dominated uniformly by musical vibration of a tender heart. Further, the speciality of the work lies in that each line in each canto carries 'ka' initial throughout the book. Krishna is the hero and Gopis are heroines and Gopalila of Krishna is its theme. Dinakrishna Das in the Rasakallol has achieved poetic excellence and Vaishnavite synthesis between the devotional attitude of Gaudiya Vaishnavas and Orissa Vaishnavas. Artatran Chautisa is another enchanting composition by Dinakrishna regarded as a masterpiece of adequate lyrical exultation and devotional fervour. As such Artatran Chautisa literally meaning the "Ode of an afflicted soul" is a poetic document of a bleeding soul. The name Dinakrishna Das in medieval Oriya poetry is a controversial one as one Dinakrishna Das is credited with the authorship of literary works such as Rasabinod, Madhab Mangal, Jagamohan Chhanda, Namratha Gita, Prastab Sindhu and Guna Sagar. Anyway, Dinakrishna Das of Rasakallol and Artatran Chautisa occupies a place of distinction in medieval Oriya poetry. The poet is admired as a pioneer of Riti School of poetry in Oriya literature.

G.M.

DAS, DINESH (Bengali; b. 1913, d. 1985) was an eminent Bengali poet. Connected with a number of periodicals as their literary editor, he was for a time associated with banking service, then switched over to the teaching profession wherefrom he retired. He shot into prominence with his book of poem Kaste (The Sickle, 1938) which held out that the sickle was the moon of the present age and thus established himself as a poet of the toiling masses. He was awarded a national prize for this work in 1980. His poetry, couched in very balanced phrases and neat metres, is a blend of Gandhian values and democratic sentiments.

FURTHER WORKS: Bhuk Michhil (The Procession of the starving people, 1944), Ahalya (1954).

N.C.

DAS, DINESHRANJAN (Bengali; b. 1888,d 1941) has his chief claim to fame in the history of Bengali literature for his editorship of Kallol, the avant-garde literary monthly of the twenties. He left college during the Swadeshi Movement and was for some time a student of the Art school. Apart from his two collections of stories, Matir Nesha (Lure of the Soil) and Bhuin Champa, he regularly contributed verses, stories and sketches to Kallol and elsewhere. Two of his novels Dipak and Rater Basa (Rest for the Night) were published serially in Kallol. As the founder of the Kallol publishing House he published about two dozen books by different authors. He was a cartoonist of no mean order and was a pioneer in this field. In the last decade of his life he came to be deeply involved in the world of cinema as actor and director.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jibendra Sinha Ray, Kalloler Kal (1973).

As.S.

DAS, GOPABANDHU (Oriya, b. 1877, d. 1928) was a well known poet. Born in a middle-class Brahmin family, he received his B.A. degree from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, and a law degree from Calcutta University. He practised law before he joined the Gandhian movement and worked for the poor in rural Orissa. He has been described as the founder of the Satyabadi Age in Oriya literature, so called after the Vana Vidyalaya he had set up at Satyabadi, near Puri in 1915. He and his compatriots, Godavarisa Misra and Nilakantha Das wrote a kind of poetry that was simple and lyrical and dealt mostly with the history, legends and folklore of Orissa. Their immediate aim was to create a literature that would arouse the people's nationalist sentiment.

Gopabandhu's poetic career began with Abakasa Chinta (Thoughts of leisure-hours, 1899). It is a collection of lyrics he wrote during his school and college days. A second edition was published probably around 1912. The 1912 edition contains thirtynine poems. Between 1899 and 1923 he did not write much poetry except a few occasional pieces. The real flowering of his poetic power took place around 1923 when he was a political prisoner in the Hazaribagh jail where he wrote four more books. The poems in Abakasa Chinta easily fall into three distinct groups–the first containing the poet's homage to historical celebrities, the second dealing with nature, and the third describing his visits to places of historical importance. The chief inspiration of these poems is lyrical and didactic. The poet's nationalist sentiment derives its power from an innate idealism. The motive behind his invocation of people and places of historical importance is to set before his readers examples of ideal humanity and of the glorious achievements of the Oriyas in the past. Needless to say, these poems are repetitive both in form and content.

However, he achieves more satisfying effects in his nature poetry. In the poem, 'Kathayodi Tire Chandraloka Nishitha,' the poet is deeply impressed with the quietness of the river Kathayodi in a moonlit night. This experience leads to the realisation of the intimate bond between nature and the mind of man. The ode to the river Bhargabi is marked by an almost perfect fusion of form and content. The rhythm of the lines suggests the movement of the river and also the movement of the day. from dawn to dusk. River, time and thought merge into a single rhythmic flow.

Kara Kavita (Poems written in prison) is a collection of 19 lyrics written during 1922-23 and published in book form after the poet's death. It contains some of the best specimens of his nature poetry. 'Vishwara Milana Chitra' and 'Bandira Sandhya Bhabana' depict his pantheistic vision. The longest poem in the collection 'Bandira Swadesha Chinta' is an ode to the south wind. It contains very vivid and sensuous descriptions of the natural scenery of all the regions of Orissa. The poet imagines the south wind to have blown already across the length and breadth of his native state, creating thereby an opportunity for himself to affect an imaginative escape from prison and to describe the scenery of the countryside. His language in this poem is brief, particularised, sensuous and vivid. In 'Bandira Atmakatha' (Soliloquy of a prisoner) he gives vent to his sorrow at the plight of the Oriyas, his nationalist sentiments and his idealism.

The other two books he wrote in prison are Gomahatmya (The glory of the cow) and Dharmapada. The material for the former is drawn from the Sanskrit Mahabharata and the Oriya Bhagavata of Jagannatha Das. The poem written in the nabakshari chhanda (two rhymed lines of nine letters each) of the Oriya Bhagavata is a devout Hindu's sustained plea against cow-slaughter. Dharmapada depicts the story of a legendary boy-architect of Orissa who sacrificed his life for the sake of preserving the good name of the twelve hundred Oriya architects engaged in building the Sun temple at Konarka. The poem begins with the twelve-year old Dharmapada's setting out in search of his father who happens to be one of those architects, and ends with his suicide after he accomplishes the formidable task of fixing the topmost part of the temple. The narrative does not exploit the full epic possibilities of the legend. Its popularity is due to its simple diction and the spontaneous and flowing rhythm of its verse. Nachiketa Upakhyana (The story of Nachiketa, 1930) is an Oriya translation of the Kathopanishad. On the whole, Gopabandhu's poetry was a poetry with a purpose which it served well.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brindavanachandra Acharya, Satyabadi Yuga (Cuttack, 1966); Chandrasekhara Misra, Satyabadire Shatabarsha (Cuttack, 1953); Nityananda Mahapatra, Kavi Gopabandhu (Cuttack, 1966).

Sau.M.

DAS, GOPALBALLAV (Oriya; b. 1860, d. 1914) was the younger brother of Utkal Gaurab Madhusudan Das, one of the patriots and founders of the modern State of Orissa. His father was Raghunath Das and mother, Parvati Devi. Having passed M.A. examination from Calcutta University, he was appointed a Deputy Magistrate by the Government, the most covetable job for any Indian in those days under the English ruler. When the minor king of Keonjhar was installed on the throne, Gopalballav Das worked as superintedent of that State. It was during his stay at Keonjhar that he came in contact with the tribal communities and wrote his only and now available novel Bhim Bhuniya. If not for anything else, Gopalballav Das is well remembered for this novel alone.

By temperament he was a traditionalist. He wrote poetical works like Usha, Taraksamhar and Konark and he is credited with the composition of several lyrics.

The Oriya novel as a literary phenomenon was a thing of the closing years of the nineteenth century and of the beginning of the twentieth. The novel in the proper sense was introduced by Fakirmohan Senapati towards the close of the nineteenth century and Gopalballav Das was one among those who practised the art of writing novels and in the process he wrote the novel Bhima Bhuniya (written in 1896 and first published in Sept. 1908 from Edward Press, Cuttack) which has a unique theme in that it is based on the life and society of the Bhuniyas of Keonjhar. Bhuniyas are the primitive tribe living in the region surrounded by dense forests and mountains. Through the ages these primitive people are known for their simple and unsophisticated way of life, their adherence to tradition and heritage, their loyalty and commitment to the village community system, their marriage system, the sense of chastity of their woman, their love for adventure and romance. Such a theme whether real or imaginary, served only as a large canvas on which this novelist could depict the social and romance-oriented life of two Bhuniya youths. In a Bhuniya village, Sadhu Sardar had two sons Banasura and Bhima and in the same locality there was Til Sardar whose only darling daughter Chinamali was attracted towards both Banasura and Bhima. Ultimately Chinamali was given in marriage to the elder brother Banasura according to the decision of both the parents. The development in the plot strikes a note of conflict in which agony-driven Bhima leaves his village and despite his father's desire joins the court of Raja Jagadeva in the company of Sri Chandrasekhar Pattanaik, the Palace manager. There developed at this time anarchy and oppression in the principality, and in the royal conflict Bhima fell from the favour of the Raja and fled to the Marda Raja's principality and was able to draw the attention of the Marda Raja. Chandrasekhar Pattanaik also joined him there. A fierce battle took place between Raja Jagadeva and Raja Harichandan, the Marda Raj. In the fight Raja Jagadeva was miserably defeated at the hands of Bhima who demonstrated extraordinary valour in the fight.

Bhima for his courage is rewarded with the title 'Ranjit' and each victorious soldier was to kill five prisoners of war. To Bhima's lot also there were five priosoners including his father and brother. In such a situation, Bhima was confronted with a mental conflict. But Bhima later on managed to collect two heads and this design escaped the notice of the Raja, who subsequently fell ill and all efforts to cure him were of no avail. At this critical juncture, Bhima managed to get the Raja treated by his father and the Raja was cured. The Raja now praised the old man not knowing that he was the father of Bhima. He honoured the old man with some valuable gifts and when the royal servant proceeded to present the royal honour to the old man, the king at once recognised the identity of Bhima and his father. Having come to know of this secret design, the Raja flew into a rage and ordered that the life of the old man be spared as he had cured the Raja but one of the two sons of the old man that is, Banasura and Bhima would be killed and the choice was to be indicated by the father. The old father was caught in a severe mental conflict as to which son he would sacrifice. Unable to indicate his choice he only wept and soon fell unconscious. At this Bhima himself offered his head and bravely proceeded towards the executioner. In this tense situation of pathos and agony the daughter of the Raja who was previously enamoured of Bhima appeared on the scene and implored her father to spare the life of Bhima and her wish was granted. Bhima was thus saved. The next development in the theme is marked by mutual attraction of romance and love between the daughter of the Raja and Bhima, which never saw fulfilment. Both the princess and Bhima chose to remain in isolation and pursue a life of sublimation of passion and love. Bhima lived in Brindaban. Years after they met each other but their love was marked by pathos and agony. The princess has emerged as a remarkably gracious, virtuous, noble soul inspired by ideals of chastity, womanhood and sacrifice, projecting a tragic vision of love. The theme in the novel is a kind of idealistic romanticised love. The prose is overladden with Sanskrit words, difficult phrases and proverbs. The style is ornamental, pedantic and tense. The author is more interested in holding up the social customs, belief and brave qualities of the Bhuniya tribe.

G.M.

DAS, GOVINDACHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1855, d. 1918) born, in Joydevpur village in Bhowal Pargana of the Dhaka district in East Bengal, now in Bangladesh, was widely known as a lyricist and a poet by nature (Swabhav Kavi) during the later part of the 19th century and the first quarter of the 20th. His father's name was Ramnath Das. A meritorious student, he was educated on a primary scholarship at his village school and later at the local Normal School in the secondary stage and then at Dakha Medical School for some time. But his educational career came to an abrupt end because of extreme penury, though Kalinarayan, the Raja of Bhowal bore his educational expenses for a brief period. He, however, was forced to flee Bhowal when he protested against the Raja's oppression of his subjects and the injustice and misdeeds perpetrated by Kaliprasanna Ghosh, himself an eminent essayist and the manager of the State. On reaching Calcutta Govindachandra was given shelter by Deviprasanna Roychowdhury, the editor of Nabya Bharat, a journal of repute. It was at this time that he wrote his satirical poem Mager Mulluk (1893) and launched a crusade against his former oppressors. He found employment in a number of places but could stick to none due to his restless and indecisive mind. As a result, he spent the rest of his life in abject poverty and misery. His pauperism was reflected vividly in his poems. While in Calcutta he was the publisher of a journal, named Bibla and then shifted to Serpur as the manager of another journal Charuvarta. At the fag end of his life he had nothing to fall back upon except an allowance donated by Jagatkishore Acharya Choudhury, the zamindar of Muktagachha in Mymensing, now in Bangladesh. At his deathbed expenses of his treatment were borne by Deshbandhu Chitta Ranjan Das.

Govindachandra had no opportunity of having higher education in English or Sanskrit and that is perhaps why his poems were bereft of sophistication, albeit they were characterised by his sincerity and sensitivities. The leit motif of his poems was derived from contemporary Bengali romantic lyrics and the intense love for his wife. The dominant theme of his poems was not the platonic romanticism, but sensual love. A classic example of this mood is found in the poet's famous line 'Ami tare bhalobasi asthi majja saha' (I love her with her flesh and bones) (My love/'Kasturi'). Another strain of his poems was his life, battered by pauperism. His lifelong privation impelled him to ask his countrymen: 'O bhai Bangabasi, ami morle tomra amar chitay dibe math' (O the people of Bengal, my Brethren, would you erect a monument in my memory on my funeral pyre after my death.) In these poems the poet's outbursts were direct, somewhat rude and uncontrolled, but in the portrayal of nature's bounties his expression was tender, lyrical and ecstatic. Though primarily a lyricist many of his poems gave vent to his heart-felt love for his motherland.

The following are the major works of the poet: Prosun (1870), Prem O Phul (1887), Kumkum (1892), Mager Mulluk (1893), Kasturi (1895), Chandan (1896), Phularenu (1896), Vaijayanti (1905), and Shokochhwas (1910).

The poet also translated Shrimad Bhagabad Gita in verse. Govindachayanika is a collection of his poems.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brojendra Nath Bandyopadhyaya, Govinda Chandra Das Sahitya, Sadhak Charitmala-74, Calcutta, 1949; Hemchandra Chakraborty, Swabhav-Kavi Govinda Das (1923).

K.G.

DAS, GYANDIL (Nepali; b. 1821, d. 1883) was a santa of the Josmani Nepali religious sect. The Josmanis are the devotees of the nirguna or the attributeless God and in practice were opposed to Brahmanic ritualism. The propagation of Josmani at its height which corresponded with the time of Gyandil assumed the form of a hurricane-like religious and social movement embracing in its ambit Nepal, Sikkim, Bhutan and the British-Indian regions then inhabited by the forefathers of the present-day Indian Nepalis. Gyandil who repeatedly toured this sub-Himalayan zone had drawn a very large following consisting, for the main part, of non-brahmin or, for that matter, non-aryan Nepalis.

Udaya-lahari which Gyandil completed writing in 1877 while he was at his Darjeeling (Rungbul) dham (monastery) is his principal work in verse containing moral discourse and instructions. Composed in Sawai folk metre the two hundred and forty two stanzas of this work smoothly lend themselves to recitation.

Gyandil's mission in Sikkim and India (Munglan in old Nepali) brought him into direct confrontation with the white Christian preachers. He carried on a momentous debate with them running for several days and came on the top in the war of words. He set up dhams (monasteries) at Rungbul in Darjeeling (West Bengal) and Geling in Sikkim where he died. Devout Josmanis, still sizeable in strength, make their way to these dhams.

Research findings so far show that Gyandil was the first Nepali poet to make use in his religious writings which were also literary, of the ghyawre and the selo folk tunes in the singing of which the Nepali Gurungs and Tamangs are proficient. Aptly enough Jhyawre bhagan and the Selo bhagan compositions are taken as guiding lights by his Gurung and Tamang disciples and followers.

He has written fifty-seven bhajans (devotional songs) in Sadhukkadi language in the tradition of medieval Indian santas, and they were once widely spread and sung.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Janaklal Sharma, Josmani Santa–Parampara Ra Sahitya, 1963., Kamal Dikshit, Buigal, 1961., Kesavprasad Upadhyay, Prathamik-Kalin Kavi Ra Kavya-pravritti 1975.

Ke.G.

DAS, JAGANNATHPRASAD (Oriya; b. 1936) is a noted poet and playwright. An M.A. in Political Science from the University of Allahabad, he is a senior officer of the Indian Administrative Service. His first collection of poems Prathama Purusha (First Person, 1971) is quite popular and has been translated into Hindi and English. The poems are spoken by an 'I' who could be both the poet himself, a modern man, or the primal man. This ambiguity in the title gives a special significance to the book. For, the sense of loneliness and fear which the poems convey belongs to both the poet and his primal ancestor. The book depicts a world in which strains, crossroads, labyrinths, circles, and mirrors are the staple images. It is 'a strange land', an 'enormous void'. And the people who inhabit it—emperor, soldier, magician, harlot—act out their roles in a spiritless, mechanical manner. Life is but a mask play. But the 'I' is no passive onlooker, nor is he indifferent to the meaningless goings on around him.

He probes these absurdities with singular ardour and honesty in his other two collections Anya Sabu Mrityu Ebam Anyanya Kavita (Many other Deaths and other Poems, 1975) and Ye Yahara Nirjanata (One is one's own Loneliness, 1979). The former may well be read as a long meditative poem on death. The speaker in Prathama Purusha perceives that time has no identity, no meaning, and so the one problem before him is how to give it a name. Death is proposed in Anya Sabu Mrityu Ebam Anyanya Kavita as a possible means, a defining context. Every experience of love is a kind of death and the 'I' sustains all these deaths.

In both his poetry and plays Das explores man's existential situation. The 'I' in his poetry is not very different from the Dipamkara of his first play Suryasta Purbaru (Before the Sunset, 1972). His latest play Udbhata Nataka (Absurd play, 1980), however, suffers from a kind of obscurity from which his poetry is entirely free.

His other works are: Play: Saba Shesha Loka (The Last Man, 1976); Poetry in English: First Person, (1976), Love is a Season (1978), Timescapes, (1980).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dasarathi Das, Adhunika Kavya Jijnasa: Chitra-kalpa (1974); Niranjana Beuria, Romantic Kavi Jagannathprasad Das in Istahara, October, 1978.

Sau.M.

DAS, JIBANANANDA (Bengali; b. 1899, d. 1954) is an important Bengali poet. Son of Satyananda Das, a scholarly school teacher, and Kusumkumari–a poet, Jibanananda came from a devout Brahmo family. He lived an exclusive and intense life of imagination in the rural surroundings of Barisal in the eastern part of the then undivided Bengal. However, it was Calcutta, the city where he worked, lived, wrote and died, which shaped his destiny both as a poet and as a man. Though he always showed a certain lack of concern for the immediacy of life around him, he was still very much a part of that life and observed it keenly, but the proof of that observation can be found only in his very distinctive poetry. Though he did occasionally write, often out of sheer desire to earn a little more money, a few short stories, essays and even novels which, when first published after his death, have had a certain market without being truly popular, it is poetry and poetry alone which, ruthlessly as well as ecstatically, pursued him throughout his life. In that sense his is rather a special case in contemporary Bengali literature and it is often said with some justification that he was not only a poet, but was nothing but a poet. He studied English for his M.A. degree from Calcutta University and, later, taught it in several colleges including the then Brahmo-dominated and puritanical City College of Calcutta, from where he is said to have been thrown out because of a reference, in one of his poems, to the majestic beauty of the female bosom. For a time he also worked in the editorial department of the daily Swaraj which used to be published from Calcutta.

For a considerable time, almost till his death and occasionally even after, his poetry remained a subject of scorn and ridicule not only in such conventionalist circles as the then controversial weekly Sanibarer Chithi in which he was frequently attacked by the editor Sajanikanta Das, but also for quite a few other critics with claims to modernity. It was perhaps not entirely unnatural for a man of his nature to have reached his end by being run over by a moving tramcar. The accident occurred on 16th October, 1954 when he was walking, absentmindedly, on a busy street in south Calcutta and six days later he died in a hospital. Next year the very first Sahitya Akademi award in Bengali was conferred on him posthumously for the collection of his poems entitled Jibananda Daser Srestha Kavita.

Both in form as well as content the originality of his poetry is so immediately and strikingly discernible that it marks him out as a unique personality in contemporary Bengali literature. The chief characteristics of that poetry are briefly summarised here. Belonging to the school of "pure poetry he was essentially a poet of loneliness and found glory in being solitary. His use of supremely original word-images has secured for him an unparalleled place in Bengali literature. All through his life he was pursued by a sense of history which, irrespective of time and place, related him to the larger world. This, however, did not prevent his poetry from being intensely Bengali, in spirit as well as content. His work is also marked by an acute awareness of poetry's ordeal in a growingly unsympathetic world. He is a poet of his time and some fundamental issues of existence characteristic of a man in the 20th century find their echoes in his writing. Among the post-Tagore poets in Bengali he was the first to truly reflect, in his own distinctive style, on the troubled image of man and general lack of faith accompanying it, which marked his era. A sense of void which haunts the contemporary mind in search of light and hope, and the pain that is generated as a result of the realization of that void add to his poetry a touch of poignancy and complexity which was entirely unknown in the Bengali literature preceding him. The use of expressions peculiar to prose has also been one of his important contributions which have significantly enlarged the scope of the language of poetry in Bengali. There is an enraptured quality surrounding the body of his poetry which, for the younger generation of Bengali poets, has made him an illustrious pioneer and a master.

Jibanananda Das is therefore surely the most out standing and authentic poet of the post-Tagore era of Bengali literature. When most of the poets of this period found it difficult, if not impossible, to overcome the impact of Rabindranath, in style and ideas, Jibanananda, it seems, could easily evolve a poetic idiom which was at once traditional and strikingly new. And by the time he reached the peak of his poetic achievement this new poetic form and idiom become so pervasive and powerful that most of the succeeding poets could not help coming under their spell. The new poetry of Bengal carried his signature all over for decades after his untimely death.

He brought into his work a sense of time and space, of past and present that turned his poetry into an alchemic amalgum of the terrestrial and the cosmic, the local and the undefined, the temporary and the perennial. There is not much point in categorizing his poetry as romantic or otherwise—it is poetry per se. It may appear that in all his typical work there is a sense of simultaneity that gives it a distinct character. Here there is no transcendence from the mundane to the ethereal or from the concerte to the abstract: both are simultaneously present. The different levels of consciousness are constantly merged and through the use of unusual imagery and metaphors his poetry finally achieves a kind of compactness and density of texture that make it a marvel of poetic creation. A typical example of this great achievement is his most-translated single poem: 'Banalata Sen'. This is a poem of love and home-coming: a tired traveller returns to his old love after all the travails of life. But he is also a traveller who has stalked this earth for thousands of years, through the sea of Ceylone and Malaya, in the hazy world of Bimbasar and Ashoka, also in the darker world of Vidarbha. In his life surrounded by the foamy sea he found his moments of peace with the Banalata Sen of Natore. Her hair is the darkness of Bidisha, her face the sculptured beauty of Shravasti. Like a seaman with his sails torn, he saw her as a land of green grass through the cinnamon forest of the island and she raised her bird-nest eyes and asked: 'where had you been so long?' Then comes evening like the sound of dew drops and the kite wipes off the smell of the sun from its wings-the birds return home-the river of life's worries flows away; only darkness remains and Banalata Sen for sitting face to face. The time present and time past, the hoary world of history and the geographical starkness of a small town are all woven into an intense and multi-dimensional experience of life.

Here are the individual collections of his poetry most of which were brought out during his life time: Jhara Palak (1927), Dhusar Pandulipi (1936), Mahaprthivi (1944), Satti Tarar Timir (1948), Banalata Sen (Kavita Bhavan edition 1942, Signet Press edition 1952), Jibanananda Daser Srestha Kavita (1954), Rupasi Bangla (1957) and Bela Abela Kalbela (1961). There is also a book of essays containing his views on poetry and entitled Kavitar Katha which came out in 1955, a year after his death. The book clearly shows the intellectual bent of his mind and how conscious and enlightened an artist he was.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Buddhadeva Bose, Kaler Putul, Calcutta 1946; Chidanananda Das Gupta, Jibanananda Das, New Delhi 1972; Dipti Tripathi, Adhunik Bangla Kavya Parichay, Calcutta 1958.

Lo.B.

DAS, JNANENDRAMOHAN (Bengali; b. 1872, d. 1939) was a lexicographer and scholar. Born in Bengal, Jnanendramohan came to Allahabad during his early youth and was employed as an office assistant at the office of the Inspector General of Police, Allahabad. In course of his official duties, he had to visit many towns and villages of the then United Provinces of Agra and Oudh. During these visits, he collected a lot of material on the public activities of the Bengalis who had settled in U.P. from the early days of the British rule. These articles were serially published in Prabasi, a monthly journal published from Allahabad in those days edited by Ramananda Chatterjee. Due to ill health Jnanendramohan retired from government service in 1910 and came back to his native place near Calcutta. Later, Jnanendramohan compiled an up-to-date Bengali Dictionary, Bangla Bhashar Abhidhana (2nd rev. edn., 1937-38) containing more than one lakh of words. During the late twenties Jnanendramohan came back to Allahabad and stayed there for some time. During this period he wrote a good number of instructive and thought-provoking books under the auspices of the Indian Press, Allahabad.

FURTHER WORKS: Banger Bahire Bangali (Bengalees outside Bengal 1915); Ibriya Dharma (History of Hebrew Religion, Calcutta, 1919); Sristitattva Puran O Vijnana (A comparison of mythological and scientific theories of creation,1919); Pranider Antarer Katha (Animal stories, 1921).

G.S.

DAS, JOGESH (Assamese, b. 1927) is an eminent fiction writer in Assamese. He had his M.A. in Assamese from Gauhati University in 1953 and worked as a journalist and is now teaching Assamese literature in a college. He is equally known as one of the major short-story writers and novelists in Assam. He emerged as a fiction writer in the early fifties and established himself as such. Kalpatuar Mrityu (The Death of Kalpatua, 1953) is his first novel. His second novel Dawar Aru Nai (No more cloud is there, 1955) established him as one of the powerful novelists. He has unquestionable love and sympathy for mankind in general and for the lower and lower middle class people in particular. His Dawar aru Nai is set against the background of the World War II and its effects on the life of the tea garden people and the people of lower middle class in upper Assam. This novel has been translated into all other major Indian languages by the N.B.T. Jogesh Das has rare qualities of telling a story in the most balanced way and of handling the language with mastery. Some of his other novels are Jonakir Jui (Flame of the Fire-fly, 1959), Nirupai-Nirupai (Helpless, O helpless 1963), Emuthi Dhuli (A Handful of Dust, 1965), Hazar Phul (Thousands of Flowers, 1967), Nedekiha Juir Dhonwa (Smoke of an invisible Fire, 1972), Obidha (Illegitimate, 1972), Naresh Malati Aru (Naresh, Malati and .., 1977). He has published 5 short story collections Papiya Tera (Falling Star, 1956), Andharar Are Are (Under the Shadow of Darkness, 1958), Triveni (Confluence of three, 1961), Madarar Bedana (Grief of the Madar tree, 1963), Hazar Lokar Bhir (A Crowd of thousands, 1965). His Folklore of Assam, published originally in English and then in other Indian languages, is a simple and comprehensive book on Assamese folklore. Jogesh Das is connected with many cultural organisations of the state, specially with Asam Sahitya Sabha.

N.S.

DAS, KAMAL (Bengali; b. 1921), was educated in Calcutta and married to Debesh Das, also a writer and a member of Indian Civil Service. She has travelled widely. She was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Prize in Bengali in 1982 for her very first novel Amritasya Putree. An endowment named as Amritasya Putree Endowment was created by Ramakrishna Mission Institute of Culture by her gift of the entire royalties received from the book for research on the position of Indian women by distinguished scholars, and annual lectures on them. She knows Bengali, English, Hindi and Assamese.

FURTHER WORKS: Fiction:– Twamasi Momo (1983), Amritam Bibhati (1984), Anoranian (1984); Travelogue:–Jana Ajana (1977), Uttare Meru Dakshine Ban (1980), Cake Chocolatc Aar Rupkatha (1981).

B.M.

DAS, KAMALA (English b. 1934), who hails from Kerala, began her literary career, like her mother, as a short story writer in Malayalam. She, however, achieved wider recognition as an Indo-English poet with Summer in Calcutta (1965). This was followed by The Descendants (1967) and The Old Playhouse and Other Poems (1973). Her poetry reflects the spirit of the modern Indian woman torn betweeen frustrated love and a desire for emotional fulfilment. This is the feminine sensibility at work with a masculinity of expression that tries to project the poet's experience in all its nakedness and as a thing-in-itself. The tensions of the body dominate her poetry followed by a quest for the beautiful and the serene which is beyond her reach. Love and marriage, thus, are her themes fed by the roots of her Nayar heritage, her great-grandmother, her house in Kerala. 'Summer in Calcutta', 'In Love', 'Composition', 'The Suicide', 'An Intensity', are some of her well-known poems projecting an intensity of feeling combined with unorthodoxy and protest. Her other writings include an autobiography, My Story (1974), and two novels, Manas (1975) and Alphabet of Lust (1976). These are feeble footnotes to her poems, loosely constructed. The same carelessness in language, rhythm and structural finesse may be noted in her poetry, which is otherwise deeply human, intense and moving. She earned the Sahitya Akademi Award for her work in 1985.

V.A.S.

DAS, KAMALAKANTA (Oriya; b. 1906, d. 1981) passed the Matriculation Examination from the Pyarimohan Academy, Cuttack in 1927. After seeking employment at many places he at last got a job in the Co-operative Department. In 1962 he retired from Government service and spent his life of retirement at Cuttack till death.

Kamalakanta was a prolific writer. He tried his hand in writing novels, short stories, poems and essays. But he won popularity and appreciation chiefly as a novelist. His first novel Bou (Mother), which he wrote at the age of eighteen, is considered to be his best. Soon after its publication in 1930, he was known as a novelist of high order. His life was a life of dedication to literature. He continued his creative activity till rendered invalid and speechless by disease.

His works comprise twenty-four novels, six collections of short stories, one collection of poems and a few prose essays. He was a painter and artist too. For his life long contribution to Oriya literature, he was honoured by the Orissa Sahitya Akademi in 1972 and by Kalavinod in 1976.

In his fiction he has portrayed the characters both from urban and rural surroundings with sympathy and compassion. But his excellence lies in the realistic representation of village life both belonging to pre-independent period. Many of his characters have revolted against the existing social order and have tried to bring about reform in the society. Through them he has boldly and successfully shown the problem of untouchability, intoxication, communalism, false sense of aristocaracy, redtapeism and nepotism prevalent in the society. His language is colloquail and lucid.

FURTHER WORKS: Novel: Ashrita-1935 Saradi Nani, 1946-Manara dau–1946. Chabis number Cabin-1946, Manisara Dabi 1946, Nartaki, 1948, Sadar Mafsal-1952, Manachor-1952, Charitrahina 1953, Jiban Sauda-1954, Dipasikha, 1965 Ichha Barana-1965, Chidia khana 1966. Short Story: Dharmapatha-1950-Ghasipadara Maya-1958-Dasanka Chatani-1961, Naba Parnika-1962 Bhuta Galpa-1967 Bibidha-1979-Poem: Sabitri Uansa-1939 Biography-Kabi Gangadhara.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hamanta Das, Aupanyasika Kamalakanta P. Patnaik and B. Rout, Oriya Upanyasa Sahityara Parichaya-1969.

J.B.M.

DAS, KARTIKA (Oriya; b. 1600, d. 1650). No information is available as to his family or residence. Rukmini Bibaha (literally, Rukmini's marriage, published by Prachi, 1930), a kavya in ten cantos and Nabanuraga (literally, the advent of love, yet unpublished) are the two works ascribed to his authorship. The theme of the former is the marriage of Srikrishna with Princess Rukmini. The story occurs in the Bhagavata, the Harivamsa and other Vaisnavite works. The style is mostly Puranic but in some passages, human form and beautiful nature are decribed in a simple and lucid diction. The salient point about this work is the poet's choice of a theme of Krishna's love with Svakiya Nayika (married wife) while the general trend, then, among authors was the popular topic of Parakiya Premabhakti (devotional love with other's wives). Secondly, Kartika Das has desisted from describing the details of conjugal union of the newly married couple obviously with an attitude to depict the cannonic love life of Srikrishna, king of Dwaraka, which, too, had its own importance as a doctrine in Vaishnava Philosophy.

G.C.U.

DAS, KISORICHARANA (Oriya, b 1924) is an outstanding representative of the generation of short story writers who came to dominate the Oriya literary scene after the sixties. He has distinguished himself by concentrating on a particular area of experience, the middle and the upper middle classes and also by bringing an introspective reflective element into the Oriya short story form. The predominant theme of his stories is a search for meaning in life by the members of a comfortable middle class. His characters seek to go beyond the commonplaceness of everyday life based on habit, compromise and trivialities. This search often involves a rejection of the secure and familiar world of middle class living and its values. Most of the characters withdraw into their familiar worlds after a brief contact with other worlds of ecstasy or intensity or of any significant experience.

The stories of Das are structured as a series of situations which give rise to reflections on the part of the characters. They are resolved at the end usually in a moment of heightened realization or a moment of revelation. Events are secondary as the purpose of the author is to take the reader deep into the mental life of the character. The narrative voice provides the social framework in which the characters, their thoughts, feelings and emotions are rooted. Most of the stories are provided with urban settings. But this choice of urban locales does not exclude a deep nostalgia for earlier and simpler modes of rural living and its values. The introspective element also gives his stories a poetic quality. Das attempts to shock his character out of the complacence of a secured middle class life and make them confront the shallowness and emptiness of their experiences. This frustration propels them to achieve significant human relationships or even at times spiritual communion. All the collections of Das harp upon their sufferings, strivings, failures and at times of their fulfilments. From Bhanga Khelana to his latest collection Gamana the same theme is prominent; but the narrative technique seems to rely more on symbols and images and on the introspective or reflective aspect. In his earlier stories like 'Vanity' and 'Icecream' the superficiality of sympathetic gestures on the part of the middle class is exposed through actual events. In 'Icecream' a bureaucrat, intending to establish a rapport, invites a clerk, his immediate neighbour to a garden party. But when the child of the clerk enters the party with icecream splashed on his face, the members of the party get completely disgusted and upset. The hypocrisy that is at the heart of the middle-class attitude becomes clear. This is often focused by Das through such ironic devices. In Manihara experiences seem to have lost their validity in the context of a mechanical middle class life.

In Gamana the narration becomes more analytical. All the characters here are marked by a certain helplessness, even in spite of their material and social status. This helplessness may result from unfulfilled sexual instincts or from a failure to belong completely as in 'Dasara ru Diwali Yaem' (From Dusserha till Diwali) or from an unrealized or even betrayed spirtitual craving as in 'Tu Kana Ramakrishna?' (Are you Ramakrishna?). Many protagonists in this collection are intellectuals who have failed to realize life in emotional and spiritual terms.

FURTHER WORKS: Ghara Bahuda (The Home Coming)., Laksha Bihanga (Million Birds)., Thakura Ghara (The Prayer Room).

J.K.B.

DAS, KUNJABEHARI (Oriya; b. 1914) is a poet and essayist who graduated from Ravenshaw College and obtained his M.A. Degree both in Oriya and in Sanskrit from Calcutta University. He worked as Lecturer and Superintendent of Sanskrit studies in Orissa, then joined as Reader in Oriya at Viswabharati, Shantiniketan. Again he came back to Orissa and became Professor of Oriya in Ravenshaw College. Kaidi (The Prisoner, 1938) his first publication deals with the sacrifice of freedom fighters. Prabhati (The morning Songs, 1943) is a collection of sonnets in which he follows the metaphysical trend of Madhusudana Rao. Pashana Charane Rakta (Blood under the Feet of Stone, 1945) is a long dramatic poem, which is based on a historical myth of transformation of cruel Ashoka to a benevolent emperor. Charanika (Lady Bard, 1948), a poetic drama, centres around the legend of the famous temple at Konarka. Birashri (Heroic Beauty, 1948) contains ballads on historical and legendary themes. The other collections like Kankalara Luha (Tears of a Skeleton, 1949), Se Eka Lomasha Nila Hata (That's a hairy blue Hand, 1954), Lahu O Lohit (Blood and Red, 1955), Mati O Lathi (Soil and the Stick) are full of socialistic enthusiasms. In these poems he is moved to tears by the misery of the down-trodden common men. His love for nature is reflected in the collections of poems like Duduma (1945), Bagra (1948) and Narmada. The first two are water falls and the last one is a river in the Deccan. The poet is still producing volumes of poems. His poems are collected in Kunjabehari Sanchayan, consisting of three parts. Anu (Atom, 1964) is a collection of poems, very short in length, and that way a new experiment in Oriya poetry. His poems for children are collected in Tak Dama Dam (1951), Kunimuni (1959), Itikili Mitikili and Khelasathi (Playmates). Apart from writing poems, he has also written critical essays and an autobiography. His autobiography, Mo Kahani (My Story, 1978) received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979. Kunjabehari has also made a mark in the field of collection of folk lore. He got his Ph.D. degree from Viswabharati for his research on folk lore. He has also written a collection of short stories called Hasa Kandar Gapa (Stories of Laughter and Tears).

S.P.

DAS, LALA (Maithili; b. 1856, d. 1921) got primary education in his village from his father and also learnt Tirhuta and Devanagari. He was taught Urdu and Persian by a Maulvi. His leaning towards Sanskrit language and literature is related to an important incident of his life. Lala Das was a great devotee of Lord Shiva. He used to go to Chandeshwarsthan at village Harari, to worship Shiva. One night in dream he got inspiration for studying Sanskrit and composing a Ramayana. He came to Darbhanga where his father Bachkan Das was an employee in Raj Darbhanga. He studied Sanskrit here and though he did not obtain any degree in Sanskrit, he was successful in 'Dhauta Pariksha', which meant he was recognised as a scholar of Sanskrit by a panel of eminent scholars. Besides Sanskrit and Maithili, Lala knew English, Hindi, Urdu and Persian.

He was known as Munshi Lala Das till then. He began his career as bench clerk (Peshkar) of Rameshwar Singh who was in those days undergoing training as a Deputy Collector in Bhagalpur. Later on when Rameshwar Singh became the Maharaja of Darbhanga, Lala Das was appointed the Librarian of the Raj Library. His career as a writer began from this period.

Finally, Lala Das was appointed the Palace Superintendent of the Darbhanga state. There he came in contact with many great scholars of Sanskrit, and his devotional feelings were expressed spontaneously. Keeping the Valmiki-Ramayana as his ideal he wrote Rameshwara Charita Mithila Ramayana (1914) in Maithili which is his most popular work. By prefixing the name Rameshwara to his version of Ramayana Lala has meant both Rama the husband of Lakhmi, the incarnation of Shakti, as well as his patron Maharaja Rameshwar Singh. Along with his patron he got an opportunity to visit all the places of religious importance in India. In course of these visits he observed nature's beauty in abundance which inspired his poetic talent.

He studied the Pauranic literature and wrote many books. Besides Ramayana his other works are: Sanga Saptashati Durga, Chandi-Charita, Stridharma Shiksha, Satyanarayana Katha, Tantrokta Mithila Mahatmya and Haritalika Vrata Katha (all in prose); Janaki Ramayana, Ganesh Khand (1909) and Maheshwara-Vinod (1911)-all Khanda Kavyas; Virudavali and Vaidhavya Bhanjani (Poems) and Savitri-Satyavana Natak (drama). Two of his lyrics 'Janaki-Vandana' and 'Varsha-Git' were published in Mithila Mihir in 1909. The translation of the Gita in Maithili has not been published as yet. He wrote some poems in Persian too. As a recognition of his literary merit he was given the title of Mahakavi.

The manuscripts of his unpublished works are in the possession of his grandson Raghunarayan Das.

N.C.M.

DAS, LOCHAN (Bengali; b. 1523, d. 1589) Lochananda Das, better known as Lochan Das was a favourite of Nityananda Mahaprabhu (1477-1523) and a disciple of Narahari Sarkar Thakur of Srikhanda village-a close associate of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu. Lochan wrote a biography of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu. named Chaitanya Mangal in Bengali in four parts containing about 11,000 lines. Chaitanya Mangal could be set to tune in different specified Ragas and Raginis and performed before the public. Although the work reveals Lochan's familiarity with the scriptures and classics of Sanskrit literature, his language and style is found to be simple and lucid. As such this became a very popular work and continues to retain its place of honour. Lochan Das also wrote a large number of lyrics (Padas) based on Chaitanya Mahaprabhu and Vrindavana lila of Lord Krishna. Some critics are of the opinion that some of these padas ascribed to him are from the pen of a different poet named Lochanananda. Lochan Das belonged to that school of Vaishnavism which accepted Chaitanya Mahaprabhu to be the incarnation of Lord Krishna. As Lochan's 'Dhamali' padas devoid of high literary style and written in almost feminine folk tongue reveal the emotion of the gopis, these must have been from his pen. Lochan also ably rendered into Bengali a number of Sanskrit lyrics from the Jagannatha Vallabha Natakam by Ray Ramananda (a contemporary of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu). Durlavasar, a tract on Bengali Vishnava Sadhana is also stated to have been composed by Lochan Das.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.B. Majumdar, Chaitanya Chariter Upadan, Calcutta, 1959, Sukumar Sen, Bangla Sahityer Itihasa, Vol I, 4th Edn., Calcutta, 1963.

G.S.

DAS, MADHAVA (Oriya, 16th century) was Vaishnava poet, most probably born in the first half of the sixteenth century in the Brahmagiri region of.Puri district in Orissa. He is also known as Madhava Ratha. Chaitanya came to Orissa in 1599 and soon the foundation of Orissan Vaishnavism was laid. Madhava Das, who was staying at Puri came into contact with the Vaishnava saint of the time. He wrote a small book named Chaitanyavilasa, depicting the life history of Chaitanya with specific reference to his devotional aspects or lila. The book contain ten chapters.

The language of Chaitanyavilasa is very simple and pleasant; still at some places, the poet has used a few Bengali parts of speech. In addition to this Chaitanyavilasa a few bhajanas and Chaupadis have been attributed to him. None of his books has been published so far. As revealed from his legends, poet Madhava Das wrote his last work in the second phase of the sixteenth century while he was on pilgrimage immediately after the death of Chaitanya.

Ni.M.

DAS, MADHUSUDAN (Oriya, b. 1848, d. 1934), called the father of modern Orissa, was a legislator, an advocate, the most respected man of Orissa and the first minister in India to give up ministership with a monthly salary of Rs.5000/-. After his Matriculation he studied at Calcutta and after obtaining M.A., and B.L. degrees of Calcutta University he became the Headmaster of a high school in Calcutta. In the meantime he had embraced Christianity. Then he joined the Cuttack Bar and became a leading advocate and founded the Utkal Tannery and another organisation for the upliftment of filigree industry in Orissa. He inspired people with Swadeshi ideas such as revival of Charkha. etc. He was a patron of Womens Education too.

As founder of the Utkal Sammilani in 1903 and sometimes presiding over its annual sessions he delivered his stirring presidential addresses in Oriya and inspired the organisation with a dozen of patriotic songs. One such address is now entitled Jatiya Jibana (National life). Some of these Oriya speeches and songs have been printed under the title of Madhu Babunka Odia Baktrita O Gita (The Oriya speeches and songs of Madhu Babu - Nabakishor Das, 1958.

BIBLIOGRAPHY:Madhusudan (in English, Sahitya Akademi) Nityananda Satapathy (Ed.) Madhusmaranika, 1966; Surendranath Mahanty, Satabdira Surya, 1970..

K.T.

DAS, MANOJ (Oriya, b. 1934) is a prominent writer in Oriya and English. In his career as a student, he was attracted towards the leftist political philosophy. A deep humanistic note is noticed in all his works. Prominent among his short story collections are Manoj Dasanka Katha O Kahani (winner of the Sahitya Akademi award in 1972), Dhumrabha Diganta O Anyanya Kahani, Abu Purusha O Anyanya Kahani and Laxmira Abhisara. The Crocodiles Lady and Fables and Fantasies for Adults are his two short story collections in English. With a keen observation of human nature he brings out the pathos and predicaments of life. Through subtle irony and often through comic extravaganza, he communicates a vision of life where various existential compulsions weigh on man making him take, at times, very ridiculous steps. There is a strong undercurrent of sadness in almost all his stories which springs often from a nostalgic yearning for a lost world of love or innocence. This intimate loss is either of a childhood experience as in Dhumrabha Diganta or of an innocent culture as in Farewell to a Ghost. Yet there is often a beatific side of life as has been illustrated in Sesa Basantara Chithi. The little girl Rina comes forward to share the common sorrow of the loss of a mother in the intimate human understanding. Das speaks of the agony and ecastasy of life as well. He penetrates into the psyche of the individual and focuses on the perversions and miseries of life. His technique is mainly ironic and his irony is always marked by an affectionate understanding of life's various urges.

In Abu Purusha the lump of Sarma symbolises the perversion of values in a highly commercial society. In Madhubanara Mayor the vanities of the mayor pale into insignificance before the small girl who helps him cover his naked body with her torn and soiled frock. In many of his stories Das subtly focuses on the modern man's loss of innocence, on the false ego and vanity and on the artificial values which ultimately lead him to his own destruction.

Das drives home his point through well-developed plots. In his stories one finds a poetic reality lurking behind the reality of facts. Thus Lili's death in Dhumrabha Diganta becomes an abiding symbol that at once communicates to the reader a tender agonising sense of the eternal sorrow of man. He conveys the predicaments of life largely through allegorical narration. In the story Bagha, the tiger takes up multiple meanings of fear, jealousy, revenge and ambition. Das makes us accept even incredible things because these ultimately exist in their symbolic planes. Panchantantra for Adults, Semananka Samparkare Sesha Khabora, Byaghrarohan, illustrate this aspect of his art. While the fantasy of the story provides entertainment to the reader, its symbolic significance focuses on the quintessential reality of our instincts and urges.

The comic vein is a noteworthy feature of Das's technique. His characters are often put in such situations where they appear ridiculous and hence provoke laughter. Here lies the satire of the sensitive humanist who rarely offends, but only focuses on the pathetic plight of man through the criss-cross of humour and pathos. The comedy here compels us to see the tragedy of our lives in a close perspective. Even in their failings, the characters are recognizably human, deep-rooted in life's myriad compulsions. Das weaves the traditional pattern of story-telling into the symbolic exploration of the theme. Herein lies Manoj Das's uniqueness as a short-story writer.

J.K.B.

DAS, MANORANJAN (Oriya; b. 1923) is a prominent avant-garde dramatist, at present serving at the All India Radio, Cuttack. He has also served a brief tenure as the Secretary of Orissa Sangita Natak Akademi. His early dramatic career which spanned the whole of the 40's shows the traditional mould of theme and style. Prominent among these is Baxi Jagabandhu (1949), which is based on the historical theme of the Paika revolt of Orissa. It is a story of the sacrifice of Baxi, Kasturi and of the people as well as of the betrayal of Charana Patnayak and Dewan Krishnachandra. But with the beginning of the 50's, particularly with the publication of Agami (1950) Das took to experimentation in theme and style. Based on the political situation of the post-Independence India Agami moves to explore the female psychology and to focus on the frustrations in man-woman relationships. The despair resulting from this failure is presented in his later plays such as Banahansi, Aranya Phasala, Kathaghoda and Shabdalipi. Abarodha (1953), which is a more pronounced utterance of the dramatist's socialistic ideals, deals exclusively with a political theme where the idealistic chief minister finds himself helpless in an atmosphere of opportunistic politics. Sagara Manthana (1964), where Das adopts the theme of J.B. Priestley's An Inspector Calls exposes the hypocrisy of the high-ups of the society and their guilt-ridden conscience. With Sagara Manthana, Das begins to focus on the unconscious, on the horror and agony of the within through various stage techniques and symbols. In Banahansi the past haunts the present; there is failure in love, in family life. There only remains the intense agony of a futile search for happiness. The logical flow of time is destroyed and the plot moves in a bizarre relationship of past, present and future which corresponds to the workings in the minds of the characters. The same failure is noticed in Aranya Phasala, where two women and three men meet in a forest bungalow as their past relationships came to weigh heavily on their present. In their quest for love the characters meet with dismal failures. Amritasya Putra is a drama of hope and faith that at once negates the hopelessness of life that Das depicts elsewhere. In Kathaghoda Das combines the modern theme of life's absurdity with a style that comes close to that of Oriya folk drama in its dialogues, songs and stage particulars. It tells the story of two unhappy couples, reminiscent of Aranya Phasala, who breaks the iron grip of society by exchanging their marital places. Dipa, the wife of Pitambara stays with Arun, and Shikha, the wife of Arun stays with Pitambara. But in this new equation of relationship also, they come to realize the inevitability of the agony of life. The wooden horse remains as a symbol of life's meaningless process that is devoid of any spontaneity. The introduction of a character, 'Director' serves to involve the audience and co-ordinate all the actions of the plot. The painful pretensions in a family life are evident in Shabdalipi, where Rita and Partha cannot break the fetters of the society and continue to live together in their loveless relationship.

Manoranjan Das who is considered to be a pioneer of the Oriya absurd drama focuses on man's ceaseless attempts at a meaningful existence and the attendant agony. In each play he carries out new experiments in technique such as splitting the dialogue, distorting the sentence structure, breaking the time sequence and using various symbols and images. Throughout, his technique remains faithful to his theme.

J.K.B.

DAS, MARKANDA (Oriya) is popularly believed to be the first and the foremost poet of ancient Oriya literature in its formative period. He is the author of a lyrical composition titled Keshab Koili, the earliest extant specimen of the type of lyrics recognised as Koili (Cuckoo's musing) in the history of Oriya literature. The exact date of the poet has not yet been established despite research and study by scholars, and different scholars assign different dates. But it is certain that Markanda Das lived and wrote during the age of or a little before Sarala Das, the author of the monumental work, Mahabharata in 15th century. Oriya language had then just emerged as a separate literary vehicle for the expression of Oriya culture, nationality, art and literary sensibility and Markanda Das's Keshab Koili is the superb specimen of ancient Oriya lyrics in a developing language. Koili in ancient Oriya literature is a typical composition in which the lines of the 34 quatrains begin with the successive 34 consonants of Oriya alphabet beginning from 'Ka' to 'Kshya'. Koili is derived from the Sanskrit 'Kokil' which means cuckoo bird and Keshab is Krishna. Loving mother Yashoda addressed herself to the cuckoo bird depicting her apprehension, agony and sorrow at the departure of her son Krishna to Mathura where he is summoned to witness the Dhanu Uchhab by his motivated uncle Kansa. It is popularly known as Keshab Koili and the first line begins like this "O Cuckoo, my darling Krishna has gone away to Mathura." Thus the theme of this popular lyric is taken from the Krishna legend portraying the longing and pining of a devoted mother like Yashoda thus serving as a symbol of the universal mother's affection for the child.

The chief merit of the poem lies in the sweetness of language, delicacy of motherly sentiment and emotion. Music and pathos being blended together, the lyric was very popular in Orissan villages and for generations it served as a model of reading material for the pupils at the primary village school stage. Keshab Koili provided a pattern and a lyrical model to the successive authors. As a result one finds several compositions under the title Koili in medieval Oriya poetry and such typical poems are Artha Koili (a philosophical interpretation of Keshab Koili) by Jagannath Das, Jnanodaya Koili by Balaram Das, Varmasi Koili by Shankar Das in 16th century Oriya literature. Markanda Das occupies a glorified place in ancient Oriya literature for his only known and celebrated product Keshab Koili. The recitation and singing of this 'Koili' in Oriya homes is a part of literary tradition and the far flung village schools resound with the sonorous musical performances of Keshab Koili. A few lines from the text are quoted to illustrate the universal devotion of a mother to her child—.

Oh, Cuckoo, to whom shall I give milk and Sugar any more?
For the one who is so fond of them has gone forever?
Oh, Cuckoo my darling has left and does not return.

G.C.M.

DAS, MUKUNDA (Bengali; b. 1878, d. 1934) is popularly known as 'Charan-Kavi Mukunda Das'. His father was Gurudayal De and his original name was Yogeswar De. His father had settled in Barisal and the major part of his life was spent there. For education, his father admitted him in B.M. School of Barisal, but he could not pass the Entrance examination. As a school student, he used to participate in musical and theatrical performances, which in his later life paved the way to fame for him.

Finding no other occupation, he built up his own troupe of Kirtan. Obviously he was the head singer of his troupe. In 1900, he came in contact with Ramananda Abadhut who intiated him and gave his new name 'Mukunda Das', the literary meaning of which was the servant of Lord Krishna. Soon after that he composed a good number of songs, mostly professing Vaishnava faith.

In 1905, when Lord Curzon proposed to divide Bengal, Mukunda Das came out with his patriotic songs and joined the movement which was spreading like fire. He was then under the direct influence of Aswinikumar Dutta of Barisal who dedicated himself to the cause of his motherland. This was the third phase of his life when he is seen as a devoted patriot. In fact, since then he dedicated his life to the cause of the struggle for the country's freedom. As a bard, he was passing his days in the villages inspiring the Yatra performances. On one occasion, he had the blessings of Aswinikumar Dutta, who embraced him for the performance in Matripuja. All these activities of course, soon proved dangerous for him. He was imprisoned by the British Government; and was ultimately sent to Delhi Jail in 1908.

On his release from Delhi Jail, he come to learn about the death of his beloved wife. Mukunda Das now came to Calcutta with his troupe with a new vision. With renewed vigour and energy he joined the freedom movement as a bard. This was the last stage of his life. His patriotic songs and plays earned him fame all over the country. From the purely literary point of view, one may miss the modern political flavour in his lyrics, but the images and the diction of his compositions will readily remind us of our traditional folk literature, which has a deep root in our life. Like Ramprasad and Rajanikanta, he made songs the vehicle of his devotion to God, and an effective weapon for the mass movement.

BIBLOGRAPHY: Joyguru Goswami, Charan-Kavi Mukunda Das; Krishnachandra Gupta and Mandangopal Gupta, Mukunda Daser Gitavali; Pasupati Chatterjee, Charan-Kavi Mukunda Daser Gitavali.

J.K.B.

DAS, NABAGOPAL (Bengali; b. 1910) is a grandson of Munshi Harimohan Das (scholar in Persian) and son of Durgamohan Das (educationist of Dacca). Nabagopal had his early schooling in Dacca. He secured the first place in all the examinations from Matriculation (1928) to B.A. with Hons. in Economics from Presidency College (1930). He went to London and qualified for I.C.S. (1931). During the period of probation he studied at the London School of Economics and Politics (1930-1932) and qualified for Ph.D. (London) in 1937 for his brilliant thesis on Industrial Enterprise in India (published by the Oxford University Press, 1938).

Nabagopal served the Governments of Bengal and India for 26 years in various capacities. He voluntarily restired from the I.C.S. in December 1958. His variegated experience as the Special Officer, Vigilance, Govt of West Bengal was a shocking surprise to him. He boldly unmasked many a politician, officer and businessman. His experience was later put into a book in Bengali Ek Adhyay (One Chapter, 1960). Then he joined as Chief Director, Employers' Federation of India, Bombay (1958-1963). Then again Das come down to Calcutta and served as the Economic Adviser and Vice-President of Hindusthan Motors (1964-1977) and as the part time Director of United Commercial Bank (1977-1981).

He knows French and English apart from Bengali and Hindi. He represented India at many international conferences. He served as Lecturer and Visiting Professor of many universities in India and abroad, viz., Osmania and Calcutta (India), Michigan, Minnesota, Chicago, Washington, Seattle (U.S.), York and Toronto (Canada), Tokyo (Japan) and Honolulu. He is a life member of the PEN and was the sole delegate from India to the World Congress of PEN held in Vienna.

Das has published a dozen books in English on various industrial, employment and economic problems. Apart from his Ph.D. thesis the following can be mentioned: Banking and Industrial Finance in India (1936), The Indian Economy under Planning (1972), The Runaway Rupee (1975, based on the Benoy Sarkar Memorial Lecture delivered in August 1974 at the University of Calcutta).

Das has published five collections of short stories and eight novels during a span of forty years (1935-1975). His first published writing is a short story 'Ekti Diner Dekha' (Vichitra 1933), first published book, a collection of his stories Chhinna Papri (1935). Apart from this he published four more books of stories: Tara Dujan (1945), Asamapta (1947), Prem-O-Pranay (1961) and Priyatameshu (1966). One of his stories 'Nakphul' (Nosering, collected in Prem-O-Pranay) has been translated into English and included in Asian Literature (1979), published by the Asian Writers' Translators Bureau, Seoul, South Korea, Das has published eight novels-Chalti Pather Banshi (1934), Hey Atma-Bismrita (1937), Anabgunthita (1938), Sagar Doley Dheu (1939), Anuchcharita (1945), Abhijatri (1960), Dui Nari (1971), and Swapna Hote Bidaya (1975).

A.M.

DAS, NILAKANTHA (Oriya; b.1884, d. 1967) was a teacher, social worker, litterateur, and politician. He started his eventful career after joining the Satyabadi school inspired by Gopabandhu Das. His literary career covers a wide field: poetry, essay, translation and stories and poems for children. His deep learning won him the title of Pandit.

His autobiography told in a simple, lucid style encompasses all the facets of his life. It is more or less an exhaustive socio-political document of Orissa of his time. The narration starts from his childhood days and moves to describe his Satyabadi years, the Non-cooperation movement, the Swatantra Orissa movement and the political scenario from the twenties to the sixties. It also throws light on personalities like Gopabandhu Das, Madhusudan Das, Godabarisa Misra, Lingaraja Misra and Kripasindhu Misra who figured prominently in the then socio-political scene of the country.

His prose writings are marked by profound scholarship and a deep awareness of culture and religion. Sanskrita O Sanskriti (Sanskrit and Culture, 1951) is a scholarly work which traces the symbiotic relationship between the growth of the Indian culture and the growth of the Sanskrit language. It analyses various cultures and religious cults existing from the ancient times and finally focuses on the significance of Jagannath cult. Nilakantha's Arya Jivan (The Aryan Life), divided into six chapters, attempts a philosophical analysis of the Aryan way of living that encompasses various aspects of life like enjoyment, religion, spirituality, self-expansion, self-realization, etc. His Oriya Sahityara Krama Parinama (1948) is a deep analytical study of Oriya language and culture. Nilakantha has written a number of essays on various traits of human nature and social issues like superstition. He analyses the fundamental facts of life and does not hesitate to refute time-honoured opinions.

Nilakantha's poetry covers a wide range of themes like chivalry, love, patriotism and devotion. Bhaktigatha (Poems of Devotion, 1935) sings of various devotional experiences–the ecstasy of life and eternity, the intense search and questioning of the mind, the helplessness of man lost in the mundane transactions of life and the wonder of the magnificence of God's vast creation.

His Pranayini (1919) and Dasa Nayaka (1924) are the translations of Tennyson's The Princess and Enoch Arden respectively. By changing names and using native images, metaphors and myths, the poet has tried to depict the characters in concrete local situations. In Dasa Nayaka the poet by the use of colloquial language and a simple narrative style creates a familiar atmosphere of rustic simplicity and innocence, love and sacrifice and captures the poignancy that one experiences in the original English poem. Konarka (1919), considered to be his best creation, is an account of chivalry and romance and of Orissa's past glory. Nilakantha has written a number of songs for children such as Mo Tiki Ghara (My small Home), Sapua Kela (The Snake Charmer), Mahatma Gandhi, Mo Raja (My king), Machhi O Budhiani (The Fly and the Spider). In all these poems the poet subtly communciates the moral lessons of life. The naturally flowing rhythm and the musicality of the simple words reach the children in a communication process of urgency and intimacy. Besides these, Nilakantha has adapted the Bhagavata, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata for children. In all his writings as in the life, he has always been a seeker of truth and of the values which ennoble human existence.

J.K.B.

DAS, OMIOKUMAR (Assamese; b. 1905) had his education at Tezpur and Calcutta and passed B.A. from the Calcutta University. While a student, he was attracted to the literary activities organised and pursued by the Assamese students studying in Calcutta. They had earlier established A.S.L. club in Calcutta. Lakshminath Bezbarua, the doyen of the Assamese literature, was also residing in Calcutta; he was the central force and inspiration to the young students. Lakshminath had been publishing an Assamese monthly, called Banhi since 1909 and after a few years of its publication when he shifted permanently to Sambalpur in Orissa for his business in 1917, the responsibility of publishing Banhi fell upon young Omiokumar and his friends. Though Lakshminath remained its editor, all the works relating to the publication of Banhi were carried on by these young men.

Omiokumar revived its publication under his editorship in 1934 from Gauhati. Thus Banhi was the instrument for his journalistic and literary career. Under his editorship Banhi introduced many new literary trends and became a vehicle of literary information and criticism. He wrote and published a number of articles on English and other European literatures in the form of adaptation and abridgement, which, later on, were compiled and published under the title Banhir Pratiddhvani.

While studying in Calcutta he was attracted to the teaching of Brahmo-Samaj and in his thought and belief he retained it till his last days.

He was also attracted to the freedom movement of India, particularly to the personality of Mahatma Gandhi and joined the movement and courted imprisonment more than once. His faith in Gandhiji was so deep that he translated My Experiment with Truth, into Assamese under the title Mor Satya Anvesanar Kahini, which turned into a classic in Gandhian literature in Assamese. He also wrote a monograph on the historic fast of Mahatma Gandhi.

As he was in active politics, he had to lead a busy life full of daily routine and could not devote enough time to literature. He was elected to the Assam Assembly three times and was a minister for many years. While he was in charge of education, he tried to introduce basic education, established a number of junior and senior basic schools.

After his retirement from active politics he published a biography of Gandhiji for the students of the age group of 9-14. He also translated Toward Universal Man, a UNESCO publication, into Assamese.

His humanitarian approach and broad outlook mark his essays, which are simple in structure and racy in style. His mentioning of events connected with the Mahatma's Assam tour creates interest in the mind of the readers.

B.S.

DAS, PITAMBARA (Oriya; 18th century) was born of a

Brahmin namely Balukesvara Das, in a village on the bank of the river Rusikulya in Ganjam district. He was a house-holder Vaishnava living on alms and the chanting of the holy name of God, yet he acquainted himself with the contemporary and ancient Oriya and Sanskrit literature. He was endowed with superb memory and imaginative power which was exhibited in his epic Nrisimha Purana. He has been regarded as one of the most outstanding Purana creators in the Oriya language.

The Nrisimha Purana is divided into seven parts each named as 'Ratnakara' (the treasury of jewels). It differs from the original Nrisimha Purana in Sanskrit in its main structure. The main plot of this Purana is not the story of Hiranyakashipu, Prahlada and the Lion-incaration of Vishnu, but of Vishnu and Ananta (serpent bed) born as two sons of a Brahmin King of Badrika namely Krishna Ballava, taking the names of Nrisimha and Shesha respectively. Prince Nrisimha in his youth, had to face an archery contest to win the hands of the beauty-queen Lakshmi. Mura and Daruna, two demon brothers who oppressed heaven and earth, were killed by Nrisimha and Shesha.

The story of the temptation of Shuka, the ascetic, by Menaka, is very interesting. The story of Manu, an allegory of Jiva (soul) and Parama (cosmic soul) and a strange mystic episode are equally enjoyable. The mysticism revealed in the seventh and last chapter is unintelligible to the common man though the simile is given in the most common vocabulary. The poet also narrates the episode of the traditional story of Hiranyakashipu, his destruction by Nrisimha, the lion incarnate of Vishnu and the killing of Kamsa by Krishna in the last chapter.

The epic is a mirror of contemporary social conditions, cultural and religious, of Orissa. The poet tried to show how all the religious streams of his age have been assimilated into the Jagannath cult, where all differences of caste and creed vanish. He has also glorified Lord Jagannath, Vishnu, Nrisimha and Buddha as identical God-head.

Do.S.

DAS, PURUSHOTTAMA (Oriya; b. 1550, d. 1600), poet and author of Kanchi-Kaveri (published 1906) was the grandson of Baruna Das and son of Bhagirathi. A gopala (literally, rearer of cows) by caste, he was a resident of Puri where he served as the keeper of accounts in the kothabhandara (general store) of the temple of Lord Jagannatha. This accounts for his personal experiences regarding the festivals and other ceremonies observed in the temple regularly, as manifest in the lines of the Kanchi-Kaveri. He was conversant with the facts of history and the myths and legends connected with the deities as well as the Gajapati Kings of Puri.

Das will be ever remembered for his long narrative poem, Kanchi-Kaveri, describing the military conquest of Kanchi (Ist century) by the Gajapati King Purushottama Deva of Orissa. The myth connected with the movement of Jagannatha as an unseen power ahead of the national army of Orissa, the legends of Maniki Gauduni (literally, the cowherd woman, Maniki or Manika), who sold curd to the Lord, and the King's love, romance and marriage with Padmavati, princess of Kanchi, have all been woven with great artistic skill into this kavya, rendering it into a piece of successful historical literature in verse. Very much in conformity with his own devotional statement that Jagannatha is the Monarch of Orissa, the kavya has been conceived as a manifestation of His all–pervading superpower that works through His agent, Gajapati King; but the poet in him depicts the Lord as a character, a veritable jolly horseman of the King's cavalry. The importance of the work also lies in the graphic and lively descriptions of the details of warfare. For its success in its experiment with a historical theme, its novelty in depicting Jagannatha as a character in human flesh and blood, and finally as the artistic record of a war, Das's Kanchi-Kaveri stands out as a unique and pioneering work. It has been translated into Bengali. His other work, Gangamahatmya (Greatness of the Ganga), a puranic kavya on the mythological theme of the first flow of that sacred river was popular enough to be printed in Bengali script for use among the Bengali readers. Mriguni Stuti, Dutia Osa and Gundicha Bije are also ascribed to his authorship.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Surendra Mahanti, Odia Sahityara Madhyaparba (1967).

G.C.U.

DAS, RAGHUNANDAN (Maithili; b. 1860, d. 1945) was a poet, dramatist and prose writer. Born in a Karna Kayasth family of Sekhvan (in district Madhubani) Bihar he began his studies through Persian-Urdu and afterwards acquired the knowledge of Sanskrit, Brajbhasha and Hindi. He worked on different posts under several patrons belonging to the Darbhanga Raj. One of the literary stalwarts of the late 19th and the early 20th century, he inspired several senior as well as young writers to enrich their mother tongue. In recognition of his contributions to the language, All India Maithili Sahitya Parishad conferred upon him the title of 'Sahitya Ratnakara' in 1936. He was a versatile writer. He wrote such diverse poetical works as Subhadra Haran (written-1938, published posthumously-1959), a Mahakavya Vir-Balak, a Khandkavya, Maithili-Bal Siks, children's books and different Vratakathas, as well as dramatic works like Mithila Natak (1923), Dutangda-Vyayaga (1932) and Sudarshan Natak (unpublished). Besides these many of his poems and prose writings were published in journals and anthologies. He translated the Uttar Ramcharita (unpublished) or Bhavabhuti and also wrote three plays in Hindi, viz. Bharthari Nirveda, Savitri Satyavan and Pavas Pramod (all still unpublished).

The poet's major work, Subhadra Haran is an epic in thirteen cantos, and written strictly according to the convention of Sanskrit Mahakavya; it centres round the famous episode of Arjuna's adventures in exile resulting in his marriage with Ulupi, Chitrangada and Subhadra. The prominent sentiment of love in the epic is tinged with the sentiment of heroism. The poet's superb descriptive skill, narrative flow, imaginative flight, organisation of the story element and versification are quite in keeping with the norms of a true epic.

Another great contribution of Raghunandan Das was Mithila Natak. The theme of the play is conflict between Kaliyuga (The age of Kali) and Mithila which stands for virtues (Kali for vices). The playwright has handled the plot successfully in spite of its imaginary and complex nature. It is important for its didactic nature, its direct reflection on the influence of contemporary Parsi theatre on Maithili drama.

R.J.

DAS, RAMA (Oriya; b. 1736, d. 1793) was born in a Brahmin family in the village of Dura in Mahuri state of Ganjam district. His father was Lachmana Das. Rama Das is known as the author of Dardhyata Bhakti Rasamrita (Aesthetic bliss of firm faith in God). The life and devotional career of more than fifty devotees and saints of Orissa and other parts of India, have been depicted in the work. They are mostly historical and puranic personalities such as Bali, Harishchandra, Balaram Dasa, Jagannath Dasa, Kabir, Krishna Dasa, Raghunath Dasa and many others. The work is so popular in Orissa that every Oriya villager keeps a copy of it and reads it along with the Bhagavata of Jagannath Dasa.

The stories also supply many reliable and useful historical data about the reign of kings—Kapilendradeva, Purusottamdeva and Prataparudradeva of Orissa.

Again, these stories have been narrated in a very simple, but thrilling language and the style of description is appealing.

The other kavya of Rama Das is Rama Rasamrita which deals with the life and glory of Ramachandra, the divine incarnation of Vishnu in human form.

Do.S.

DAS, RAMA (Assamese; b. 1909), a writer of short stories in the thirties of the present century, is a story-teller of great power. His primary concern is with the intoxication of love of men and women belonging to the aristocratic and upper middle-class society. Before Rama Das, Lakshmidhar Sarma wrote a few stories of this kind.

When Rama Das started writing stories, Freudian analysis of love and other mental states were slowly but steadily penetrating the minds of the young writers of fiction. Das must have been influenced by Freud's concept of Id and Iibido.

Rama Das was a regular contributor of short stories to Awahon, a monthly journal of repute first published in 1929 from Calcutta under the patronage of Nagendranarayan Chaudhury. This brought him fame and popularity.

Pre-eminently a writer of love stories, Das selects his characters from the aristocratic and upper middle class society and represents their habits and characteristics in forceful and lucid prose. The background of most of his stories is Shillong with its lake, water-falls and attractive natural scene of the rows of whistling pine trees.

'Barsha Yetia Name' (When there is a summer downpour) is a fairly long story which narrates the romantic adventures of a young lecturer Jayanta who moved from one house to another with a view to meet the girls he knew intimately. After walking for some time he at last came to Chitra's dwelling, where he found Chitra's mother lying ill and Chitra in her kitchen. There was heavy downpur outside. He spent some time with Chitra and when he returned home, he felt his nerves vibrate with a thrill of pleasure.

'Achal Taka' (A Counterfeit Coin) is a well-knit story depicting the love of Dr. Barua for Mini Andrews, who one day stood helpless in front of the counter of the Post Office when the clerk refused to accept the rupee she offered him. To save her from embarrassment Dr. Barua gave her a rupee. Mini's heart was filled with gratitude for the young stranger with whom she became intimate soon. They met again in the most attractive natural surroundings of Shillong and knew each other most intimately.

Some other stories, such as 'Jahnabi', 'Jibanar Erati' (One night in life), and 'Prem Aru Prithibi' (Love and the earth) describe the maddening power of love in attractive circumstances.

Rama Das has written also a few stories which deal with topics other than sex but the number of such stories is small. The most outstanding of this kind of stories is 'Abui Maya' (Inexplicable affection) which deals with the love and affection of a fallen woman for a tender-aged boy. The story is narrated in the simplest possible language, suggesting thereby the simplicity of the boy and the sincere affection of Seuti Bai who ultimately committed suicide.

Rama Das is a writer of rhythmic prose. His sentences move easily like the slow current of a rivulet revealing a background against which human sensibilities shine. His rhythmic prose, pregnant with attractive emotional content can easily carry the reader to the end.

T.G.

DAS, SAJANIKANTA (Bengali; b. 1900, d. 1962), son of Harendralal Das, took his B.Sc degree in 1922 from the Scottish Church College, Calcutta. Shortly thereafter he joined Sanibarer Chithi, a literary journal and from the 11th number he became the editor. He had connections with other journals like Pravasi, Bangashree, Alaka, Sahitya Parishad Patrika. He wrote satirical poems and composed songs for the films. His book on the history of Bengali prose (1946) and his biographies of men of letters were carefully written and earned him reputation as a scholar. But to the posterity he will be remembered as the editor of Shanibarer Chithi in which he continuously lashed out at anybody he considered to be in the wrong; in doing so, the bounds of decency were not always strictly maintained. The journal and its editor were considered notorious by a large section of the reading public but that could not stop Sajanikanta from hitting persons like Rabindranath, Ramananda Chatterji and Subhas Bose in his writing. He had also the keen sense of the connoisseur and brought into limelight authors like Bibhutibhusan Banerji, Tarasankar Banerji, Banaphul, Pramathanath Bisi and many others. His prose, suited for satirical attacks, made him more feared than respected. In his later years, because of his organising talents, he was made the president of the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad for ten long years. He founded a press and a publishing firm also. His books were well received in his time. They are Path Chalte Ghaser Phul (1929), Manodarpan (1931), Madhu O Hul (1931), Rajhansa (1936), Alo Andhari (1936), Keds O Sandal (1940), Panchishe Baishakh (1942). These were all poems. He also wrote short stories–Kalikal (1940) and Akash Basar (1944) are two collections of them. Of his novels, Ajay (1929) and Mrityuduta (1944) were popular. But these have not left any lasting impression in the field of Bengali literature. He edited along with Brajendranath Banerji classics from Bengali literature in 27 volumes including the works of Raja Rammohun Roy, Bankimchandra, Vidyasagar and many others. Apart from his editorial works, he will most probably be remembered for some of his poems of great literary value like one written on Tagore's death, 'Banaspatir Mrityu'.

So.B.

DAS, SARALA (Oriya), the great epic poet of Orissa, was a contemporary of famous Oriya emperor Kapilendra Deva (1436-1466). He was born Kanakabalipur or Kanakpur Padna, near Jhankad, in the Cuttack district, at a distance of about 60 Kms from the present Cuttack city towards the east. He belonged to a farmer's family.It is said that he lost his parents at an early age and grew up under the care of his elder brother. His real name was Siddheswar Parida. He assumed the name Sarala Das ('Das' meaning a servant) as a mark of respect to Goddess Sarala (the famous deity at Jhankad) under whose blessing, it is said, he was gifted with poetic power. Sarala Das is generally considered the Father of Oriya literature, because even though in one form or the other Oriya literature had been existing earlier for about 300 years, it was mainly in the form of short compositions by Siddha and Natha poets and in proverbs, riddles and bachanas. Sarala Das was the first powerful poet who gave a shape to the language and created the first substantial Oriya literature. He wrote 3 books—Bichitra Ramayana, Mahabharata (in 18 vols), and Chandipurana in that sequence by his own admission, based on three great epics of the Hindus: the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata respectively. The first one deals with the later part of the Ramayana known as 'Uttarakanda', beginning with the banishment of Sita from Ayodhya. It continues the narration till the end of the Ramayana. But for many years the scholars were only vaguely aware of such a work and its many translations in Telugu, and the first definitive edition of Bichitra Ramayana from palm-leaf sources was prepared by Satchidananda Mishra in the seventies and the book was published in 1980. The second work the Mahabharata was the poet's greatest achievement. It has not only made the poet a household name in Orissa, but it has given him status as the greatest Oriya epic poet.

The book is framed on the original Mahabharata though vastly changed, retold and localized, almost making it an original work. The first definitive edition of the Mahabharata was prepared in the forties by Artaballav Mohanty and the monumental work was published by the cultural Affairs Department of Government of Orissa in the sixties. Recently a part of the Mahabharata was re-edited with corrections and emendations by K.C. Sahoo, and the book was published in 1978. Sahoo has edited Chandi Purana and it was published in 1984. This is otherwise called Debi Bhagavata, and it deals with the killing of Mahisasura by Chandi. Like his Mahabharata this is also heavily localized and it testifies to the popularity of Shakta cult and the worship of Mother Goddess (Devi) throughout Orissa.

Sarala Das borrowed from Sanskrit, but what he ultimately produced were three original books of great artistic merit. This has been particularly the case with the Mahabharata. From one point of view all three were excellent documents of contemporary Orissa, not only political, but also social, cultural, and religious. That was a time of great glory and pride for the Oriyas as a nation, as well as a time of intrigues and tension. All that has been reflected in Sarala's works. Secondly, the immense strength of the compact, organic, village-based 15th century Oriya social life and its highly idiomatic and living, colloquial language, have provided an equal strength and livingness to Sarala's works, and to his style. In fact Sarala Das created Oriya language, gave it a shape and defined it for future generations as Chaucer did for English or Dante did for Italian.

Jo.M.

DAS, SURYANARAYAN (Oriya; b. 1908) was born at Dasarathpur in Ganjam district of Orissa. His father Balukeswar Das was an elementary school teacher and was known as a Pandit in Sanskrit and Oriya and was a proficient mathematican as well. Suryanarayan passed M.A. in Oriya as a private candidate from Utkal University in 1946-47.

Suryanarayan is a dedicated journalist, a writer, an historian and a research scholar. He acted as special correspondent of the United Press of India from 1931 to 1944. He was the founder of the Utkal Journalists' Association and was its president from 1945 to 1965. For a long time he has been a member of the Indian Federation of Working Journalists.

He has written about eighty books both in Oriya and in English. His writings include history of Oriya literature, history of Orissa, grammar of the Oriya language, biographies of eminent personalities and religious reformers and treatise on the Gita. For his history of Oriya literature he was awarded prizes by the Orissa Sahitya Akademi and the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi. His love for Orissan Culture and literature is unrivalled.

The following are some of his published books worth mentioning: Oriya Sahityara Parichaya (A synopsis of the history of Oriya literature), Shri Jagannath Mandir, 1966 (The temple of Lord Jagannath), Paika Bidroha (The revolt of 1817 in Orissa against the British rule), Unabimsha Shatabdir Orissa, 1969 (An account of the socio-economic and political conditions of the Orissa of the 19th century), Orissare Swadhinata Sangramer Itihas (History of the freedon-struggle in Orissa), Oriya Sahityar Itihas, 4 Vols. 1963, 1965, 1966 (History of Oriya Literature), Deshaprana Madhusudan, 1971 (Biography of Madhusudan Das), Utkalmoni Gopabandhu, 1976 (Biography of Gopabandhu), Kabibar Radhanath Otanka Sahitya (Life and literature of poet Radhanath), Orissare Sepoyee Bidrohar Jhalak (Glimpses of the Sepoy Mutiny in Orissa), Raja Rammohan Roy (Biography of Raja Rammohan), Shri Ramanuj Charita (Biography of Ramanuja), Shri Nimbarka (Biography of Nimbarka), The Temple of Jagannath (English), and The History of Greater Orissa (English).

P.P.

DAS, UPENDRAKISHORE (Oriya; b. 1901, d. 1972) was born at Cuttack in a cultured aristocratic family. His father, grandfather and great grandfather served under the British as Deputy Collectors in the early period of their rule in Orissa. While he was a student of B.A. degree Class in Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, he plunged into the non-cooperation movement. As a devoted political worker he engaged himself in the socio-political activities in rural areas for ten years from 1921 to 1931. But Upendra kishore by temperament was an artist since his childhood, and as such was inclined to art and poetry. Gradually the artist in him gained the upper hand and he became apathetic to social activities in the villages. He forsook the social services and returned to Cuttack and settled there.

He spent the rest of his life at Cuttack like a real artist, completely engaged in clay modelling, painting, writing poems, songs and stories. Besides these, he took great interest in gardening and had a small aviary at home. In pursuit of his artistic tastes and inclination he sacrificed his vast property unhesitatingly.

His first composition, a poem, was published in the Paricharika edited by his mother. Afterwards he got interested in writing short stories. Some of his short stories appeared in the famous journal Baruni in 1926, edited and published by his family members. In this journal his notable work Mala Janha (The fading Moon) also appeared serially. Soon after these articles were published Upendrakishore created a stir among the reading public as an able story writer.

In later years Upendrakishore wrote stories for the children and this contributed to the growth of children's literature. Alibaba, Kanuri Deshare Gouri may be mentioned in connection with these writings for children. The last named book was written in imitation of Alice in Wonderland by Lewis Carroll.

The last part of his life was spent in research activities and in translating Sanskrit works such as Meghaduta, Gitagovinda and Bhagvata Gita. He sought to establish a research institute named Prachya Vidya Samiti for the publication of ancient works of literature. In pursuit of this he made prose rendering of Vishnu Purana and Shrimad Bhagvata. These works were of literary value, but have not unfortunately seen the light of the day.

J.B.M.

DAS, UPENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1848, d. 1895) was an eminent Bengali dramatist. He was the eldest son of Shrinath Das, advocate, Calcutta High Court. Upendranath studied in Calcutta Sanskrit Collegiate School. He was married at the age of twelve in 1860; but he lost his first wife within seven years and remarried a widow in 1867. This marriage brought a lot of displeasure among his relations. He gave up his formal study, but had acquired a good knowledge of the English language. He brought out a newspaper in English. Later on he joined Bengali drama movement in 1874 and started writing plays in Bengali.

His two plays, Saratsarojini (1874) and Surendrabinodini (1875) created a lot of sensation among the freedom loving people of Bengal. It was full of anti-British sentiment, and registered a strong protest against the British torture.

The main theme of Saratsarojini has been expressed in the songs of the characters of the fairies in the play. Surendrabinodini was dedicated to Dwarakanath Vidyabhushan, a teacher of the Sanskrit school who used to inspire Upendranath to write this type of plays. This play was, however, written on a real fact and character. The main character of the play, an oppressive British magistrate, was drawn after a real British magistrate of the district of Hooghly, Bengal. The British magistrate of the play, was killed in the hands of some prisoners. A few words from the dialogue of a prisoner endorse the spirit of the play beautifully: "It's next to impossible to bear limitless torture of the English any more. Either we shall tear off the chain or we shall die."

The play was staged. And on the 4th March, 1876 Upendranath along with Amritlal Basu, another important figure of the same field were arrested on the charge of obscenity but on the 27th March, 1876 they were released by the order of the High Court of Calcutta. The government enforced Dramatic Performances Control Bill immediately. Thus Surendrabinodini became historically important. Upendranath went to England to study law but came back without success in 1888. He wrote another play, Dada O Ami (1886). This is a farcical comedy written after an English farce Brother Jill and I.

Upendranath was appointed Director, Great National Theatre, Calcutta in 1875.

Na.S.

DAS, YASOVANTA (Oriya; 15th/16th century) was born to Jagu Mallika and Rekha Devi. From his childhood he had strong faith in God. He occupies a special position among the devotees and poets of medieval Orissa. He was very fortunate to find a place among the Five Associates. After coming into contact with Chaitanya he led a spiritual life.He fascinated not only devotees but also the Gajapati King, Prataprudradeva.

Yasovanta composed many bhajanas in Oriya explaining the first principle of Pinda-Brahmanda. Among his compositions on Brahmajnana Malika and Govinda Chandra Tika are famous. In the Malika, Yasovanta has described the 'Lokadharma' of Kali Age, when the minds of the people have become covered with ignorance and darkness. They have been deeply self-willed, without realising the importance of paying respect to their parents, preceptors and superiors.

Yasovanta Das is now remembered only through his ballad of Govinda Chandra, sung by the mendicants of the Yogi caste. Govinda Chandra, a prince from Bengal, renounced royal comfort, his wife and son, for ascetic life, strangely enough on the advice and persistent persuasion of his own mother Mukta Devi. The prince's yogic guide was Hadipa, a scavenger, from whom he learnt about the worthlessness of worldly pleasure which is nothing but transitory. All this fitted very well into the ascetic and cosmopolitan aspiration of the five comrades and was, therefore, taken up by Yasovanta for popularisation among the masses.

His Svarodaya describes the ways for the accomplishment of the objective. Prema–Bhaktigita is a valuable work on 'Jnana-mishra-bhakti'. Having placed Balabhadra, Subhadra and Jagannatha in the body, Yasovanta has introduced the first principle of creation, the existence of Brahma and the birth of Yogamaya. In the Yantraboli, vivid description is given of the guhyachakra, lingachakra, nabhichakra, hridayachakra, kanthachakra and lalatachakra and the existence of paramatma in them. In the Divyadehi, Loigita and Atmaparache Gita, Yasovanta has indicated the ways for Bhakti. He was also an expert in Sanskrit. This is revealed from many of his writings. Many things are told about the occult power of Yasovanta Dasa. Once a king, having been greatly pleased with his extra ordinary power, married his daughter Anjana with Yasovanta. His two famous disciples were Sudarshana Dasa and the Yavana Salabega.

Ni.M.

DASA LITERATURE (Kannada) played an important role in Karnataka from the 15th century onwards. Haridasas were the staunch devotees of Vishnu. The exact beginning of Haridasa literature is still a controversial subject. Belur Keshavadasa, the author of Karnataka Bhaktavijaya held the opinion that Achalananda Dasa is the earliest who belonged to the 9th century. But, when we study some of the compositions of Achalanand Dasa quoted by Belur Keshava Dasa, we cannot consider them to be so early on the basis of the structure of the language. Added to this, a later discovery has shown that a composition with Achalananda Vittala as ankita mentions the name Madhvacharya who belongs to the thirteenth century. Further, from some of the stray palm leaves available with the successors of the so-called Achalananda Dasa, it has come to light that there was one Achalananda in the 9th century at Turuvekere who had the blessings of Panduranga Vittala. He is said to have established a number of branches of his mutt in several parts of Karnataka. The palm leaves do not say anything about his contributions to Kannada. Hence, it may be inferred that this Achalananda of 9th is different from Achalananda Dasa with 'Achalananda Vittala' as his ankita, who is definitely later than Madhavacharya. Naraharitirtha who was a contemporary of Madhvacharya and who was also one of his immediate desiples is considered as the originator of this movement by the 13th century itself. But the available songs ascribed to him have different ankitas such as 'Narahari' and

'Raghupati' and there are considerable interpolations also. Some of the Kannada songs written in praise of Naraharitirtha are mainly devoted to his achievement of bringing Mula Rama Vighraha from the treasury of the king of Kalinga, where he served as a regent for sometime. If he were the precursor of Haridasa Sahitya, his name would not have been ignored by his admirers. Even the vast interval of more than a hundred years between Naraharitirtha and Sripadaraja is put forth as one of the unfavourable evidences to accept him as a pioneer in this field. A few are of the opinion that there was a band of devotees known as Adyas who are said to have played a prominent part in starting this religious movement. In view of many of these uncertainties facing us, it is desirable for the present to rely upon the oft-qutoed sloka which speaks highly of Sripadaraja, Vyasaraja, Purandara Dasa and Vijayadasa as the luminaries of Haridasa literature. (Namah Sripadarajaya namaste Vyasayogine, namah purandararyaya Vijayaryayate namah) Sripadaraja (1404-1502) belonged to the 15th century and he was a much honoured pontiff of the day whose mutt was at Mulabagilu.

He was held in high esteem by the followers of Madhva religion as a great scholar in Dvaita philosophy and his Sanskrit work is known as Vagvajra. He was equally respected by Saluva Narasimha who was also one of the rulers of Vijayanagara empire. Above all, we are fortunate to have a good collection of his Kannada compositions comprising the different forms of Haridasa Sahitya such as as Kirtana, Suladi, Ugabhoga, Vrittanama and Dandaka where he has used 'Ranga Vittala' as his ankita. It seems to be quite appropriate to acknowledge Sripadaraja as the pioneer of Haridasa literature. It was already two hundred years since Madhvacharya began to propound his philosophy and established his religion. By this time there were sufficient books in Sanskrit on Dvaita philosophy. There was a need to spread the message of Madhavacharya to his followers in Kannada. The bold step taken by Sripadaraja to introduce the system of singing Kannada songs at the time of worshipping the God after the time-honoured rituals, gradually paved its way for propagation of the Madhva tenets among the people. Sripadaraja's compositions abound with his personal feelings towards his deity as well as with the philosophical doctrines of his Acharya. Special mention may be made about his Bhramaragita, Venugita and Gopigita. His songs cover a good deal of Srimad Bhagavata. Just at this time, Annamacharya, the well-known devotee of Lord Venkateswara of Tirupati, had begun to compose his 'kirtanas' in Telugu in praise of God. Taking all these factors into consideration one could, without reservations, accept Sripadaraja as the sole inspirer and pioneer of Haridasa literature. The popularity of this new movement is further established when we realise how Vyasaraja, another eminent pontiff of Madhva order and the ardent disciple of Sripadaraja, came forward to contribute his mite to the early beginnings of Haridasa literature by his devotional songs. Vyasaraja (1447-1539) was a great scholar in Sanskrit and his three great works, viz., Tarkatandava, Nyayamrita and Chandrika are in Sanskrit: Nevertheless his love for Kannada was equally great. Like his teacher Sripadaraja, Vyasaraja won the love and admiration of a large circle of men, consisting of a galaxy of Sanskrit scholars from all over India and the rulers of Vijayanagara empire. He lived at a time when this Hindu empire of the illustrious king Krishnadevaraya reached a high point of glory. Vyasaraja went a step further in serving Haridasa literature by organising a band of Haridasas exclusively set apart to teach the profound truths of Madhva philosophy as well as to make the people realise the importance of a pious and righteous life. Luckily, he came across devoted disciples like Purandaradasa and Kanakadasa who were also in search of a master who would fulfil their thirst for the realisation of God and bless them with a glorious spiritual life. Purandaradasa had given up all his wealth of his own accord and was determined to dedicate the rest of his life to the service of God. Similarly, Kanakadasa, who was well situated in life, had become a Haridasa after realising that pomp and pleasure were temporary. It is quite natural that any movement would get an impetus by such people who had an urge to serve a great cause. In course of time this fold of Haridasas came to be known as 'Dasa Kuta'. Even Vadiraja who was one of the mathadhipatis of Udupi, was inspired by Vyasaraja when he had the occasion to stay with him for sometime. Vadiraja was proficient in Sanskrit and he had already written a number of eminent works in Sanskrit expounding the philosophy of Madhvacharya. One can see the same depth of scholarship and approach in his Kannada compositions as well. However, his kirtanas are full of feeling and rich experience. Vyasaraja had 'Sri Krishna' as his mudrika and Vadiraja had 'Hayavadana' who was his diety of worship. When we just look at the contributions of these three pontiffs, we observe that Vadiraja had the unique quality of dealing with the most abstract philosophical topics also in simple words through popular metres. Apart from hundreds of Kirtanas, Vadiraja's independent works, Vaikunta Varnane, Lakshmi Shobhane and Bhramaragita are fairly lengthy and profound in content.

Even though the 15th and 16th centuries are said to be the golden age of Haridasa Sahitya so far, we are able to mention only two names with certainty viz., Purandaradasa and Kanakadasa, who did their best to build up the reputation of Haridasa literature. One other name which is less known, is Vaikuntadasa of Belur. Though he was a Srivaisnava by birth, he too became a Haridasa and a few Kannada compositions which are available bear 'Vaikuntha' as his ankita (nom-de-plume). He did not stir out of Belur. It is said that he had the blessings of Sri Krishna who danced before him as an enchanting child. Both Vadiraja and Kanakadasa have paid great tributes to Vaikunthadasa. It is likely that both Purandaradasa and Kanakadasa have overshadowed the existence of other Haridasas in this creative period. Purandaradasa is known to have composed 75,000 songs dealing with the several aspects of devotion. It is rather regrettable that we have secured at present only a thousand of his compositions. Even among these, a good number seem to be interpolations. His sons too are said to have composed songs like their father. Evidently, many of their compositions might have been included in this number. However, there is no doubt that Purandaradasa is unrivalled among the Haridasas. Vyasaraja himself has praised his disciple that Purandaradasa is the foremost among this fold who was a sincere devotee of Sri Hari. This judgement of his master holds good even to this day. A survey of the compositions of Purandaradasa reveals to us that he has covered a good deal of subjects covering both the spiritual and general aspects of life. Many of his songs are highly emotional, because they depict his own struggles for the realisation of the God. In a way, they are so personal that we can understand his agitated mind and his determination to attain his goal. Though there are a good number of songs confined to the exposition of Madhva philosophy, he has to his credit as many compositions which are universal in appeal. Purandaradasa had a broader vision of society around him and his mind responded immediately to the shortcomings of human beings. Though the content of his writings is didactic, it receives a poetic touch in his hand when he conveys it with apt words and rich similes. The individuality of Purandaradasa is his inimitable gift for expressing the most abstract thoughts in simple words which can open the eyes of common men. Vyasaraja is said to have called his rich collection of compositions as Purandaropanishat which is a fitting compliment indeed!

Kanakadasa (1509-1607), the other illustrious Haridasa of this period whose ankita is 'Kaginale Adikeshava' is not only a saint but also a reputed poet. Mohanatarangini, Nalacharite Haribhaktisara and Ramadhanya Charite are his works written in an easy, understandable style. Since he was a non-Brahmin by birth, he at times becomes pungent when the orthodox people show their preference to high caste. By nature, he is frank in his words. He does not spare any of the so called religious people. The other marked feature of his compositions is their intellectual content which is most apparent in his riddle-like songs called 'mundiges'. Even to this day, many of these compositions remain unsolved. On account of the leading role played by the liberal pontiffs like Sripadaraja, Vyasaraja and Sri Vadiraja on the one hand, and the dedicated Haridasas like Purandaradasa, and Kanakadasa on the other, this period is aptly recognised as the best part in Haridasa literature. This glorious period which has laid a firm foundation for the growth of Haridasa Sahitya seems to have come to a standstill due to the downfall of Vijayanagar Empire by 1565.

Although an interval of more than a century between Purandaradasa and Vijayadasa (1687–1755) is considered barren by the scholars of Haridasa Literature, we cannot but mention the name of Mahapati Rao (1611-1681) of Kakhandaki who has to his credit not less than six hundred compositions written on the model of the early Haridasas. He is isolated from the fold of Haridasas by the traditional people since he laid great stress on Yogamarga and due to other relgious considerations. Whatever these differences may be, the credit should go to Mahipati Rao and his son Krishna Rao who have kept up the tradition of Haridasa Literature in their own way.

Later, we come across a legion of Haridasas beginning with the latter half of 17th century among whom Vijayadasa stands foremost. Looking at the religious circumstances prevailing at that time, one cannot deny that the installation of Brindavanam of Raghavendra Tirtha at Mantralaya was a great inspiring force for the renaissance of Haridasa under the leadership of Vijayadasa. Even the sloka already quoted bears sufficient evidence for this inference. Vijayadasa belonged to Ceekalaparavi situated in Manvi taluk of Raichur district. He came from a poor family. The unfavourable circumstances in his life led him to go to the distant Kasi (Benaras) twice. When he was there for the second time, he had the initiation by Purandaradasa who appeared in his dream. He got the ankita 'Vijaya Vittala'. He is supposed to be the youngest son of Purandaradasa, known as Madhvapati, born again with a mission to complete the remaining 25,000 compositions of his father to round up the figure into five lakhs. Just as in the case of other Haridasas, he is also considered to be the reincarnation of Bhrigu. Coming to the merit of his compositions, they are replete with all the important doctrines of Madhva philosophy. His songs are lyrical and touching. Apart from contributing his mite to the rich treasure of Haridasa literature, Vijayadasa has done yeoman service in reviving the 'Dasa Kuta'. He had the fortune of having a number of disciples who cooperated with him in this noble and sacred task. Among these mention may be made of Gopaladasa (Gopala Vittala), Kallur Subbannadasa (Vyasa Vittala), Mohanadasa (Mohan Vittala), Seshagiridasa (Guru Vijaya Vittala), Prasanna Venkatadas (Prasanna Venkata) and Igi Venkatacharya (Casndeva Vittala).

Gopaladasa (1721-1762), who was one of the beloved disciples of Vijayadasa, initiated his brothers also into the fold of Haridasas and at the direction of his spiritual master, he initiated Srinivasacharya of Manavi who became well known as Jagannathadasa. Jagannathadasa, in his turn gave diksha Haridasa and to a number of others. This second phase of Haridasa literature spreads over several years, approximately commencing with 1687 and running up to 1809. While the centre of the early period of Haridasa literature happened to be the capital of Vijayanagar, the second phase had its centre as Mantralaya and it covered a large area all around Raichur, Gadval, Rangalakote, etc. Manvi, Gadval, Darnu, Modalakallu, Iji, Uttanur, Venisomapur and such other nearby places had the privilege of giving birth to eminent Haridasas. The literary output of these servants of God is also valuable and voluminous. Next to Vijayadasa, Jagannathadasa's (1728-1809) contribution is marked by its variety and content. His songs are few and his approach is always philosophical. His rich knowledge of Sanskrit works about Dvaita philosophy has found its vent in his major work Harikathamritasara. This is a work written in Bhamini Shatpadi containing 32 chapters. Each one of the chapters is devoted to the exposition of Madhva philosophy. One can easily estimate the importance of this technical work which has several commentaries both in Kannada and Sanskrit. The profound scholarship of Jagannathadasa is the soul of this valuable work. The 'Tatvasuvalis' which amount to hundreds in number are noted for adopting the most popular metre known as 'tripadi' to convey the highest spritual truths relating to Dvaita Siddhanta. Among the remaining stalwarts of this period, Prasanna Venkatadasa (1680) deserves our consideration. Though he belonged to Kakhandiki, his activities centred around Bagalkote. Apart from being the author of several kirtanas, he is well known for his rendering of the first half of the 10th Chapter of Srimad Bhagavata into Kannada wherein he has used a number of popular metres in Kannada. Vyasatatvagna (1750) with Vasudeva Vittala as his ankita is noted for compositions on Sri Krishna. In some of his songs, Madhura Bhava has a predominant place. He lived at Venisomapur where he installed the image of Venugopala in a temple. Unlike the previous phase, there are a number of Haridasas in this period who have upheld the Madhva religion and Bhagavatadharma in general. Though the number is large and the output voluminous, only a few are prominent in their indiviudality of style and the method of conveying thoughts. A good majority of the compositions reveal that the Haridasas of this phase had greater inclination towards the doctrines of Madhva philosophy than in expressing their personal, spiritual experience and the observation of the other aspects of life. Perhaps, it is at this period, that Sudha, the masterpiece of Jayatirtha which one has to read before attempting to understand the pada of a Haridasa, came into use.

We come across a few women devotees also during this period, who have written songs and some short narratives with their ankitas. Giriyamma (1750) of Helavanakatte is one among them. She was a great devotee of Ranga at Helavanakatte. Her ankita is Helavanakatte Ranga. She is considered to be an incarnation of Yashoda. Though she was married, she could not pursue the family life since her mind was always bent upon serving the God and attaining her salvation. It is learnt that she was an expert in drawing several sketches of God on the ground with 'rangavalli' by means of which she had earned the grace of God also. Lord Krishna is said to have danced before her whenever she prayed to him. Though her Kirtanas are not many, they are popular among the womenfolk even today. She has written a few works in Kannada, of which the life of Candrahasa written in Sangatya is popular. One other lady is Bhimava (1990) of Harapanahally. Though she had no formal education, she had the advantage of listening to the well known songs of Haridasas and had a good acquaintance with puranic episodes. Many of her songs are composed on the model of the earlier Hardidasas and she has to her credit a number of lengthy narratives dealing with anecdotes occurring in our puranas and other sacred works. These songs have her ankita as 'Bhimesa Krishna'. Her lengthy works are popular among the Brahmin ladies as they are related to religious ceremonies.

The tradition of Haridasa literature continues. Even to this day, all the prescribed rules of initiation are observed. The followers wear the same dress and use other means which are helpful to singing and dancing. Not only do they forget themselves while reciting the compositions of the older Haridasas, but they too have composed a number of kirtanas. One has to admit that there are more imitations of older compositions in the contemporary period. However, due credit may be given to some of these devoted Haridasas for keeping alive the tradition started centuries ago by Sripadaraja and others.

When we survey the galaxy of Haridasas spread over a period of five hundred years, we can certainly feel proud of these minstrels of God. Though their sole aim was to practise and spread the tenets of Madhva philosophy, their compositions are also valuable from the literary and musical point of view. Though they uphold the supremacy of Sri Hari, they are equally tolerant of other gods. Besides, they have the credit of cultivating the devotion of Vittala in Karnataka, in spite of their firm faith in the other forms of Sri Hari. Just as in other religious movements, they seem to be intolerant of others' points of approach which are not congenial to Dvaita conceptions. Barring such limitations and differences, one can see unabated religious fervour in these Haridasas. Their continuous struggles to realise their cherished goal are highly inspiring and moving. They have preached the eternal values of life in simple Kannada words set to different tunes and rhythms. Many of the Vedic thoughts and Upanishadic teachings are brought within the reach of common men in their own language. As the very essence of Madhva philosophy is the strong devotion to God firmly based on knowledge, Haridasa literature had the best advantage of carrying this message far and wide. The Haridasas who were itinerant by nature had the occasion to observe the frailties of the human mind. Therefore, they took this opportunity to analyse the weaknesses of human beings purely from the moral point of view. Hence, they taught the people in general how to make use of this life to the best advantage by following simple codes of morality such as honesty, purity and piety. They gave supreme importance to serving God wholeheartedly with sincerity and steadfastness. They emphasised the need to keep one's body, word and deed solely dedicated so as to attain the salvation. For, just a few can observe the strict rules and rituals laid down in our sacred scriptures. But the path of devotion is open to all. Haridasa Sahitya is a rich treasure of our ancient mythology and great epics. Thus the compositions of Haridasas of Karnataka are a solid and unique contribution to Kannada literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.P. Karmarkar and N.B. Kalamdani, Mystic Teachings of Haridasas of Karnatak, (1939); B.N.K. Sharma, A History of the Dvaita School of Vedanta and its Literature, (Vol. II, Part IV, Ch. XVI), The Vaishnava Saints of Karnataka, Reprint (1969); R.D. Ranade, Reformatory and Devotional Movement of the Haridasa Kuta, its History and Literature, (1961); R.S. Panchamukhi, Haridasa Sahitya, (1952), Pathway to God in Kannada Literature, (1960).

G.V.R.

DASBODHA (Marathi), the best work of saint-poet Ramdas (1608-1681), is an independent treatise in verse-form divided into twenty parts (dashakas) each containing ten sections (samasas) with a total of 7752 ovis. The only reference to the date of the composition of this work occurs in the sixth part suggesting indirectly the year 1659, and all the following parts were added later on, the last one being dictated by the author just before his death in 1681. Thus, the writing of the Dasbodha went on for about twenty-two years, a fact which explains its variegated and loose structure.

The nucleus of the Dasbodha is to be found in an earlier work of Ramdas known as the Ekavisa-samasi, containing only twenty one sections and 1340 ovis. This work was later incorporated into the Dasbodha. The earlier work is more or less uniform in its character, its main theme being philosophy and spirituality. As against it, the Dasbodha is a peculiar combination of the poet's observation of the ways of the world, his devotional fervour, metaphysical thought, socio-political understanding and mystical experience. It is, in fact, a history of the doings and thoughts of a great thinker-saint, who was also a poet.

By the time Ramdas took to the writing of the Dasbodha he had acquired multifarious experience of the world and the political and social developments had moulded his thinking to a large extent. That is why the chief value of its counsels lies in the practical hints and the inspiration they give to those who aspire for direct realisation. These instructions, given in an easy style, are as refreshing and touching as direct talk, and being universal in their appeal, can be easily understood by all. There is something for everyone, and there always is some rational appeal. Here is a work written by a man of vast spiritual and worldly experience. The reader is here in personal contact with a great man who is preaching what he has actually experienced: 'He prachitiche bolile, adhi kele maga sangitale', meaning:

> This is said out of personal experience,
> First done and then preached.

The Dasbodha begins with a declaration that it would discuss the way of devotion: 'yethe bolila visada bhakti-marga'. And of course the core of the work does pertain to Bhakti, Bhakti in the nine-fold way for which it assigns an independent section each. Similarly, the qualifications of the seeker (sadhaka) and the realised one (siddha) are narrated at length. The general atmosphere of the Dasbodha is certainly spiritual and its epilogue also promises spiritual favours to its reader. But there is much more in it. Its nature is encyclopaedic. It contains sections on subjects like music and handwriting and book-making. But the main subject next in order is social and political activism. Ramdas was himself an activist and also happened to be the spiritual teacher of King Shivaji, the founder of the Maratha empire. It is because of this a few sections of the Dasbodha are addressed to Shivaji. In one of these Ramdas asks him to adorn his body not by clothes and ornaments, but by shrewdness and wisdom. He further asks him to be on guard as the alien rulers have been escalating oppression throughout India for a long time. And finally he tells Shivaji that God feels proud of him and that it was his duty to help his subjects, in fact, to re-establish the kingdom of God. Ramdas had watched from close quarters the miserable condition of the people throughout the country and he therefore exorted them to acquire supremacy both in worldly and spiritual matters. The way of accomplishing this was, according to Ramdas, to devote oneself to upasana, that is to say, to know the true way of meditation on God. This is indeed a matter of one's own experience. Set thyself to perform thy duty by meditating on God, and thou shalt surely succeed.

Activism is the special creed of the Dasbodha, and Ramdas tells us often that the ideal of life which he sets forth before others is the ideal which he had realised for himself. According to him, the ideal man is a practical man who loves to put forth effort, undertakes boldly any enterprise, and does not shun work. He is everywhere, and yet nowhere. Like the Atman, he hides himself. He tells us how in his time the tyrants had oppressed the whole land; how he gave up everything to lead a life of a saint and became the support of all on account of his great spiritual power. Says he: 'The end of human life consists in realising such an ideal.'

Thus the Dasbodha is a multifaceted work reflecting the integrated and yet variegated personality of its author. It is a great work in every way except perhaps in literary style. For the Dasbodha is prosaic both in style and in sentiment. Prolific writer that he was, Ramdas seems indifferent to poetical form and rides rough-shod over diction, bending it as he likes. But the fame of the Dasbodha rests upon its substance rather than upon its form. Ramdas could, of course, when occasion arose, rise to literary heights and write some very fine poetry. The delineations of the softer emotions of devotion in the Dasbodha are certainly poetical. The entire section on Friendship with God (Sakhya-bhakti) for example is a masterpiece of devotional poetry. But it is not for lyrical tenderness or musical melody but for the strength and vigour in which the teachings of Ramdas excel that readers turn to the Dasbodha.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.D. Ranade, Mysticism in Maharastra, Part V, Poona, 1933., S.G. Tulpule, Pacha Santakavi, 2nd edn, Poona, 1962., S.K. Altekar, Sri Samaratha Charitra, 2nd edn, Poona, 1974., W.S. Deming: Ramdas and Ramdasis, Calcutta, 1928.

S.G.T.

DASGUPTA, AMULYAKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1911, d. 1975) popularly known by his pseudonym, 'Sambuddha' was educated in B.M. College, Barisal, now in Bangladesh. He came to Calcutta and studied in Ripon College; later he joined the freedom movement and was arrested and imprisoned for some years. Amulyakumar took his M.A. degree in political science as a prisoner. He had chosen teaching as his profession. He taught at Daulatpur Hindu Academy, Surendranath College, Dinajpur and in Contai P.K. College, Midnapur. He was the joint editor of the leading literary weekly, Shanibaer Chithi in which many of his stories were published. Ready wit and spontaneous sense of humour place him permanently in the history of Bengali literature. After Parashuram (Rajshekhar Basu) he was the last successful writer of this trend. With his practical experience of the wild life of East Bengal, particularly of Sunderban region he wrote some stories. He was closely associated with Kathasahitya, another literary journal. The quantity of his contributions to Bengali literature was not much, but their intrinsic quality and formal freshness were beyond question. The following are the contributions of Sambuddha in Bengali: Dilektik (1941), Bagh Sap (1959), and Shikar Kahini (Vols. 1 & 2, 1961).

Na.S.

DAS GUPTA, SASIBHUSAN (Bengali; b. 1911, d. 1964) an eminent Bengali scholar, critic and writer. Sasibhusan graduated with Hons. in Philosophy from Scottish Church College, Calcutta and was awarded Clint Memorial Prize for standing first in Ethics. He stood first class first in Bengali in M.A. from the University of Calcutta in 1935 and was registered as research scholar in the Deptt. of M.I.L., Calcutta University. He got the Premchand Ray chand Scholarship in 1937 for his research on Tantrik Buddhism and in the next year he was appointed lecturer in Bengali in the University of Calcutta. Sasibhusan took his Ph.D. Degree on Obscure Religious Cults as the Background of Early Bengali Literature in 1949. In 1955 he became the Head of the Deptt of M.I.L. and was appointed Ramtanu Professor, University of Calcutta. Dasgupta went to attend a UNESCO sponsored conference on world religion held in Manila and lectured on Hinduism in 1960. In the next year he got Sahitya Akademi award for his highly scholastic piece of work, Bharater Shaktisadhana O Shakta Sahitya. He was elected President, literary section, All India Bengali Literary Conference held in 1962. He was invited to deliver Annual Tagore Lecture in the University of London by the School of Oriental and African Studies in 1963, and subsequently he was invited by the Cultural Ministry of France too. He collected about two hundred Charya Songs from Nepal.

Sasibhusan was educated by Mahatma Ashwinikumar Dutta and was greatly influenced by his character; he came in touch with Radhakrishnan, S.N. Dasgupta, and Benimadhab, Barua of Calcutta University and famous Kshitimohan Senshastri of Shantiniketan was a continuous source of inspiration in his life. His association with great men helped him a lot to build up his own character with rare simplicity and profound wisdom and knowledge. His deep knowledge of Indian religious philosophy, highly scholastic nature of philosophical and literary criticism as well as creative spontaneity gave him a prestigious place in the history of Bengali literature.

He wrote both in English and Bengali. The landmarks of his English writings are: Obscure Religious Cults as Background of Early Bengali Literature (1946), An Introduction to Tantric Budhism (1950), Studies in the Bengal Rensissance (ed). A.C. Gupta, Calcutta (1958), Aspects of Indian Religious Thoughts (1960), and Divine Grace and the Law of Karma, Prabuddha Bharat (1961).

He wrote as many books in Bengali some of which may be classified in the following manner: Criticism: Bangla Sahityer Navajung (1938) (new age of Bengali Literature), Sriradhar Karma Vikas (1952) (gradual development of Srihandha), Bharater sakti sadhana o Sakta Sahitya, (1960) (Indian worship of the Sakti and Sakta literature), Upanisader Patabhumikay Rabindra Manas (1961) (Tagorian mind against the background of the Upanisada), Tolostoy, Gandhi, Rabindnath (1962). Light Essay: Ksanadarsan (momemntary look), (un dated) Novel: Bidrohini (rebellious lady), Yangla matter fasal (1956) (Harvest of the wild field). Poetry: Epare Opare (1941) (this side other side), Nisithakurer Kadca (1948) (verse-chronicle of Nisithakur). Drama: Dinanter Agun 1949) (fire of the clease of the day), Habahaladhar (1962) (idiot Haladhar). Children Literature: Chutir dine megherdal, Syamla dighir isan kone.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.K. Dasgupta and Sisir Kumar Das (ed.) Sasibhusan Commemoration Volume (1968)

Na.S

DASGUPTA, SUDHIRKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1894, d. 1956) was one of the most outstanding teachers of the Bengali language and literature. Sudhirkumar had a chequered career because of his political involvements. Hailing from Barisal he was a close associate of Jatin Sen, the political idol of Barisal. After taking his M.A. degree he joined the Scottish Church College and in no time his deep erudition and power of expression earned him the fame of a great teacher. His most important contribution to Bengali literature is Kavyalok–a book on Indian poetics. He wrote for the youngsters two books Upanishader Galpa and Rishider Prarthana–one a book of stories and the other a book of translation of selected hymns of the upanishads.

So.B

DASGUPTA, SURENDRANATH: (Bengali; b. 1885, d. 1952), the internationally known scholar, was born in Kustia now in Bangladesh. He obtained his M.A. degree in Sanskrit in 1908, and in Philosophy in 1910 from Calcutta University. A Ph.D. of Calcutta and Cambridge Universities, and a D. Litt. of the University of Rome, he taught Sanskrit and Philosophy with distinction at several institutions of advanced studies. He was appointed Principal of Sanskrit College, Calcutta in 1931 and the King George V Professor of Philosophy, Calcutta University in 1942. He took part in many an International Congress on Philosophy and Religion and presided over the Indian Philosophical Congress in 1932. He also evolved his own philosophical system–the theory of dependent emergence.

His monumental work is the five-volume History of Indian Philosophy (1922-1955). His other important works are A Study of Patanjali (1920) and Yoga Philosophy in Relation to other systems of Indian Thought (1930). He wrote and edited A History of Sanskrit Literature (1947) jointly with S.K. De. He came in contact with Rabindranath Tagore and wrote Rabindranath, the Poet and Philospher (1948) and Rabi-Dipika, a collection of articles in Bengali on the philosophical foundation of Rabindranath's poetry. His two other books in Bengali are Kavya-bichar and Sahitya Parichay.

As.S

DASHAKUMARACHARITA (Sanskrit) is a katha type of prose-kavya written by Dandin. With the discovery of the incomplete Avantisundarikatha, also ascribed to Dandin and dealing generally with the same story, there have been discussions regarding the interrelations of the two texts.

The text of the Dashakumaracharita has come down to us in three parts. The first five chapters known as Purvapithika and the last fourteenth chapter known as Uttarapithika are not surely by Dandin. The remaining eight chapters, i.e., from chapter sixth to thirteenth form the Dashakumaracharita proper by Dandin. As evident from the title there should be accounts of the adventures of ten princes but the present text contains, with an abrupt beginning, only eight stories in the eight uchchhvasas.

The framework of the narratives is simple. It relates to ten princes, sons of ministers included, who got separated with a plan to meet at Ujjayini again. In the introductory part of the book it has been said that Rajahamsa, the king of Magadha waged a war against Manasara, the king of Malva and he sent his queen to the Vindhya hills for her safety. Rajahamsa was wounded in the battle and was driven away to the Vindhya forest in his chariot. The queen on hearing that her husband has lost his life in the battle prepares for committing suicide but is saved by the timely appearance of the king. There they live in refuge and she bears him a son who is named Rajavahana. Then there are brought nine princes nobles and kings who had suffered similar misfortune. At that time the king is taken to the netherland and the princes start looking for them; they return after their adventures and meet at Ujjayini, as planned earlier and each prince narrates his experiences.

The Dashakumaracharita is a fascinating imaginative fiction, that can compare well with any fiction of modern age. The people we meet in this fictional work are true to life, free from virtuosity and are, realistic, practical and purposive. The caricatures of the various classes of people are so innocent and impersonal that even the targets would not feel wounded.

Though the subject-matter of this book consists of different stories, yet the author has woven the stories in such an artistic manner that the whole becomes a single unit. It has beautiful descriptions such as those of the goddess Vindhyavasini and princess Kandukavati performing ball-play in a dance style. The different stories are so interlocked that the flow of one story into another is smooth. The language and the style of the romance is simple and elegant, free from long and cumbersome compounds and words of double meaning. But at the same time it is not a bare narration. There are various kinds of similies and other forms of figures of speech which add to the charm of the language and the narration. In one of the stories, the narrator is bitten by his beloved passionately, so he is unable to bring the lips together. Dandin has taken trouble to write this particular story without labials; there are also other interesting sidelights.

D.D.S.

DASHAM GRANTH (Hindi/Punjabi). Out of the hundreds of Hindi (Brajabhasha) books transcribed in Gurumukhi script, two are very important. They are Guru Granth Sahib and Dasham Granth. The first one is the collection of the verses composed by the earlier saints whereas the latter is written by the tenth and the last Guru, Gobind Singh.

Dasham Granth is the collection of all the 16 works of the Guru–13 in Hindi, 1 in Punjabi, and 2 in Persian. Out of the total of 1428 pages, only 50 are covered by the three Non-Hindi works. The rest are all in Brajbhasha Hindi.

The Hindi works of the Guru can be classified into– (a) religious, (b) autobiographical, (c) acts of Chandi, (d) avataras, (e) and others. The religious books are Japu, Akalstuti and Jnan Prabodh. Vichitra Natak is the autobiography of Guru Gobind Singh. There are three books about the deeds and life of Chandi, two in Hindi. The Hindi works are Chandi Charit Ukti Vilas and Chandi Charit (the second). The Guru has described the different Avataras and their deeds. The books of the general class are Shasra Nam Mala (names of the weapons) and Upakhyan Charitra (tales about women–their love, valour, recreation and cunningness). Although the Nirguna teachers like Kabir, Nanak, etc. had rejected the Avataras. Guru Gobind Singh accepted and re-established them. His Ramavatar (also known as Gobind Ramayana) and Krishnavatar are important and famous works. He praises other holy persons also and gives them the status of Avatar. By and large, the depiction of the Avataras is in accordance with the Puranas.

Vichitra Natak is an autobiography of the Guru. Gobind Singh.He was a devotee of Kali. He is said to have performed his penance before Naina Devi in the Himalayas. He has written about Chandi or Kali in 3 of his books. Chandi Charita is based totally on Durgasaptashati, and is undoubtedly the best work of the poet. It has 233 verses (one-third of the Saptashati). The metres are mostly 'Dohas' and 'Savayyas'. It is a good combination of 'Bhaktirasa' and 'Virrasa'.

Shastra Mala is a unique book. It describes only weapons. The description of the weapons is quite interesting and at the same time instructive.

Different explanations are given about the Upakhyan Charita. Some critics even doubt its authenticity. Why should a person of Gobind Singh's stature write a book about the vices of women? The Guru perhaps wanted to warn his disciples against this perpetual evil.

As a work of art the Dasham Granth is very important. Its constituents have different values. From the literary point of view, Chandi Charit is the best. It presents a good semblance of devotion and valour. It is rich in imagery and impressive in presentation. The Dasham Granth is a pleasant surprise in the age of decadence. It has proved its utility by arousing the feeling of national honour and also by keeping it alive during these three centuries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D.P. Ashta, Poetry of Dasham Granth; Mahip Singh, Guru Gobind Singh aur unki Hindi Kavita; Prasanni Sehgal, Gobind Singh aur unka Kavya.

S.D.M.

DASHAM GRANTH (Punjabi) is the second religious book of the Sikhs which is considered to be written and compiled by the Tenth Guru, Guru Gobind Singh, the saint–soldier who invoked martial spirit in the nation, slumbering for centuries, by his heroic poetry and the militant movement in Northern India. This Granth consists of 1428 pages containing the following:

1. Japp 2. Akal Ustat 3. Bachittar Natak (Autobiography) 4. Chandi Charitar I 5. Chandi Charitar II 6. Var Sri Bhagauti Ji Ki (Chandi di Var), 7. Gyan Prabodh 8. Chaubis Avtar 9. Braham Avtar 10. Rudra Avtar II. Shabad Hazare (Bishan Pade) 12. Swaya 33, 13. Khalsa Mahima 14. Shaster Naam Mala 15. Charitropakhyan 16. Zafar Nama and Hakaitan. The authentic compilation named Damdama di Bir is placed in the Gurdwara Damdama Sahib, Distt. Bhatinda (Punjab). This was copied by Bhai Mani Singh, the great Martyr of eighteenth century. Damdama Sahib is a seat of learning for the Sikh scripture.

The authorship of this granth is still undecided. Guru Gobind Singh had employed 52 poets in his religious court who had devoted their lives to translating the classical and mythical literature into Braj Bhasha and whatever they versified they attributed it to the name of the Tenth Guru. This fact has created confusion among the research scholars since its compilation. Most of the writing compiled in Anandpur Sahib was swayed away by river Sirsa, while the Guru and his militant companions were crossing to Chamkaur Sahib during their fight against Mughal armies but later on Bhai Mani Singh copied and compiled all the available works under the title Dasham Granth. The controversy over the authenticity of authorship arose because some of the works are considered to be out of tune with those of the warrior and saint-poet like Guru Gobind Singh such as Charitropakhyan, Chaubis Avtar etc. The traditional scholars claim that all the works, compiled in Dasham Granth have been composed by Guru himself on the basis of Bhai Mani Singh's letter, but some scholars refute their claim with the plea that Guru Gobind Singh had no time and inclination to write Charitropakhyan and Chaubis Avtar which contain obscenity and worship of idols. This is contrary to the concept and belief of Sikhism. Most of the writers and research scholars have contributed to this controversy, but they have not come to any final decision and agreed solution.

Joseph Davey Cunningham writes: At Dam-Dama,

Sahila, Guru Gobind Singh remained for some time and he occupied himself in composing the supplementary Granth, 'the book of Tenth King' to rouse the energies and sustain the hopes of the faithful. This comprises the Bachittar Natak or 'Wonderous Tale' the only historical portion of either Granth, and which he concluded by a hymn in praise of God, who had ever assisted him.

The Tenth Guru had a definite mission before him. His authentic works in this Granth are true to the spirit of his mission.

Apart from his autobiographical portion - (Bachittar Natak) - in all other works he is against idolism and believes only in Almighty God who always stands by the side of Truth. Guru Gobind Singh combined Bhakti and Shakti in one, as these are the combined forces which can shatter the reign of the devil. His verses are rhymed in martial prosody and militant tunes. The following prayer is famous all over the world:

O God give me blessings
To stand by good deeds.
I shall fight fearlessly with the enemies
And with God's blessing
Victory certainly will be mine.

He had the mastery of many languages. His rich command over Hindi and Braj is fully borne out in Japp, Swayey and other literary works. Zafar Nama (letter of victory) is considered a land-mark in Persian poetry. Chandi di Var and only a Shabad are available in Punjabi. In his Var he was applauded the role of power (sword). Truth alone is not enough, it must be supplemented by sword. He has given a masterly Usta touch to his Vani, particularly in Jaap, Swayey and Akal Usta. He fully believed in the doctrine that pen and sword should be hand in glove with each other, and he lived to its spirit. He was an expert in both these crafts. His poetry infuses a martial spirit and will always inspire posterity.

The Charitaropakhyan comprising 404 tales is a major portion of the Dasham Granth. According to J.C. Oman, the dramatic encounter of Guru Gobind Singh with Anup Kaur - a charming widow - led him to plan some such tales of wiles of women, as could fore-warn his Sikhs. He knew that 'purity of character and strength of character are the two important pillars on which noble character can rest secure. The presence of both of them is essential in the personality of a virtuous man, as they are supplementary to each other'. These stories can be broadly divided into four categories (a) Stories connected with sex (b) dealing with love (c) depicting heroic deeds (d) general tales. Most of these stories are borrowed from the Mahabharata and the Puranas, retold with certain modifications. "The most important factor, which enhances its artistic significance is the craft or technique with which the stories have been written. They have a particular and a new pattern of story-telling".

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Cunningham, History of the Sikhs, S.Chand & Co., Delhi, 1955., J.C. Oman, The Mystics, Ascetics and Saints of India., Pyara Singh, Palan Kalam de Dhani, Sardar Sahit Bhavan, Patiala, 1971, Rattan Singh Jaggi, Dasam Granth Kartritav, Punjabi Sahit Sabha, Delhi 1966.

K.S.K.

DASHAPADI (Marathi) is an anthology of poems by Anil (Atmaram Raoji Deshpande) published in 1976. It contains thirtynine poems, each of ten lines, written during 1959 to 1974. Of these, thirteen were already published in the poet's earlier anthology entitled Sangati. In the introductory discussion entitled 'Dashapadi-Darshan' the poet comments upon the form of Dashapadi, which is a continuous stanza of ten lines constituting no break-up in the structure of the poem as a whole. The poet is neither very rigid regarding the use of the specific metre, nor is he particular about the number of syllables in a line. Except for the sign of exclamation at the end of every poem, he scrupulously avoids using all other punctuation marks. Different sorts of 'Yamakas', alliteration, the repetition of words, cycles of resonance and the abundant use of 'Manavata' and 'Premjeevan' metres are worth studying from the stylistic point of view.

The diction and the subject matter of the poems constitute an inseparable whole and lend aesthetic value to the poems. Vijaya Rajadhyaksh's interview with the poet entitled 'Padacharya' helps in understanding the poet's approach.

Both these articles are followed by the poems, appendix, giving details about the place, time of creation of each poem and the name of the metre.

These poems reveal the varied and the subtle moods of the poet. The two major sources of inspiration of this poetry are love and nature. Some poems express his moods of melancholy and emptiness created by the death of his wife. In some poems his passion for love emerges from the past love experience, while in some other love-poems love transcends the limits of affection for one particular individual and becomes the poet's love for life in general. Feeling of loneliness pervades the poem 'Ekaki', 'Tuzyavina Lahari' and 'Priti'. His poetic expressions are replete with beautiful images.

The poems like 'Anibani', 'Ekaranga' present a different pageant of happy feelings and as such are in tune with his usual attitude towards love and life.

In poems like 'Ushiracha Paus', 'Lavanya', 'Tadatmata', the poet looks at love from the objective angle. In them we have a charm of another variety. Nature is a part of his aesthetic experience. Poems like 'Talyakathi', are very rich in non-sensuous beauty. In poems like 'Sath', 'Gatarth', 'Punha' the poet comments on the creation of poetry.

In poems like 'Halant', 'Natak', 'Jeevan' the poet dwells on the significance of life.

The survey of these poems convinces us of the unique quality of their expression. Dashapadi received Sahitya Akademi award in the year 1977.

M.J.

DASHARATHI (Telugu; b. 1927) has been in the forefront of Telugu literature for over three decades. Born in Gudur in Warangal distt., Dashararthi Krishnamacharya had his early initiation into Sanskrit studies at home and developed into an ardent lover of poetry in Urdu, which he studied at school. At an early age, Dasharathi plunged into the struggle against Nizam's rule and was arrested several times. His poetry from the early stage is marked by a spirit of protest against political and social injustice and the imagery of fire dominates a large part of his poetry. The title of his first collection of poems, Agni Dhara (Torrent of fire, 1949) symbolises the fire of anger in him. But all through his poetry flow the two streams of romanticism and revolutionism: his poetry abounds in images of shimmering sensuous beauty as also of the scorching heat of anger. His early poetry is written mostly in classical metres, but the themes chosen by him are revolutionary in content and progressive in outlook. Expressing himself powerfully on the side of the tiller, he declared that the land really belonged to the tiller and not to the 'Old Jackal', the Nizam. The intense love of the poet for the land of his birth, Telangana ('My Telangana is a million-jewelled Veena') has always been strong in his poetry. But the love eventually outgrew the narrow regionalism and included the whole Telugu-speaking land, the whole of India and even the whole of the world where man was able to hold his head high, irrespective of the colour of his skin.

The poet's patriotism first found its expression in Mahandhrodayam (Birth of Larger Andhra, 1955), in which he welcomed the ushering in of Andhra Pradesh knitting together the three crore Telugus in one state. At the termination of the rule of the Nizam and the fulfilment of his dream of creation of a large Telugu state, the poet turned his attention to social inequality. Simultaneously, the poet composed some of his sweet love songs and romantic lyrics in Punarnavam, (1956), and Amritabhishekam, (1960). A lyric, like Achumbitam (The Unkissed), was the most popular with the youth in the fifties. Highly evocative descriptions of Urvasi, the downpour of nectar, appear in these volumes, along with exploration of the interplay of light and darkness. In Maha Bodhi (1959) the poet retold the Jataka tales about the Buddha. The title of a collection of his poems, Kavitapushpakam, 1966 is symbolic of catholicity of his poetic taste, which welcomed all that is new and worthwhile in poetic utterance and human experience. He admired the peerless similes of Kalidasa and the poetic images of Lorca; he expressed his unbounded sympathy for the soldier, Abdul Hamid, who laid down his life, and admiration for James Meredith, the first coloured person to graduate from the Mississipi University.

The poet's determination to fight the forces of darkness appears again in Tamiram to Samaram (Duel with Darkness 1973), which won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1974. He is still a revolutionary at this stage and wishes to fold up his pen and take up the gun instead, declaring that 'the life which carries on the duel with darkness is immortal indeed'. But by the time he wrote his latest collection of verses, Alochana Lochanalu (Thoughtful Eyes, 1975) a certain maturity of attitude towards revolution can be noticed. Now, he does not advocate wholesale import of ideas of revolt from an alien soil and realises that 'true revolution blossoms inside the meadows of the minds'. To him, the true revolutionary is not a Lenin or a Stalin but Gandhiji.

At this stage, the poet also enters into a mood of intense introspection in poems like Kotham (who am I?) in which, after resolving the dichotomy of the practical and idealist pulls, announces, 'I seek to wield the pen/but dream instead with the pen'. Moving from political generalities to personal poignancies, from the topical to the timeless, the poet seeks to celebrate 'the shout of awakening' in the human soul.

Apart from his voluminous poetic output, Dasharathi earned lasting reputation as a competent translator of the ghazals of Mirza Ghalib and several poems in Persian by poets like Bahadur Shah Jafar and Mir Taqui Mir. He introduced into Telugu poetry the ghazal and rubai traditions. Dasharathi is also a successful lyrist for the movies with over two thousand lyrics to his credit. Among the honours received may be mentioned Tamra Patra award in 1972, the honorary doctoral degrees from the Andhra University (1975), Agra University, (1976), S.V. University, (1981), awards from the State and Central Sahitya Akademis (1967 & 1974). He was installed as the Poet Laureate of Andhra Pradesh in 1977 and also invited as a visiting Professor at S.V. University, Tirupati. A graduate in English Literature, Dasharathi has mastery over Hindi, Urdu, Persian, Sanskrit and Telugu.

S.S.P.R.

DASHARUPAKA (Sanskrit) is a treatise on dramaturgy by Dhananjaya, son of Vishnu, produced in the last quarter of the 10th century A.D. during the reign of Vakpatiraja II 974-995 A.D. also called Munja, Utpaladeva, Amoghavarsha, Prithvivallabha, or Shrivallabha of Paramara dynasty and ruler of Dhar in central India. Poet Dhanika, who wrote a gloss, avaloka, on this work was also patronised by Vakpatiraja.

Based on Bharata's Natyashastra, Dasharupaka is a good compendium in concise form covering the various aspects of drama. The treatment of theatrical art and architecture as well as performing arts like music and dance is kept out of the purview of this work. Dhananjaya strictly adheres to Bharata for terminology and definitions with some minor innovations.

Of the four sections comprising the text, the first lays down the fundamental definitions of natya, nritya and nritta; sub-divisions of the subject-matter and its treatment in a play; the elements of the plot; the five stages of action and the five junctures. Section II defines the characteristics of the hero, the heroine and other dramatis personae. Section III defines and illustrates ten types of rupakas; and section IV has discussions on rasa, noteworthy among which is Dhananjaya's refutation of suggestion (Vyanjana) and his leaning towards the theory of Bhattanayaka and Tatparya vritti. In this respect, Sharadatanaya is guided by Dhananjaya in his Bhavaprakashana (or-prakasha), another important work in the field of dramaturgy.

R.T.

DASOPANT (Marathi; b. 1551, d. 1615). The most voluminous writer in the history of Marathi literature, Dasopant appeared on the scene when Marathi literature was limping and groping in search of its lost identity after a lapse of nearly two centuries coinciding with the conquest of Maharashtra by Muslim rulers. He was a contemporary of another illustrious literary figure, saint Eknath, who revived the Bhakti cult of Maharashtra founded by Saint Jnaneshvar.

Born at Narayanpeth in Andhra Pradesh, Dasopant was married in an early age. His father Digambarpant being a Deshpande was responsible for collection of land revenue of his allotted area. Because of severe famine he once could not remit 2 lakhs of rupees in the state treasury. The rulers of Bider took Dasopant as ransom and asked his father to make good the land revenue within a month, failing which his only married son would have to embrace Islam.

This solitary confinement at Bidar for one month proved a turning point in the life of Dasopant who after his release quietly left his home in search of the greater authority, controlling the destiny of mankind.

His search was rewarded after a period of two decades or so and Dasopant finally settled at Ambajogai (Mominabad, Dist. Bid, Maharashtra) now a taluq place associated with antiquated legends pertaining to the Nath Siddhas.

Dasopant, an ardent devotee of Lord Dattatreya, had a varied and rich literary career. All his writings put together would amount to at least 5 lakhs of coupiets and songs. Unfortunately very insignificant part of his entire writings has been published. A few chapters of Gitarnava–a commentary on Bhagavatgita running upto one lakh and a quarter of couplets of Ovi metre, some Adhyayas (Chapters) of Gitarth Chandrika, another commentary on the Gita, running upto nine thousand couplets, only a thousand of his one lakh and odd pada compositions, Granthraj, Prabodhadaya and Panchikaran Pasodi (this work of 1600 couplets is written by the author on a piece of cloth, The origin and expanse of the universe has been illustrated through various figures in this work.) are so far published and efforts are being made by researchers to publish the rest of his writings. His Sanskrit commentary of Ish, Kena and Kath Upanishadas, has also been published by the Anandashram series of Pune.

His writings unmistakably reveal that he was a profound scholar of music. His many compositions in a variety of musical modes (Ragas) testify to this. He composed Hindi, Telugu and Kannda songs with equal felicity. Being socially conscious, he wrote many 'Bharudas', pieces which can be enacted and staged in the folk dance, drama style.

Dasopant had a great love for the Marathi language. In spite of his profound scholarship in Sanskrit, Dasopant preferred to write in Marathi. He was an independent thinker and a critical observer of the society. Although he followed the line of Advaita philosophy as preached by Shankaracharya, he denounced the theory of Karma Sanyas, renunciation of action. A man renouncing Karma, according to him, was a burden for the Universe.

Dasopant has developed his own style. He believes more in his own experiences and independent thinking. Says he, 'whatever I write is the result of my own contemplation. I do not write either to suit a particular school or to please the audience. Those who do not find this palatable, can as well ignore my writing.'

Dasopant, with his profound scholarship, rich and chaste vocabulary, social consciousness and literary style of his own, has made a mark in the Marathi literature.

S.R.K

DASTAN (Kashmiri) is one of the oldest and the most popular forms of Kashmiri Folk literature. Though a form of great potential it has remained un-noticed as an independent literary form. Only some ground work has been done in this connection so far.

Dastan is basically a combination of prose and verse. Super-natural element constitutes its very backbone. It is this element which separates Dastan from other common stories but at the same time super-natural element opens new vistas for the free play of imagination in a Dastan .

Normally a Dastan is not a single story but a series of short and long stories revolving round a particular theme or the main characters of a Dastan but we come across Dastans of a single plot also. In this connection 'Akanandun' deserves particular attention.

In its temper, treatment and plot Dastan is very close to romance. Dastan has some thing peculiar about its presentation. Its prose portion is narrated by the 'Dastango' himself, who is helped by one of his colleagues. The versified portion is sung in the form of a chorus. Musical instruments used during the course of presentation include Sarangi, Noot (earthen pot) Rabab and Thal (Cymbals); Thaleg is now replaced by harmonium.

Hee-Mal, Akanandun, Lal Majnoon, Lal Mal Pari, Sherin Farhad, Zuhrakhatoon and Gulbakavali are the well known 'Dastans' in Kashmiri folk literature.

Hee-Mal and Akanandun have their origin in the remote past of Kashmir, while other Dastans have been adopted through the Persian source.

Hee-Mal and Akanandun both attract a large number of listeners or viewers throuth Radio and T.V. even today. Hee-Mal reflects the cultural synthesis between Aryans and the Nagas, which was taking place in the happy valley in the pre-historic era.

It is a story of an Aryan Princess and a Naga Prince. This Dastan can help anthropologists in determining the racial character of Kashmir. This Dastan has its parallels in the Folk stories of Kamrupa and Baltic Republic of the U.S.S.R.

Akanandun is, as a matter of fact, an allegory of high order, in which 'Yogi' stands for over-soul and Akanandun, the main character, for the individual soul.

'Dastans' adopted from external sources have undergone a severe change. In characterisation these Dastans have little in common with the original. In certain cases some new characters have been added and some have been dropped.

If utilised as an independent form of creative literature, Dastan has a great potential and wide appeal. It has survived through oral tradition so far but now its survival is in danger as professional Dastangos are relinquishing the trade by and by. Some of the well known Dastangos of recent past include Subhan Shah (Darigan) Wali Agur (Kulgam), Satrjanda (Watta Kullo), Mukhta-Mir (Chivdara) and Jia Lal (Mahanoor). Ismail Mir of Muja Gund is the most popular Dastango of the present day.

Moti Lal 'Saqi' (born 1936, Srinagar) is the first creative writer who used Dastan for the first time as his medium of expression. His Dastan namely Posha Madun is a combination of opera and traditional Dastan'. It was presented before an invited audience by A.I.R., Srinagar, in April 1982 and was later broadcast from Radio. This Dastan won for its author laurel from discerning critics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din Muhammad, Kashmiri Lok-Katha Vol. I, II, III (Srinagar 1969, 70, 71); M.A. Stein-Hatams talks (Calcutta 1932); Pushkar Bhan, Dalila (Srinagar. 1965).

Mo.S

DASTAN (Urdu) has been an important form of Urdu prose. It is one of the three most important varieties of Urdu fiction, the other two being novel and short story. In popular concept dastan is regarded as a long work of fiction of the old type. This presumption should be examined in depth. Length in itself cannot determine the basic character of any form. Most of the tales of Baital Pachchisi and Singhasan Battisi are dastans. The Arabian Nights has numerous dastans like stories of medium length. Thus length is not an inseparable, inbred characteristic of dastan.

An overwhelming proportion of dastans abounds in supernatural elements, so much so that supernaturalism is considered a natural essential of dastan. But even this is not so. The biography of the first dervish in Bagh-o-Bahar or the tale of 'Sleeping awaking Abul Hasan' in Arabian Nights are good dastans by any standard but they are devoid of any supernatural element. Thus this too, gets ruled out as a basic ingredient of dastan.

Dastan may be called 'romance' in English. This denotes the main character of dastan. It is unreal and romantic. Its human characters are not of the type we meet in daily life. Its episodes are not such that can happen in our society. While modern fiction tries to depict life as it is, dastan tends to be far removed from reality. In spite of its supernatural and romantic character, it abounds in the depiction of human and humane feelings. Dastans are very rich in the portrayal of natural scenery also but the chief importance and relevance of dastans rests on two factors:

They are very rich in presenting various aspects of the contemporary culture of the upper classes. The garments, the ornaments, the embellishments of the buildings, the interior decorations, the variegated cuisine, the trappings of the palace and the court, the components of the royal procession etc., all are listed. Side by side, the non-material culture also finds the pride of place. Music, dance, arts, superstitions and religious beliefs are amply presented.

They are a stylist's paradise. The author of the dastan craves for recognition as a master prose-writer. He does not take pride in being a good story-teller, as most of the Urdu dastans have been translated from Persian and sometimes from Hindi. The masterpieces of Urdu prose style can be found only in dastans.

The dastan form of literature has evolved from the oral tale-telling of the professional narrators. In Arab countries and in Iran there have been popular narrators. An Iranian narrator was employed by the emperor Jahangir. Story telling was an art, something resembling mono-acting. It reached its zenith in the 19th century in Lucknow and Rampur. While it was popular in Delhi and Lucknow bazars, the post-mutiny rulers of Rampur were great patrons of oral dastan narrators. The last and the best known dastan narrator has been Mir Bagar Ali Dastango of Delhi. These courtly dastangos were scholarly people with encyclopaedic knowledge who used to compose the dastans according to the leaning of their patrons. If they recited in public places, they did so to collect money from the spectators.

The Deccani period of Urdu literature is not rich in prose. Most of the Deccani prose literature is religious, mystic or didactic. There are, however, a few dastans in Deccan also, the most outstanding of which is Sabras written by Mulla Wajhi in 1635-36. Asad-ul-Lah Wajhi was a towering literary figure of the Golconda court. He composed the famous masnavi Qutb Mushtari in 1018 and wrote another prose work Taj-ul-Haqaiq. Sabras was edited by Maulvi Abdul Haq in 1932. It is an allegorical mystical romance translated from the Persian masnavi Dasture Ushshaq and Husn-O-Dil of Muhammad Yahya Ibne Saibak, written about two centuries earlier.

Sabras is a master piece of ornate prose style. Wajhi is given to prolongation and elaboration. A sequence of rhymed phrases in a sentence is his favourite. Besides, he inserts long essays into the plot.

A few other manuscripts of Deccani dastans are found in the libraries of Hyderabad, Paris and London, a common feature of all being that neither the name of the author, nor their date is known. They seem to have been written in 18th or the early 19th century. Their names are Qissa-e-Jange Amir Hamza, Qissa-e-Anar Rani, Qissa-e-Kamroop Kamlata, Qissa-e-Malka Zamano Kam Kundla, Qissa-e-Gulo Hurmuz, Qissa-e-Dallala Mukhtala and Singhasan Battisi.

In Northern India, Urdu prose was not much in vogue in the 18th century. We come across just four dastans in this century which together with one other book, form the whole prose literature of this century. The first and foremost in importance is Qissa-e-Mehr Afroz-o-Dilbar by Isvi Khan written in the middle of 18th century. Nobody knew of this work until it was brought to light, edited and published by Masud Husain Khan in 1966, from a lone manuscript found in Gwalior. He could not establish the identity of the author. It was left to a new researcher Prakash Moonis of Bijnor to identify this mysterious author. Nawab Isvi Khan was a noble in the court of Raja Chhatr Singh of Narwar, a tiny princely state near Gwalior. Basically a Hindi writer, Isvi Khan is the author of Brajras Chandrika, a commentary on Bihari's Sat-sai. As Brajras Chandrika was written in 1752, the Urdu Qissa too might be of about the same period.

The importance of Qissa-e-Mehr Afroz-o-Dilbar lies in that it bears the imprint of Hindi, Braj to be more exact, language and literature to the extent that no other Urdu work does. It is unique in its own style, its diction resembling the Braj prose Ras Chandrika. It abounds in all the details expected of a good dastan. Its later half consists of didactic advices in the fashion of Persian works like Anwar Suhaili. The second notable dastan in Nau Tarz-e-Murassa written by Mir Muhammad Husain Ata Khan Tahsin of Itawa. The author wanted to present this dastan to Shuja-ud-Daula but the later died in 1775. Then the author presented it to his successor Asif-ud-Daula. Thus we can safely conclude that the dastan was completed in 1775 itself. It is the story of four dervishes derived from some Persian source. Its importance lies in the fact that it is the source of the great classic, Bagh-o-Bahar of Mir Amman. Its laboured ornate style is laden with Arabic and Persian. It abounds in metaphors to the extent of being terse and artificial. Its best edition, edited by Nur-ul-Hasan Hashimi was published in 1958.

An important but lesser known dastan is Mehr Chand Khatri Mehr's Nau Ain-e-Hindi, better known as Qissa-e-Malik Muhammad Gaiti Afroz. It was written in 1203 or 1208). This pleasant fairy tale is written in a lucid, simple, idiomatic style which is considered to be the gift of the Fort William College. Much before that Mehr wrote in a diction which holds good upto the present times. The plot has been borrowed from Persian. Later Rajab Ali Beg 'Suroor' also wrote this story through in a somewhat twisted form.

The last dastan of the 18th century was Jazb-e-Ishq by Shah Husain Haqiqat.

The Fort William College, Calcutta is a landmark in Urdu dastan writing. The British required simple easy texts to teach Urdu to the officials from Britain. As Urdu had not such works they got them specially prepared. The Persian dastans came in handy and they were translated into Urdu. There are many writers and many more dastans produced by the college but notable are only the following:

Dastan-e-Amir Hamza by Khalil Ali Khan 'Ashk'. The source of this dastan is some Persian work. The Urdu translation was completed in 1801, and published in 1803.

Bagh-o-Bahar by Mir Amman. It was written in 1801 and published in 1803. Mir Amman is the greatest maestro of Urdu prose and Bagh-o-Bahar is the top work. Its source is Tahsin's Urdu work Nau Tarze Murassa as well as some Persian versions of Qissa-e-Chahar Darvesh. Mir Amman wrote in the preface of his work that the story was the creation of Amir Khusrau. Mahmood Shirani in 1933 proved that the story was not older than 18th century. He maintained that Muhammad Ali Masum Ali Khan was its first author who wrote it in 1733. Gian Chand discovered an older version of 1712 in Maulana Azad Library, Aligarh and disproved Shirani's thesis. The prose style of Bagh-o-Bahar represents perfection of lucid and idiomatic prose. Nobody could imitate it. This work is also very rich in descriptions of the culture of Mughal aristocracy.

Another version of Qissa-e-Chahar Darvesh is by Muhammad Ghous Zarrin, completed in 1803. It is a slim work with little literary worth. Zarrin wrote it in Lucknow.

No other author in Fort William College Calcutta, comes anywhere near Mir Amman. The second best known writer is Hyder Baksh Hyderi. His famous work is Araish Mehfil written in 1801 and published in 1805. Derived from Persian it narrates seven expeditions of Hatim Tai. Hyderi's other works are Qissa-e-Mehr-o-Mah, Qissa-e-Laila Majnun and Tota Kahani, a collection of short tales.Hyderi too writes in lucid style but is not idiomatic like Amman. Mir Bahadur Ali Husaini rendered 'Masnavi Mir Hasan' in prose. He named it Nasr-e-Be Nazir, completed in 1802 and published in 1803.

Like Chahar Darvesh, Qissa-e-Gul Bakavali is another famous tale in Urdu. Its Urdu prose version Mazhab-e-Ishq by Nihalchand Lahori was written in 1803, and published 1804. Its source is the Persian prose work of Izzat-ul-lah (Bengali, 1134). The most famous Urdu version of this tale is Masnavi Gulzar-e-Nasim by Dayashankar Nasim. Like other famous dastans, the original Persian author and the date of the first version of this tale are not known, but internal evidence points out that it was written in India. The prose of Mazhab-e-Ishq is not so lucid. The author tends to use similies and metaphors but does not write in a smooth style.

Beni Narayan Jahan was a late entrant in Fort William College Calcutta. He wrote many dastans none of which went into print. Found in manuscript form are Chahar Gulshan (1225.). Nau Bahar) i.e., Gul Sanobar (1824) and Bagh-e-Ishq) i.e. Laila Majnu in the same year. His brother Khem Narayan Rind wrote Afsana-e-Jan-o-Dil, also known as Chahar Bagh.

Mention may be made of three dastans at least two of which are claimed by Urdu as well as Hindi. They may be regarded as a bridge between the two languages.

Qissa-e-Madhavanal Kamkundla was translated by Mazhar Ali Wila and Lallu Lal in 1801. Strangely enough Wila thought that his source book was written in Braj by Moti Kavi. Prakash Moonis proved that it was a fallacy. There has been no Moti Kavi to author this legend. Alam's Avadhi poem has been the source of Wila. The Urdu version was published by Ibadat Brelvi in 1965. The other work is Shakuntala by Kazim Ali Javan and Lallu Lal written in 1801 and published in 1804. Its immediate source is the Braj work of Nawaj Kavi. The third and the most important work is Insha's Rani Ketki Ki Kahani written outside the Fort William College, Calcutta Its date is not known but it might have been composed before 1808. The striking feature of this work has been that the author took upon himself not to use any Persian, Arabic or difficult Hindi word. Thus this book can be termed to be a Hindustani work. Its plot is a supernatural romance.

Two other works Singhasan Battisi and Baital Pachchisi translated in the Fort William College, Calcutta are common properties of Urdu and Hindi. They are collections of short tales.

Hakim Muhammad Baksh Mahjoor wrote Insha-e-Gulshan-e-Naubahar at Lucknow in 1220. It was published in 1845. Its importance lies in the fact that it inspired Suroor's Fasana-e-Ajaib. After Mir Amman, Mirza Rajab Ali Beg 'Suroor' at Lucknow is the most important dastan writer. He completed his Fasana-e-Ajaib in 1240 and revised it in 1243. As Bagh-o-Bahar is considered the best prose work of Delhi, Fasana-e-Ajaib is regarded as the true representative of the prose style of Lucknow School. Suroor has satirised Mir Amman in the preface of his work. As Suroor could not match the lucid idiomatic style of Amman, he had an ornate style with difficult Arabic and Persian diction, full of similies and metaphor. Fasana-e-Ajaib is also very rich in depiction of the royal culture of Avadh. The second work of Suroor is Shagufa-e-Muhabbat, written in 1856. Its direct source is Mehr Chand Khatri's Urdu dastan Qissa-e-Malik Muhammad Gaiti Afroz. The third dastan of Suroor is Gulzar-e-Suroor translated in 1276, from the Persian prose work Hadaiqul Usshaq by Mulla Razi Tabrezi. Gulzar-e-Suroor is an allegorical work on the lines of Sabras. Another work of Suroor is Shabistan-e-Suroor, precis of Alif Laila (One Thousand and one Nights), written in 1276.

As Suroor had satirised Mir Amman of Delhi in the preface of Fasana-e-Ajaib. Syed Fakhr-ud-Din Husain Sukhan of Delhi wrote Sarosh-e-Sukhan in 1276 in reply to Suroor. It was published in 1281. As a counter reply Jafar Ali Shewan of Kakauri wrote Tilasm-e-Hairat in 1872,. (published next year). All the three works in this series are original dastans written in the same style though the later two are no match to Fasana-e-Ajaib. Another important dastan of this period is Gul Sanobar by Nem chand Khatri written and published in 1836. This popular tale from Persian has been worked upon by many Urdu writers and poets among whom Namchand's work is the best.

The Arabic fictional masterpiece Alif Laila (One Thousand and one Nights) has been translated by many Urdu writers in many versions. The more important are: Alif Laila by Abdul Karim translated in 1842 and published in 1847, Shabistan-e-Suroor by Suroor, Hazar Dastan by Hamid Ali Khan, Nawal Kishore Press (Lucknow), Alif Laila in 2 volumes by Ratan Nath 'Sarshar' published in 1901, unpublished version of Dwarkaprasad Ufuq Lucknawi completed in 1912, spread over 6331 pages and lying in Raja Ramkumar Depot, Lucknow, seven volumes translation by Abul Hasan Mansur Ahmad published by Anjumanu. Taraqq-e-Urdu from 1940 to 1946. The source of these translations is either Arabic or English.

In conclusion, the more important of these is Dastan-e-Amir Hamza. This is not the name of a particular work. This is a big dastan written and expanded by various writers as they chose. The hero of the adventures and expeditions is Amir Hamza, uncle of Prophet Muhammad. The first Urdu version of this dastan is Dastan-e-Amir Hamza by Khalil Alikhan 'Asht' translated from Persian and published in 1803 by Fort William College. It has been given in the preface of this work that Faizi, the scholar of Emperor Akbar's time wrote it but Gian Chand Jain has proved that it existed before Faizi. Bahar, the 19th century poet laureate of Iran had written in his book Sabk Shanasi volume I, that the real hero of this dastan was another Hamza Khariji who fought against Haroon-ul-Rashid. His disciples wrote the account of his travels and expeditions in a book Maghazi-e-Amir Hamza and that is the original source of Dastan-e-Hamza.

More than 100 volumes lie in the state library of Rampur in manuscript form by different authors. The more important among them are Hakim S. Asghar Ali, Amba Prasad Rasa, Ghulam Raza, Hyder Mirza Tasauwur and Mirza Alim-ud-Din. In Nawal Kishore Press, Lucknow three Munshis were notable, Sheikh Tasadduq Husain, Muhammad Husain Jah and Ahmad Husain Qamar. First they wrote dastans in seven daftars, each daftar containing several tomes. Then they expanded them making 46 tomes, each with more than a thousand pages. The most important of these is Tilism-e-Hoshruba containing eight tomes and written by Jah and Qamar. This is the ultimate in sorcery and the supernatural. The magicians are like demigods but they fall before the knights of Isalm. This dastan is an encyclopaedia of the upper class culture of Lucknow. Jah was a master of prose second to none while Qamar concentrated on the plot. The Dastans were published by Nawal Kishore Press between 1893 and 1905. The other colossal dastan is Bustan-e-Khayal. It was written in Persian by Muhammad Taqikhayal in 1170. This too has been favourite with Urdu dastan writers. The two important Urdu translation series are: Delhi translation by Khwaja Badr-ud-Din 'Aman and others, in eight enormous tomes written and published by 1858. and 1881 Bustan-e-Khayal is a poor imitation of Dastan-e-Hamza.

Sabras, Bagh-o-Bahar, Fasana-e-Ajaib and Tilism-e-Hoshruba are the four outstanding dastans in Urdu.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Gian Chand, Urdu ki Nasri Dastanaen., Prakash Moonis, Urdu Adab par Hindi Adab ka Asar., Syed Muhammad, Arbab-e-Nasr-e-Urdu.

G.J.

DATTA, ACHYUTANANTHA (Maithili; b. 1898, d. 1944). Datta is remembered as one of the Datta brothers along with his brother Paramananda Datta who was also a Maithili poet. He was a prolific writer who worked under the patronage of Ramlochan Sharan of Pustak Bhandar at Laheriaserai where officially he spent some years editing a children's Hindi magazine called Balaka and generally looking after the literary commitments of the Bhandar.

As a Maithili writer he is chiefly known as a translator of Sanskrit classics like the Mahabharata (1931) and the Raghuvamsha (1938) in chaste verse. Many of his works are still in manuscript, such as, the translations of Prasanna-Raghava, Bhaminivilasa and Ritusamhara and long poems like 'Pativrta Mahima Batahi', 'Krishna Charitra', 'Karna' and 'Kamsabadha'. A few stray pieces out of these were published occasionally in the contemporary magazines.

J.M.

DATTA, AJIT (Bengali; b. 1907 d. 1979) was one of the 'Kallol' group of poets. His first poetic efforts between 1926-30 were published in Prajati, jointly by him and Buddhadev Basu from Dacca, and in kallol. His first book of poems kusumer Mas (Month of the Flowers) on being published in 1930, immediately came to the notice of the discerning reader. His subsequent collections of poems are: Patal Kanya (Damsel of the nether world, 1938), Nasta Chand (Unchaste Moon, 1945), Punaraba (Again New, 1946), Chhandar Boi (Book of Rhymes, 1950), Chayar Alpana (Chiarosuro, 1951), Janala (widow, 1959), and finally Sada Megh Kalo Pahar (White Clouds Black Hills, 1971). His collected poems were published in 1964, and the selected poems in 1970. His poems are too dreamy and full of romance to be fully modern in temper. He was, however, one of the most successful practitioners of sonnet form in Bengali.

He also published two collections of personal essays and edited Diganta, and annual anthology. His only book of criticism is Bangla Sahitye Hasyaras (Humour in Bengali Literature, 1960). He retired as Professor of Bengali, Jadavpur University in 1970.

As.S

DATTA, AKSHAY KUMAR (Bengali; b. 1820, d. 1886) was an eminent Bengali essayist and text-book writer. Akshay kumar started his literary career as a poet and published a book of verse at the age of fourteen. Soon, however, he gave up poetry and distinguished himself as a powerful prose writer and cloumnist in the journals Sambad-Prabhakar edited by Iswarchandra Gupta. He attracted the notice of Debendranath Tagore and became a member of the Tattvabodhini Sabha, an association for the propagation of the Brahmo religious ideas in 1939. He was appointed a teacher in the school managed by this association and wrote two text-books: Bhugol (Geography, 1941) and Padartha-Vidya (Physics, 1946) to meet the need of the sutdents.

In 1843 Akshaykumar was chosen as the editor of the Tattvabodhini, a literary journal published by the Tattvabodhini Sabha under the supervision of Debendranath Tagore. This journal published essays on religion and science and archeology, many of which were contributed by Akshaykumar himself. Haraprasad Sastri writes that this magazine "was at that time the missionary of European culture in the whole of Bengal. Akshaykumar Datta was the first writer to introduce western outlook and mentality among the Bengali youths." His essays were later included in Charupath published in three volumes between 1853 and 1859. In these essays Akshaykumar successfully created a flexible medium of expression of scientific thought and concepts and built up a body of terminology many of which were accepted by later writers on scientific subjects.

Akshaykumar was well versed in various branches of science and a man of rational temper. He rejected popular Hinduism and accepted Brahmoism as propunded by Rammohan Ray but his rational approach to religions soon created a bitterness among his colleagues, particularly between him and Debendranath. He persuaded Tagore to reject the doctrine of the infallibility of the Vedas and was actively associated with several reform movements in the nineteenth century. Later in his life he turned into an agnostic. His rational temper finds its strongest manifestation in his work Bahya Bastur Sahit Manab Maner Sambandha Bihcar (1851-52), which derived its inspiration from George Comb's The Constitution of Man. He tried to establish a relationship between the religious and moral laws and human nature on the one hand and the physical laws of the universe on the other.

His other works include Dharma Niti (1856) and Dharmonnati Samsadhan Prastab. His most famous work is Bhartvarsiya Upasak Sampraday (vol. I, 1870) (Vol. II. 1883). This is a detailed account of the various religious sects of India. Though much of its material was derived from H.H. Wilson's Sects of the Hindus, it contains valuable additional information. The greatest achievement of Akshaykumar is his creation of a language for scientific discourse in Bengali. His style is marked by clarity and precision. Though not always very pleasant to read, his prose is balanced and logical, forceful and vivid.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nabendu Sen, Gadya Silpi Akshaykumar Datta O Debendranath Thakur (Calcutta, 1911); S.K. De, Bengali Literature in the Nineteenth Century (Calcutta, 1962),

S.D

DATTA, ARU (English; b. 1854, d. 1874) The gifted elder daughter of Govindachunder Datta, who was himself a linguist and poet, lived her brief span of life in Calcutta, France and England. Her creative period was all too brief. Eight of her renderings from French into English appeared along with her younger sister Toru's collection of poems, in A Sheaf Gleaned from French Field (1877). One of her poems, Morning Serenade, filled the noted English critic, Sir Edmund Gosse, with' surprise and almost repture'. In her verse we come across an unusual ease and grace, an effective command of diction and rhythm, and an unrivalled lyrical ecstasy, from one so young.

K.M.

DATTA, BHABANANDA (Assamese; b. 1918 d. 1959) was an eminent Assamese intellectual. Born in a lower middle class family of the Bajali area of north Kamrup, he graduated from the Cotton College, Gauhati, standing first class first in Philosophy Honours of Calcutta University. He secured first class in Philosophy in M.A. too of the same University in 1944. After teaching for two years in Nalbari College, he left for England for higher studies in 1947 on a government scholarship. After two years he went for an international seminar on the Child Mind in Prague. Bhabananda earned reputation for his role in the seminar and he had to play an active part in the preparation of a report for the UNESCO which had organised this seminar. Coming back in 1949, he joined first the Cotton College and then the University of Gauhati as a lecturer in Philosophy.

Bhabananda was an ardent lover and an advocate of liberty and reason. It is the spirit of liberty that made him a strong supporter of the freedom movement and a fighter for it. He gave one year of his brilliant student career for the freedom of his country after passing B.A. in 1941. The spirit of liberty and reason made him a Marxist too. He stood as an independent candidate for the Lok Sabha in the General Elections of 1951 and 1956, but was defeated both the times.

It is as a leftist thinker that Bhabananda made his mark. A very keen student of philosophy, he wanted reasoned thinking and a philosophical attitude to prevail in the life and activities of the people around him. A secure means of livelihood for all is of course the first condition for such a state. This is the recurring theme of his five essays in English published under the title, Philosophy and India (Gauhati, 1959). Though the manuscript of this book was sent to the press in his life-time, he did not live to see it in print. All his other books, viz. Rabindra Pratibha (Genius of Rabindranath, 1960), Drishti aru Darshan (Outlook and Philosophy, 1963) and Asamiya Kavitar Kahini (Story of the Assamese Poetry, 1969) were collections of his essays scattered in various Assamese periodicals of the forties and fifties of this century, made by his wife Nilima Dutta.

Though a follower of materialistic philosophy as a Marxist, he was not a blind lover of this philosophical system alone. In Drishti aru Darshan, he points out clearly the values of different kinds of philosophy. Nevertheless he laid emphasis on certain aspects of the Upanishadic outlook, the Vedanta, philosophy of Shamkaracharya and the Buddhist philosophy as well. He has analysed Indian philosophy with a scientific outlook against the sociological background of the country pointing out their significance in the present and future. Such an approach to philosophy has made it a book of rare value in Assamese None has written on philosophy with such insight either before or after him.

As a Marxist intellectual, Bhabananda was one of the pioneers who launched a movement against the pre-War Assamese romantic poetry and became instrumental in the establishment of a new trend of Assamese literature. For this he came to be associated with the Assamese monthly Jayanti, with two others. In his zeal to make literature realistic, he advocated the need for a progressive social outlook. For the formation of an anti-romantic, and a progressive school of poetry, he even wrote a few poems. But it is his series of critical essays posthumously published under the title Asamiya Kavitar Kahini which bears real importance in this respect. Criticism in this book of the pre-War romantics and post-War modernists bears also the stamp of a sharp mind that penetrated deep into the social and political background of the Assamese poetry. Bhabananda is the first Assamese critic to analyse Assamese poetry consistently against the background of the Indian society, thus laying the foundation of the sociological approach to literary criticism in Assamese. His analysis of the nationalist poets of the Romantic Age and a few poets of the new age is quite brilliant and refreshing even though some of his observations like those in 'T.S. Eliot and his Assamese Counterparts' and the 'Assamese Romantic Poet Raghunath Chaudhary' may be debatable.

Bhabananda was a very perceptive reader of Rabindranath Tagore. The mark of this is left in the essays in the book, Rabindra Pratibha. The author tries here to understand Rabindranath in his poetry, songs and drama against the influences on him of the Western humanism on one side, and the Indian philosophy on the other. He is the first serious systematic critic of Rabindranath in Assamese.

Though he died at the premature age of 41, Bhabananda Datta remains till today one of the few Assamese intellectuals of the front rank.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anandeswar Sarma, Ejan Khati Buddhijivi: Bhabananda Dattar Smriti, Awahon, 40th. yr., Sahitya Sabha No., 1969; Bani Pathak, Smritir Chhabi: Bhabananda Duttar, Assam Bani, Aug, 1969; Prasannalal Chauddhary, Manishi Bhabananda Dutta, Awahon 40th. yr., 10th. vol. 1970.

G.S.

DATTA, CHARUCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1876, d. 1952) was an accomplished scholar and litterateur. He graduated from the Presidency College, Calcutta, and went to England to compete for the I.C.S. in 1895. There, he came in touch with S.N. Banerjee., Gokhale and Dada Bhai Nauraji. He returned home in 1899 and joined Government service and retire in 1925. During his stay in Bombay he came in contact with Arabinda. And because of his association with Arabinda he was arrested and had been kept under house arrest for two years. He happened to be a judge for the famous Kingsford case. Charuchandra had a great deal of linguistic interest. He, besides his natural aptitude for learning of several Indian dialects, knew at least several other languages. He, however, started his literary career in 1931 when Parichaya, a literary quaterly had been brought out under the editorship of Sudhindranath Datta. His autobiography Puranokatha, was published in Parichaya. A portion of this writing consisting of the events up to 1899, had been published in book form. His story book, Krishna Rao (1933) also had been published in Parichaya. His other literary contributions are Duniyadari (1934), Debaru (1934), Maya (It consists of a long story and a play). Charuchandra had the opportunity to come in close contact with Rabindranath Tagore. Rabindranath took him to Santiniketan to supervise the administration of Visva Bharti.

Na.S

DATTA, DINESHCHANDRA (English; b. 1892, d. 1972) was born in Sylhet (now in Bangladesh). After having passed his M.A. in English with a first class from Calcutta University he worked as a professor of English at Maharaja's College, Jaipur till his retirement. He was an outstanding scholar of various literatures. Besides Sanskrit, he knew intimately about a dozen of languages both Indian and European, classical and modern. He was also actively interested in Indian classical music. He wrote poetry in English and Sanskrit and translated into English poems from various European and Asian languages from the original. His publications in English include Christmas, (1935); Other Verses, (1941); Exegi Monumentum and Lyrics, (1941) and Mango Blossoms and Ashok leaves, (1944). His translated works are: Chandidas, (1941); Vidyapati, (1941) and The Rubaiyat of Abu Said Abul Tahir, (1943). His Sanskrit compositions are: Bhararatagatha, (1943); Subhashgauravam, etc..

Nirm. B.

DATTA, GIRINDRAMOHINI (Bengali; b. 1858, d. 1924) was an eminent poet. She was the daughter of Harendrachandra Mitra and wife of Nareshchandra Datta. She, however did not get much of formal education; but she had her early education in their family run school. She used to get regular encouragement for acquiring higher knowledge form her father and husband; they were the permanent sources of her literary activities also. Her inborn artistic aptitude brought her reputation and recognition. An exhibition of her paintings were held with great success. Her first literary appearance was in 1872 when her Janaika Hindu Mahilar Patravali, a book of correspondence written in poetic style, was published. The first four of the five letters of this book were addressed to her husband and the fifth one, most probably as the critics think, was written to Mahendralal Sarkar. This fifth letter was, perhaps, the same letter which had been published under the same heading as that of the book, in Manasi O Marmabani (1925), a literary monthly. The book, however, is not available in India and its only copy is still extant in India office Library, London. Kavitahar (1873) was written when she was only fourteen years old. This was her first book of poems. This book like the previous one did not bear the author's name, instead there was only 'janaika Hindu lady. Her poetic fame, however, came through her Asrukana (1887 an elegiac piece) written in the memory of her husband who died after prolonged illness in 1884. A gloomy memory intense with deep pathos was very much present in the writings of this book. She had also edited the literary journal Janhavi (1907-09). Following are the literary contributions of Girindramohini Dasi: Bharat bhusan (1882), Abas (1890) Sannyasini Athaba Meerabai (1892), Sikha (1896), Arghya (1902), Swadesini (1905) and Sindhugatha (1907). The last book is a historical drama based on the story from Rajasthan. Girindramohini had written mostly in poetry, except only one book of prose Prabandha Pratibha which was never published in a separate book form, but was included in her collected works, Kabirani Girindramohini Granthavali (1927) published by the Basumati Sahitya Mandir. It contained the following essays: Bisam Sandhya, Chinta Padap, Bhog, Tripathi, Hridaya, Bhasa, Budar Album.

Na.S

DATTA, HIRENDRANATH (Assamese; b. 1937) did his M.A. in English from the University of Calcutta. He has been teaching English literature at the University of Gauhati and is at present, a Reader in the Department. He started writing poetry rather late in life, but he made an immediate impact by the publication of his first poem in a Gauhati journal. He has subsequently published many of his poems and a collection of them in a slender volume. He is not a prolific writer, but whatever he has written so far bears the stamp of a sensitive and cultured mind. His poetry is marked by unusual and impressive imagery, density of form and his own characteristic poetic diction. Though a University man, he generally writes about Nature round the village hamlet and about the common men and his language has taken the idiom of common life, but in the poetic configuration of even common experiences, he has been able to project the tremor and confusions of our age without being cynical. All in all, among the poets of the 60s he occupies a place of distinction. He represented Assamese poetry in the All-India Radio Kavi Sammelan and also attended national poets' conference in Madras.

Nirm.B.

DATTA, HIRENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1868, d. 1942 was a Public servant and eminent scholar. After passing the M.A. examination of the Calcutta University securing top position in the first class in English in 1889, Hirendranath earned the much coveted Premchand Roychand scholarship of the University in 1893. As a student, he had also attained mastery over Sanskrit and Indian philosophy. Passing the B.L. and attroneyship examinations of the University, Hirendranath joined the Calcutta High Court as a solicitor. Early in life, Hirendranath came in contact with Annie Besant (1847-1933) and joined the Indian National Congress in 1894. He took a leading part in the anti-partition and Swadeshi movement in Bengal in the first decade of the present century. He also figured prominently in the 'Home-rule' Movement sponsored by Annie Besant during 1916-18. During the Swadeshi days, Hirendranath helped building up national banks, insurance companies and textile mills. He was also one of the founder members of the National Council of Education started in Calcutta which has since been developed as Jadavpur University. As a disciple of Annie Besant, Hirendranath was drawn to the movement of theosophy and became the Vice-President of the International Theosophical Society and President of the Bengal Theosophical society. Hirendranath was one of the founder members of the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad (Bengal Academy of Literature) founded in 1893. He served the institution till the last day of his life in various capacities. For three terms he was elected president of the Parishad (1926, 1930 and 1937-39). Hirendranath contributed a large number of articles to various journals both in English and Bengali. He also published about 15 books in Bengali and 2 in English. Most of these are based on various aspects of Indian Philosophy, Indian culture and literature. Hirendranath was awarded the 'Jagattarini Gold Medal' for his most distinguished contributions to the Bengali literature by the University of Calcutta in 1939. He was also invited to deliver the much prized Kamala Lectures by the Calcutta University in 1940. Poet Sudhindranath Dutta (1901-1960) one of the founders of the new school of Bengali poetry was Hirendranath's eldest son. Hirendranath was a patron of the Parichaya, a literary journal of distinction which was edited and run by Suddindranath from 1931-1942.

FURTHER WORKS: (Bengali) Gitai Iswarvada, Calcutta, 1905-1906; Upanishad–Brahmatattva, Calcutta, Vedanta Parichaya, Calcutta, 1924-25; Karmavad O janmantar, Calcutta 1925-26; Avtara Tattva, Calcutta 1928-29; Yagnyavalkyer Advaitavad, Calcutta 1936-37; Budhadever Nastikata, 1938; Raslila, Calcutta, 1938-39; Sankhya Parichaya, Calcutta 1938-39.

G.S.

DATTA, MADHUSUDAN MICHAEL (Bengali; b. 1824, d. 1873) is considered to be the greatest Bengali poet of the nineteenth century. He was born in the village

Sagardari which stands on the river Kapotaksi in Jessore now in Bangladesh. He learnt some Persian in the village school and was introduced by his mother to the Bengali Ramayana and the Mahabharata and the medieaval Bengali poems which made a deep impression on him. Around 1833 he came to Calcutta and was admitted to the Hindu College which was then a centre of western learning. Though a spoilt child of a rich father he was a gifted student and showed remarkable proficiency in English. He developed a passionate love for English literature and culture and for a considerable period of his life England was his spiritual homeland. He started writing poems in English some of which were published in contemporary journals in Calcutta. In one such poem he wrote. "I sigh for Albion's distant shore, Its valleys green, its mountains high." This intense desire to "cross the Vast Atlantic wave/For glory or nameless grave" prompted him to embrace Christianity which caused great sensation in Calcutta and eventually changed the course of his life.

In 1844 Madhusudan joined the Bishop's College where he studied Greek and Latin. The intimate knowledge of these two classical literatures regulated his literary taste and partly determined the themes and forms he later introduced in Bengali poetry. Three years later his father stopped helping him and he left for Madras desperately in search of a new life. His Madras days were turbulent, full of misery and suffering, though interspersed with moments of excitement and romance. In 1848 he married Rebecca Mactavis, daughter of a British Indigo-planter, and next year he published Captive ladie, a long narrative poem in English. He earned praise for his metrical skill and felicity of expression. His essay the Anglo-Saxon and the Hindu (1854) is also a fine example of his refined taste and critical acumen. But he finally realised the futility of writing in English and decided to prepare himself for writing in Bengali which he had not only neglected over the years but had almost forgotten by that time; In his private life he was also equally frustrated. His marriage failed. He eloped with Emilia Henerietta, a French woman, and in 1856 returned to Calcutta, helpless and poor, where began the glorious phase of his literary career.

In 1858 when he was commissioned to translate a Bengali play into English, the idea of writing an original play in Bengali occured to him. His friends laughed at him with disbelief, but he accepted the challenge and wrote Sarmistha (1858). Though not a great play it was a stage success and with it began the modern Bengali drama. It was the first attempt to depart from the existing literary traditions and to introduce the European dramatic conventions in Bengali literature. Success of Sarmistha encouraged him to write two delightful farces–Ekei Ki Bale Sabhyata and Buro Saliker ghare Ron and a play entitled Padmavati, an adaptation of the Greek myth of the golden apple, all published in 1860. These two farces are evidence of his remarkable command over the racy and vivid language, his power of observation and his incisive satire. The former is intended chiefly to expose the hollowness of the anglicised Bengali babus, and the latter the hypocrisy and villany of the landlords. Next year he wrote Krishnakumari (1861), a bold experiment with the form of tragedy. His fame as a dramatist rests primarily on the two farces which are among the best in Bengali literature. He wanted to introduce a new content and purpose in Bengali drama. He criticised the Sanskrit drama as all softness and romance and took the Shakespearen drama as his model in which he found the representation of the stern realities and lofty passions of life. He made the Bengali writer conscious of the possibility of using drama as an instrument of social education and criticism as well.

Like his first play, his first epic poem Tilottama Sambhab Kavya (1860) was also written as a challenge. Once he was arguing about the necessity of using blank verse in drama. His friends felt that Bengali was ill suited for that stately measure. He with his usual flippancy challenged them and produced the first canto of the Tilottama Sambhab within a few days. He did not write any of his plays in blank verse but this poem, though not a very fine work, inaugurated a new phase in the history of Bengali poetry in respect of metre and form. This epic narrates the story of two demon brothers, Sunda and Upasunda, involved in a mortal duel to win the love of Tilottama the most enchanting of all women. Though the story is form Hindu mythology the influence of Homer on Tilottama Sambhab is very strong indeed. In 1861 he reached the heights of his poetic achievement with the publication of his epic Meghanadbadh kavya which was immediately recognized as the greatest work in the language both by his admirers and critics. The kernel story of this epic is borrowed from the Ramayana but it was constructed on the Homeric model. It is distinguished by the novelty of its construction and by its grand design, by a deft handling of the blank verse and a new hoetic idiom. Though unmistakably influenced by many western poets–Homer, Dante, Tasso and Milton in particular–Meghanadbadh Kavya is strikingly original as an epic of art.

Madhusudan's next book of poems, Brajangana (1861) and Birangana (1862) present refreshing contrast, the former written in rimed verse its theme being the love of Radha and Krishna, and the latter written on the model of Ovid's heroic Epistle in sonorous blank verse. In Brajangana he experimented with the conventional poetic diction and created several new stanzaic patterns. His blank verse reached its consummate stage in Birangana.

In 1862 Madhusudan proceeded to England, the land of his dreams, but his poetic career virtually came to an end. During his stay in Versailles he composed several sonnets later collected in his Chaturdaspadi Kabitabali in 1866. His poetic power was on the decline but some of these sonnets are technically impecceable and marked by an intense lyricism. In the last few years of his life he was haunted by poverty and suffering and during those dark days he translated a few fables of La Fontaine from French and the first few books of the Iliad from the original Greek and that was his last signifacant work. This incomplete translation of the Iliad, entitled Hector-Badh (1871) is the first attempt at the rendering of a Greek work into Bengali prose.

Madhusudan's life was eventful and dramatic. His failure to adjust between the tension of the Indian and the European culture resulted in a tragedy in his personal life. But what he failed to achieve in his personal life, he achieved in his writings. He modernised Bengali literature and succeeded in making the European literary heritage a part of the total heritage of Bengali literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bani Roy, Madhujibanir Nuton Byakhya; Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay, Sahitya Sadhak Charitamala. Vol. II (Calcutta, 1954)., R.C. Dutt, Literature of Bengal (Calcutta, 1895)., Sasankaromhan Sen, Madhusudan.

S.D.

DATTA, RAMESHCHANDRA (Bengali; English; b. 1848, d. 1909) was a renowned Bengali novelist and historian. He went to England for higher studies at an early age of twenty, when he was a student of Presidency College in Calcutta. He passed the I.C.S. examination in 1871. His career as a civilian was one of uniterrupted success. After his voluntary retirement from service in 1897, he again went to U.K., where he had been invited as a Professor of History in London university. He also did extensive research work there on Indian History and Economics. He joined Indian Political movement in 1878 and became the President of the Indian National Congress next year.

As an author, Rameshchandra expressed himself both in English and in Bengali. He had written a lot of books in both the languages. Rameshchandra appeared on the Bengali literary scene as a translator. His first Bengali publication, Europe Tin Vatsar (1873) was the translated form of his own book in English, Three years in Europe (1872). His remarkable achievements as a complier and translator were RigvedaSamhita (1885-87) and Hindu Sastra (in two volumes, 1893-97).

It was Bankimchandra Chatterjee, who encouraged Rameshchandra to write novels in Bengali. His first Bengali novel, Banga Bijeta (The conquerer of Bengali) was published in 1874. It was a historical romance whose theme emerges from a phase of the history of Bengal during the region of Akbar, the great Moghul. His second novel was Madhavi Kankan (1877). Its English version, the Slave Girl of Agra (1909) was made by the author himself. The romantic story of the novel is woven against the background of the later years of the reign of Shah Jehan. The art of fiction writing in this novel has the mark of improvement in all respects over his first novel. In his other two novels, Maharashtra Jivan-Prabhat (1876) and Rajput Jivan-Sandhya 1879 (their English versons being Shivaji and Pratap Singh–the last of the Rajputs respectively, the author's power of harmonious blending of the fact of history and fiction of human life has reached a very high watermark. In fact, in Maharashtra Jivan–Prabhat history is not merely a background, it forms the main body of the story itself. Here Shivaji and Aurangzeb are the two chief well-delineated characters of the novel, in which their political conflicts constitute the essential part of the story. The novel Rajput Jivan-Sandhya presents an episode of the post-Pratap Singh era during the reign of Jahangir. The distinctive feature in Rameshchandra's novels is his fidelity to history, and in this regard he is almost flawless. One of the determinant factors behind his writing historical novels was his deep sense of patriotism. This profound emotion inspired him also to look into the evils of his contemporary society and to write about them. This attitude is reflected in his social novels Samsar (Domestic life, 1886) and Samaj (Society) 1894, which provides a graphic description of both the rural and urban lives of the nineteenth century Bengal. His progressive outlook towards widow and intercaste marriage is a prominent aspect of these social novels. The English version of Samsar (1902) was made by the author himself. Rameshchandra's scholarly and literary merits can never be properly assessed if they are not placed in the perspective of Renaissance in Bengal. He was one of the best products of that great movement in Bengal of the nineteenth century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY Bijit Kumar Dutta, Bangla Sahitye Aitihasik Upanyas (Calcutta, 1962); Probodhram Chakravarty, Sahityik Rameshchandra Datta (Calcutta, 1965).

Gop.R.

DATTA, RAMESHCHANDRA (English:) was born in Rambagan, Calcutta in a family famed for its academic and literary distinctions. Toru Datta, whose name is familiar to readers of English and French poetry was cousin of Ramesnchandra. He had his early education in Bengali schools. In 1861 Rameshchandra joined Hare School in Calcutta. In 1864 he passed the Entrance examination of the University of Calcutta with a scholarship. In the same year, at the age of sixteen, he married Matagini by whom he had two daughters and a son. In 1866, standing second in order of merit, he passed the First Arts examination from Presidency College, Calcutta. Soon after, he left for England where he qualified for the Indian Civil Service in 1869 and was also called to the bar before returning to India. Starting an outstanding career as administrator in the post of probationary assistant magistrate in 1871, he was the first Indian to rise to the post of Divisional Commissioner within ten years of service. He took voluntary retirement in 1897 while he was the commissioner of Orissa. Soon after, he went back to England where he was appointed lecturer in Indian History in the University of London.

By 1898 Romeshchandra had given up his University post in favour of active politics in the company of stalwarts like Dadabhai Nauroji and Umeshchandra Bandopadhyaya. In the same year the title of C.I.E. was conferred on him and the following year one saw his election as president of the Indian National Congress. In 1904 he became the Revenue Minister or Dewan of Baroda. In 1907 he was President of the Indian National Exhibition and the following year a member of the Decentralisation Commission. On the 30th of November 1909 he died in Baroda Romesh Chunder Dutt was a prolific writer. His books on economic history and ancient Indian civilization are valuable documents to the students of the subject. Apart from these he published many papers, articles, pamphlets, presidential addresses, novels in English and Bengali and translations of Indian classics into both English and Bengali. He also contributed to the Encyclopaedia Brittanica, 1902.

His first book on the economic problems of the cultivators was his Peasantry of Bengal written in 1875. The ideas developed in this book were expanded further in his Famines of India (1900) which contains a strongly argued thesis about the over assessment of land revenue and a plea for the extension of the permanent settlement to the Ryotwari areas along with a permanent fixation of rents payable by the ryots to the intermediaries. His greatest works in this field are the publication of India under Early British Rule: 1775-1837 and Economic History of India in the Victorian Age in 1902. Based on extensive research into parliamentary papers and other documents, they stand out even today as valuable studies of the economic problems of India in the nineteenth century. Having travelled widely both in India and abroad and being a great lover of history and ancient culture, Romeshchandra wrote extensively on these subjects. His first book Three Years in Europe written in 1872 ran into four editions. While still in service, he had written textbooks in Indian History but his really great work in the field was the four volumed A History of Civilization in Ancient India (1899). Published in the same year, his England and India: A Record of Progress contains an excellent analysis of the problems of Indian administration. It is a bold projection of British exploitation of India.

Side by side with his research dissertations Romeshchandra Datta tried his hand at creative writing. Inspired by models like Rammohan Roy Michael Madhusudan Datta and Bankimchandra Chatopadhyaya, he wrote six novels in Bengali and translated the Rig Veda into Bengali in 1886.

Romeshchandra's made considerable contribution to the art of translation, for the benefit of Bengali and English readers. Even more creditable than his Bengali translation of Rig-Vada are his English verse renderings of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata in his Great Epics of Ancient India (1890). His Lays of Ancient India (1894) which contains selections translated into English from the Rig-Veda, the Upanishads Buddhist literature, Kalidasa's Kumarasambhava and Bharavi's Kirtarjuniya was so popular that it inspired Macaulay to write the Lays of Ancient Rome. His Great Epics was first issued in the Temple Classics in 1898-1899 and added to the Everyman's Library in 1910. In condensing the epics into twelve books each (like Paradise Lost) and using the galloping metre of Tennyson in Locksley Hall, he may have lost the easy sweep of the orginial 'anushtup' but he certainly gained in clarity and immediate effectiveness. The speeches are eloquent; the descriptions evocative and the old similes come along in their original majestic gait. Thus the adorit versifier's selections gives us a taste of the original, and remain to date one of the best introductions in English verse of the anicent classics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Banerjee-Rameshchandra Datta., J.N. Gupta-Life and Work of R.C. Dutt., S.M. Mukherjee-Ramesh Chandrer Jibani.

A.C.

DATTA SAMPRADAYA (Marathi). Even though there are temples of Dattatreya all over India the cult of Datta seems to have flourished only in the Maharashtra. The credit of popularising it goes to Narasinhasaraswati (1378-1458), though the worship of Datta was not unknown to Maharashtra prior to his period.

We find references to Datta in the Mahabharata, in some Puranas and in some later Upanishads and Magha's Sishupalavadham whose date is 650. There are plenty of variations in the accounts of Datta's personality. Commonly he is known to be the son of Atri and Anasuya, incarnation of Vishnu, and a disciple of Shiva. He is always represented as Avadhuta Yogi, wandering from place to place, blessing the devotees and preaching to them. Later Bhakti cults have held him to be a symbol of an ideal guru. In some Puranas and Tantra works, he is described as a yogi indulging in wine and sex. Regarding his form also there is no single opinion. Sometimes he is likened to Vishnu sometimes to Shiva, sometimes with one head and sometimes with three heads etc. Considering all these variations R.C. Dhere has tried to explain the evolution of Datta mythology. According to him Datta was originally an Avadhuta yogi practising tantrika form of worship. He must have set up an ideal for all tantrikas.

He was therefore deified in tantrika works. Later on when tantrika school deteriorated, Gorakshanath established Natha Sampradaya to oppose the tantrikas. He insisted on purity and rigorous austerity. But while wiping out the tantrikas he retained some good elements in their cult and admitted them in his Sampradaya. Thus Datta assumed a very esteemed position in Natha sect. Later on the Puranas accepted him in their pantheon and he was completely deified and came to be associated with famous Hindu trinity viz. Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva. R.M. Bhusari has opposed this view. He says that Datta was originally a deity as described in Puranas. Later on because of his popularity various schools wanted to establish their association with him, the tantrikas being one of them. But this explanation does not throw light on Datta's evolution to Godhead.

Datta has been associated with many religious sects. The Puranic tradition holds him to be an incarnation of Vishnu, Natha Sampradaya holds him as an ideal guru, the tantrikas hold him as the promoter of Tripura worship, the Pancharatras consider him as one of the 39 incarnations of Vasudeva, the Mahanubhavas have included him among their five Krishnas. All the Bhakti schools in Maharashtra have given him a very exalted position. They hold him to be the symbol of the guru institution.

But in spite of all this popularity there was no special cult associated with the name of Datta prior to the rise of Narasinhasaraswati. The work Gurucharitra written by Saraswatigangadhar (1558) narrates the life of Narasinhasaraswati in a very lucid style. In this work Saraswatigangadhar describes the lives of two great men, viz. Shripad Shrivallabha and Narasinhasaraswati who were responsible for the propagation of Datta cult in Maharashtra. Shripad Shrivallabha (1320-1355) was born at Pithapura in Andhra Pradesh. He left the house in early childhood, lived the life of an itinerent Avadhuta and in the end came to Kuravpura to die. The Gurucharitra narrates his miracles. Narasinhasaraswati is believed to be his incarnation. He was born at Karanja in Vidarbha area. He also left his house in his early youth to become a sanyasin and spent all his life in showering his benevolence and his love upon the needy ones. During his wanderings he stayed at Audumbara, Narasobachiwadi and Gangapur and then went to Shri Shaila Mallikarjuna where he took leave of this world. The Gurucharitra does not give his detailed biography. It simply narrates a few of his miracles and his occasional preachings. In his preachings Narasinhasaraswati dwells on the duties of four varnas, married ladies, widows, etc., the nature of vedic literature, the importance of various holy places and the importance of the worship of guru i.e., the preceptor. Today his teaching appears to be very conservative and orthodox but it had played an important historical role in the religious history of Maharashtra. During his days Maharashtra was facing double invasion from the Muslims. Politically they had established their rule in the South, and their Sufi saints had set out to convert the Hindus to their faith. Narasinhasaraswati wanted to fortify and strengthen the religious front of Hindus by prescribing purity of conduct, faith in god and observation of the social duties. He tried to win over the Muslim rulers by his miracles which blunted the edge of their antagonism towards the Hindu population.

Neither Shripad Shrivallabha nor Narasinhasaraswati prescribed Datta worship sepcifically. But since they themselves were believed to be the incarnations of Dattatreya they inspired many people to accept Datta-worship. For Datta worshippers Gurucharitra has become an important holy scripture wielding supernatural power besides its contents.

After Narasinhasaraswati many worshippers of Datta flourished on the soil of Maharashtra, Janardanaswami, Dasopant, Ekanath, Mukteshwar, etc. in the medieval period and Niranjana Raghunatha, Narayana Maharaja Jalwankar, Manik Prabhu, Swami Samartha of Akkalkot, Vasudevananda Saraswati, Pantamaharaj Belekundrikar in recent times. Among these Manik Prabhu and Swami Samartha of Akkalkot are regarded as the incarnations of Datta in modern times. Vasudevananda Saraswati Tembe tried to organise the cult in recent times.

Next to Gurucharitra there are a few other works which have inspired the Datta worshippers in Maharashtra. They are Dattaprabodh of Anantasuta Vitthalabova (1860), Gurulilamrita, a biography of Swami Samartha of Akkalkot written by Vamanabova (1863) and Dattamahatmya of Vasudevananda Saraswati (1901).

All this history of the cult and its literature gives us the impression that it is a very orthodox cult based on rigid austerities. The practices of Datta worshippers also corroborate this. This cult seems to be individualistic in character and there is no organisation as such. Each Datta worshipper seems to be following the dictates of his mind. Datta himself is believed to be appearing in person and guiding the devotees. So the direct vision of Datta is considered to be one of the goals in Datta worship. There is no specific philosophy of this cult. Narasinhasaraswati belonged to the order of Shankaracharya. Therefore, the advaita philosophy of Shankaracharya could be said to be the philosophy of this cult. But really speaking this cult is an upasana cult and hence the minor emphasis on philosophy. Yoga is considered more important than philosophy. Almost all the great saints of this cult were yogis par excellence. Next to Yoga, importance is given to Bhakti. But again this bhakti is mostly inspired by some desires. So we find people who want their wish to be fulfilled are mostly attracted to Datta worship. Visit to Datta's places like Mahur, Kolhapur, etc. or the places associated with the great saints like Narasinhasaraswati, insistence on the strict observance of the duties laid down for four Varnas, reading of the Datta texts, etc. could be said to be the normal code of conduct for a Datta worshipper. Because of its emphasis on the rigorous austerities and orthodox practices the common masses were not very much attracted towards it as they were towards Varakari Sampradaya. But as there is a common belief that these holy places associated with Datta have got a mysterious capacity to free the devotees from calamities like ghost haunting, etc. the common masses resort to Datta worship with awe. Therefore, even today all these Datta places are crowded with worshippers suffering from worldly difficulties and therefore approaching the feet of Datta with awe and devotion.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.C. Dhere, Datta Sampradayacha Itihasa, Pune, 1963.

K.K.

DATTA, SATYENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1882, d. 1922) had his formal education upto B.A. After a brief period of occupation in business, he devoted his entire life to literary pursuits. He had inherited from his grandfather Akshaykumar Datta, the quest for scientific knowledge, interest in national heritage and patriotic feeling. These traits left a long-lasting impression on his poetry. He was a younger contemporary of Tagore, whom he came to know personally and naturally came under his all-pervading influence. But at the same time he was able to develop a poetic idiom of his own which is characterized by a skilful and varied use of the metre and colloquial diction. His literary achievement within the short span of his life gave him a front place among the followers of Tagore.

Benu O Bina (The Flute and the Lyre, 1906) was his third published work and the first to show traces of his individual style. It was dedicated anonymously to Tagore who saw in this work a lot of future possibilities. His next collection was Homashikha (The sacrificial Flame, 1907), in which the poet revoked the ancient vedic poets' cosmic view of nature, and finally settled on the earth to proclaim the equality of all human beings. 'Samya-sama' (Hymn of Equality) as the last poem is entitled, shows his ability to create powerful rhythm which can bring artistic effect to an otherwise prosaic statement.

Satyendranath's effortless versification is best evidenced in his translations of poems from languages all over the world. These renderings collected in three volumes, Tirthasalil (Holy Waters, 1908), Tirtharenu (Holy Dust, 1910) and Manimanjusa (A Jewel Casket, 1915) include Chinese and Japanese poems from the east, Greek, English, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Polish and Swedish poems from the West and Sanskrit, Marathi, Punjabi, Tamil and Munda poems from his own homeland. Besides, there are poems in Persian, a language which he knew. His working knowledge of French had also helped him to read French poets in the original. In these translations of nearly three hundred and fifty poems he was able to bring treasures from different languages to his Bengali readers. His renderings may not be very close to the original but they have the facility of original compositions.

Phuler Phasal (The Crops of Flowers, 1911) marked the beginning of a period of maturity in the poet, which continued through Kuhu O Keka (The Cuckoo and the Peacoock 1912), Tulir Likhan (Writings of the Brush, 1914), Abhra Abir, (Mica and Vermilion Dust, 1916) and Hasantika (1917). His reactions to nature became more sensuous and reflective, as can be seen from some of the lyrics in Phuler Phasal and Kuhu O Keka. He also continued with the compositions which are essentially the product of his various readings and not the expression of any deeper emotion. Some of his well-known verses on patriotism belong to this period. His diction had moved more towards colloquialism and, borrowed words from Persian and Arabic were on the increase. His two books Belasheser Gan (The Song of the Day's End, 1922) and Biday Arati (the Parting Greeting, 1922) were posthumous publications and continuation of this period which ended with them. But the lingering effect remained in some of his memorable lyrics like Palkir Gan (The Song of the Palanquin) and Durer Palla (A distant Journey) which combine picturesqueness with musical rhythm and throb with vibrations of life in them.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Haraprasad Mitra, Satyendranath Datter Kavita O Kavyarupa (Calcutta, Third ed. 1964).

T.W.

DATTA, TORU (English; b. 1856, d. 1877). Raised in the cultured Dutt family of Bengal, Toru (as well as her elder sister, Aru) engaged themselves in literary exercise at an early age. A stay of four years in France, England and Italy, (during which period she accepted a high degree of proficiency both in French and English) completed her education, and virgorously quickened her creative impulse. Returning to Calcutta in 1873, she plunged, in Sir Edmund Gosse's words, 'into a feverish dream of intellectual effort and imaginative production'. This told heavily on her health, and she died prematurely of consumption.

Toru Datta's first published poetical volume, A Sheaf Gleaned in French Fields, came out in 1876. Her orginality lies in the selection and treatment of native themes with an entirely local background. Her verse is finely knit, vigorous and of a pleasing variety.

The reception to her book was such that, within a few months of its publication, she could look forward to a second edition of it. We read in a letter, dated 12 February 1877, 'I have very little time to give to reading just now, as I am so busy with adding pieces and notes to, and correcting my Sheaf.' But she did not live to see the revised and much enlarged second edition of the book which came out in 1878; it contained over 30 new pieces with notes, a 'Prefatory Memoir' by her father, Govindachandra, and a frontispiece portrait of the two sisters.

Among others of Toru Datta's characteristics is her rare gift of story telling. Her ballads are dramatic, having the force of action and the charm of natural and chaste dialogue. There is curiosity and suspense in them, and there are well drawn characters such as live in our imagination. Their beginnings which have a peculiar directness, unfold the most interesting and critical points of a story in a manner which grips our attention. Lakshman, Jogadhya Uma, Buttu and Sindhi are as effective and artistic in design and conception as 'Haystack in the Floods', 'Sister Helen' or 'Madhyama's Quest', the only difference being the difference of background. The power and interest of her narrative is heightened by the simplicity and chastity of her style, the spontaniety of emotion and her imaginative sympathy with the background of the stories. The ballads in The Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindusthan, with an introduction by Edmund Gosse (1882), were not exotic to her; their atmosphere was not alien. The stories of the past stirred her and tounched a responsive chord within her.

Her other published works are Bianca or the Young Spanish Maiden (1878); Le Journal de Mademoiselle d'Arvers (1879); (English Translation by Prithwindra Mukherjee in the Illustrated Weekly, 1963.)

FURTHER WORKS: The Dutt Family Album (1870).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harihar Das. Life and Letters of Toru Dutt, with a foreword by H.A.L. Fisher (1921); Classical Tradition in Toru Dutt's Poetry (1931); Padmini Sen Gupta. 'Toru Dutt' in Makers of Indian Literature (1968); P.C. Kotoky, Indo-English Poetry (1969).

G.S.A.

DATU (Kannada) the eleventh novel of S.K. Bhairappa won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1975.

Saytambhama, an educated Brahmin girl, may be regarded as the central character of the novel. Her father, Venakataramanaiah, is the officiating priest in a temple in Thirumalapura. Sathyabhama is an M.A. in History, and is a lecturer in a private college in Bangalore. Srinivasa, a Vokkaliga and the son of a deputy minister, wishes to marry her, and she is willing to brush aside considerations of caste and marry him. Her family objects, and she also loses her job. Later in the novel, a Harijan youth, Mohanadasa, wishes to marry her. He hates the upper castes, and believes that only violence will put an end to the humiliations of the lower castes. Satyabhama is mature and poised. A student of history, she believes that the decadence of Hinduism began with idol worship. She accepts the worship of Agni (the Fire-god) because the fire burns and purifies all things and is the symbol of man's spiritual aspirations. In the company of Mohanadasa she experiences the violent hatred of the oppressed for the upper classes, and in her relations with Srinivasa she realizes how complex the problem of caste was (Srinivasa's grandfather objects to his marriage with a Brahmin girl, and the Harijans are violently resentful when Venkataramanath sets foot in their colony). The novel concludes with the successful attempt of Mohanadasa to blow up the embankment of the tank; he himself goes down in the swirling waters.

The novel proved highly controversial. It was even called reactionary on the ground that Mohanadasa swoons when at last he and the Harijans are permitted to enter the temple and he stands in the presence of the idol and that Venkataramanaiah who thinks that Srinivasa has wronged his daughter curses his family and Srinivasa's wife dies, thus suggesting that a Brahmin's curse is potent. It may, however be pointed out that Mohanadasa's collapse is susceptible to a psychological explanation (violent hatred is inverted attraction) and that Srinvvasa's wife dies, not because the old man's curse operates but because the anaemic pregnant young wife learns from his outburst the truth about her husband's escapades.

The novel is packed with action. But at the same time it is an analysis of the ramifications of caste feelings and practices. The analysis of caste does not remain academic but light up through its manifestation in the lives of characters who are alive and are caught up in situations which determine the course of their lives and are, therefore, of vital importance to them. So the analysis comes to life in human contexts. Sathyabhama and Mohanadasa, who determine the perimeter of the action, are both intensely alive; Mohanadasa is live coal, burning with rage at the very thought of the indignities heaped on his community. He is not romantisized. Sathyabhama, a student of history, is able to place herself outside the immediate present and view the institution of caste in its historical perspective; but it impinges sharply on her life again and again so that she experiences it as a human being. She holds that 'Veda' means knowledge; she reverences the sacred thread as a symbol of knowledge. She regards the construction of temples as a manifestation of the corruption of the Hindu religion; the final deluge overwhelms the temple also. At that moment she throws away the scared thread and climbs higher to the top of the mound - symbolic of her ascent to a new height. The word 'datu' means 'to cross', to transcend and every character in the novel is struggling to cross some barrier.

The novel has its imperfections. The swooning of Mohanadasa, for example, despite the psychological explanation, is unconvincing. The historical study seems to get too much importance. After all, caste as a challenge to to-day's life is of paramount importance. The implied suggestion for a return to pristine Brahminism is unrealistic. But the novel is significant for its bold and comprehensive presentation of the problem and the institution of caste in human terms.

L.S.S.R

DAUDPOTO UMAR BIN MUHAMMAD (Sindhi; b. 1897, d. 1958), was a writer and research scholar of the first rank. He obtained his M.A. degree with Arabic in First Class (1923) from Bombay University and doctorate in 1927 from Cambridge for his research work, The Influence of Arabic Poetry on Persian Poetry (published in 1934).

Before his departure for Cambridge, he had served as Lecturer in Arabic and then as Assistant Professor in Arabic and Sindhi (1923-24) at D.J. Sind College, Karachi. In 1927, he joined as Principal, Sind Madrasatul Islam, Karachi for three years and from 1930 to 1939 he served with distinction as Professor of Arabic, at Ismail Yusuf College, Bombay. He was transferred in 1939 as Director of Public Instruction, Sindh and was appointed a member of the Sindh Public Service Commission and later, the West Pakistan P.S.C. (1950-1956).

During his stay in Bombay, he was an active member of the Board of Studies in Arabic and Persian and the Board of Studies in Sindhi. He was also University's nominated ordinary fellow and became corresponding member of Faved Institute, Cairo in 1955. The title of Shamsul-Ulema was conferred upon him by the British Govt. in 1940.

He was considered to be an authority on Islamic Studies and an eminent scholar of both Persian and Arabic. His critical editions of Tarikh-i-Masumi (1938) and Chachama or Fatehnama-i-Sind (1939) with introduction, indices and historical and geographical notes speak volumes of his research ability, erudition and deep knowledge of Persian. Compared to his dedicated works in the field of Persian and Arabic, his contribution to Sindhi, though small is yet abiding. In 1931 he compiled Suraha Gula (Fragrant Flowers) a selection from Sindhi classical poetry. In 1934 he had translated into Sindhi Minhajul Ashquin, a Persian work giving explanation of allegories, in the folk tales of Sind specially of those in Shah-jo-Rasalo. Bayan-ul-Arfin, comprising Sindhi poems of Shah Abdul Karon of Bulri with their Persian translation rendered into Sindhi was edited critically by him in 1937. He followed it up with yet another work Abyat-i-Sindhi, poems of Khwaja Ahmad Zaman with their elaborate explanations and interpretation given by Abdul Rahim Girhori in Arabic done by him in Sindhi (1939). Kalam-i-Girhori (Girhori's poems) was published by him with footnotes, glossary and introduction to the poet in 1957. His incomplete autobiography under the title of Munhinti Mukhtaser Atam Kahani (A short Autobiograpy) was brought out posthumously in 1959. Apart from these, he has to his credit many critical and literary essays and articles published in various magazines. They are mainly concerning early poets like Qazi Qadan, Shah Abdul Latif, Muhammad Muhin Bekas and several others, and some topics of research value.

It is no exaggeration to say that he was the torch-bearer of research scholars who followed his footsteps and that he inspired a band of young scholars to enter the virgin field of research in Sindhi language and literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ghulam Ali Allana, Sindhi Nasra ji Tarikh (Hyderabad, 1966, 1961)., L.H. Ajwani, History of Sindhi Literature (Delhi, 1970)., M.U. Malkani, Sindhi Nasra ji Tarikh.

D.K.M.

DAULAT KAZI (Bengali) was a poet who lived in the 17th century, and wrote under the patronage of the rulers of Arrakan. His romantic exuberance was derived from the Perso-Arabic literary sources. The court of the Arrakan rulers provided the base for this new upsurge.

Arrakan wrested the whole of Chittagong territory from the Pathan rulers of Bengal in 1459 and the resultant contacts had an abiding impact. Moreover, the area was physically exposed to the influence of outsiders, particularly from the seaside. All these provided a unique prospect for the mingling of various ethnic groups belonging to diverse faiths, languages and traditions leading to an ultimate predilection for adjustment and amity. And Daulat Kazi flourished in this atmosphere.

The Arrakan kings, Buddhists by faith, used to assume a Perso-Arabic title while ascending the throne and that was in deference to the sentiments of the subject races, mostly muslim. Each king used to have a muslim confidant also as a chief figure of the court. Daulat Kazi composed his only kavya, that also incomplete, under the patronage of Ashraf Khan, the court confidant of the king Srisudharma (Thiri Thu Dhamma) some time betwen 1622 and 1635. Nothing else is known about the poet.

However, he wrote his kavya with a double title Sati Mayana and Lor Chandrani following Maina Sati, a saga composed earlier by Sadhan (15th century A.D.) in an imperfect Hindi style (Theta Chaupai; Gohari Bhasha) prevalent amongst the folk at large; Daulat's initiator Ashraf Khan wanted him to render that poetic tale into Deshi Bhasha for the consumption of the Bengali listeners and readers.

At many places Daulat followed the theme and style of the original almost verbatim. Yet he took full liberty while composing the whole Kavya. Even thematic additions are not little. But the poet's originality was mainly in the spirit of tolerance, love and amity inculcated throughout the work. Daulat Kazi was a Sufi by faith, a faith imbibed with the mystic spirit of cohesion, love and self-submission. In fact, this, and such other faiths could emerge in India out of the spontaneous social interaction emanating from an intimate co-mingling of the folk minds of varied origin and tradition–particularly pertaining to the Hindu and Islamic values.

Hence the folk lores of Bengal emanating from the core of absorbing mystic involvement, had been a cementing force in an atmosphere charged with a feeling of heterogeneity and competition let loose by the theologicians of the upper class. Daulat Kazi carved the outline of his own poetic contemplation based on a synthesis of such popular Hindu-Muslim values as could be a base for their emergence. He refers to the Vedic and Puranic concepts about the origin and growth of life, imitates and tries to imbibe the spirit of Vidyapati or even of Kalidas at places, while as a devout Muslim he would invoke the graciousness of 'Bismillah' and his 'Rasul', and prescribe the way of Shariat and Iman for an ultimate emancipation. Indeed, the poetic soul of Daulat was initiated into the creed of integration and amity–'unity in diversity'.

The theme of the story also provided a scope for this unity. In fact the Kavya runs through two subplots finally integrating into one. The first is that of Maianamati, a Sati of sophisticated Hindu ideals. A young lady of exquisite grace and artistic propensities, Maina sacrificed almost her whole life at the altar of womanly chastity, for a truant and failing husband, King Lor of Gohari.

He went out on a hunting spree with all the able-bodied youth of the country leaving the kingdom to Mainamati's care. There he came across a picture of Chandrani, the graceful princess of Mohara who had been dissatisfied with her brave but dwarf husband. Lor got excited, went to Mohara, entered the princess's chamber stealthily while Vaman (the dwarf) was away. Both had been struck by first love and Lor eloped with Chandrani. Vamana, on his return from a war, chased the two, but was ultimately killed by Lor in the encounter. The father of Chandrani remarried his daughter to Lor and ultimately they became king and queen of the state. Their son also attained maturity in course of time.

And Lor could remain without remembering even once Sati Mainamati for all these years. After having finally refused the allurements of Chatan, a rich young fellow, and having dispensed with the conniving maid servant, Mainamati at last sent an old Brahmin to Mohara to communicate her message to Lor. When Lor met him, he at once remembered his forgotten wife and was all remorse; he handed over the throne of Mohara to his son, and finally returned home to Maina with Chandrani. They lived a happy life thereafter, and after the death of Lor, both the wives consumed themselves in the funeral pyre of their husband.

The two stories obviously emanated from two different sources. The first out of the Hindu Smarta ideology and the latter imbibed from the spirit of a free folk society. Yet the final cohesion of the two leaves no room for any divergence.

Death seized the poet midway in his absorbing work, which was later completed by Alaol, another stalwart poet of the court. Yet Daulat Kazi is held in the highest esteem as the initiator of a sublime human grace in medieval Bengali poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Enamul Haque, Muslim Bengali Literature.

B.C.

DAVAVAITA (Rajasthani) also called 'Duabaita' is made up of two separate words-'Dua' and 'Baita'. Both of them are Arabic words. 'Dua' means a prayer or eulogy or praise. 'Baita' is a sort of metre, a 'Sera' or a composition of two lines. 'Baitabaji' is a sort of verse-reciting composition in which a contestant recites a couplet recited by the foregoing contestant. It is more or less the same as 'Antyakshari'. Thus, it may be described as a metrical composition eulogising or praising somebody. The prosodists (Manchakavi and Adha Kishana have spelled it as 'Davavaita'), but have not tried to explain the meaning of the term. It is strange that scholars have kept silent as to the derivation of this word. It seems both these words are one and the same, and the slight difference in spelling is due to the meaning not being clear. But the latter spelling may possibly claim derivation from the word Dwivritta which literally means 'of two final rhyme'. 'Vrittagandhi' was a form of rhymed prose used by the Sanskritists. The style has been handed over to us by literary traditions.

On a close examination of the form it can easily be noticed that there is a rhyming of the terminal portions of the ultimate words, whether they appear in a couplet or stanza or in the prose form. The second peculiarity is of the grammatical construction of sentences and the diction, both of which belong prominently to the so-called Urdu language.

While defining 'Davavaita' in his Raghunatha Rupaka Gitan Ro, the poet Manchakavi (19th century) mentions its two types 'Suddhabandha' or 'Padabandha' and 'Gaddabandha'. The 'Padabandha' contains prose pieces of 24 vowel marks with corresponding rhyming terminations. The 'Gaddabandha', however, does not observe any such rule of vowel marks, though it also has rhymed terminations. The poet Adha Kishana (19th century) has mentioned it as a kind of metre in prose and has given a specimen thereof.

The 'Davavaita' is similar in many respects to another prose form called 'Vachanika' which also has rhyming forms of eight and twenty vowel marks. Both these prose metres so resemble each other that it becomes practically impossible to distinguish the one from the other. The composers are also to be blamed for this chaos, as they have neither followed the definition laid down nor cared to stick to the prevalent norms and standards, with the result that both these writings have got intermixed. There are very few independent writings known as 'Davavaita' though there are many pieces finding a place in other works where they have been used as a kind of metre or prose piece. One of the prominent 'Davavaita' reported in catalogues is Narsinhadas gauda ri–Davavaita by Bhat Malidas. (17th-18th century). It abounds in Persian or Arabic words and is written in the Urdu or Khari Boli style. Some more works of this period are Jinasukhasuri ri Davavaita by Upadhaya Ramvijaya (1715), Jinalabhasuri ri Davavaita by Vachaka Vinayabhakti; Raja Jaysinha ri Davavaita by Dungarsi Bagadi; Akhai Raja ri Davavaita and Raysinha ri Davavaita by Bihari Dan; Davavaita Maharaja Ajitsinha ri by Dvarkadas Dadhavadiya (1658). One more such work entitled Granth Davavaita Rayji Sri Bhagavandasjiro by Khuman has been reported. Davavaita Maharana Sangramsinha and Davavaita Maharana Udaisinha were written by unknown poets. Kariya Karanidan has used it in his Suraj Prakas (17th century) and Dayaldas Sindhayacha in his Rathodan ri Khiyat (19th century). Such instances are numerous. The substance of all the 'Davavaitas' reveals that it contains descriptions of persons, places and things generally eulogising or praising the subject. It, therefore, conforms to the original derivational meaning of 'Duabaita'. An exception to this style is a Davavaita Isarada ki also mentioned as 'Bedawavaita' composed by Baratha Durgadatta (19th century), which contains all sorts of abuses for the town Isarada and its residents. This is in sharp contrast to all the rest and has set a new example. Notice should also be taken of the fact that the word 'Dava' is often written as 'Dua' and 'Vaita' as 'Baita'. Thus it seems that the writers and scribes have never been particular about the exact spelling and were perhaps ignorant of the supposed difference. The most important things regarding the 'Duabaita' are the grammatical forms, diction and rhyme. The rhyme whether of prescribed vowel-marks or not is also there.

All the ingredients combined with the eulogistic pattern go to make a perfect 'Davavaita'or 'Duabaita'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : A.C. Nahata, Davavaita Sarijnaka Rachanaon Ki Parampara., Sodha Patrika, Vol. 12, No. 2, 1960, Udaipur.

Raw.S.

DAVE, BALMUKUND (Gujarati; b. 1916) is a lyricist. He began his career as a poet by writing Dhruvakhyan (1948), a modern version of the episode of Dhruva, a mythological character, who after penance realised God. He had adopted mediaeval poetic form of Akhyana, a long narrative poem. He received Kumar Gold Medal for poetry in 1948. Parikrama (1955) is his second collection of poems. In it the poet excels in portraying the freshness and intensity of passion of youthful love, in tunes and rhythms of folk songs, and spiritual sentiments in the form of devotional songs. His Harino Hansalo written in Bhajan style on the death of Gandhiji is one of the best poems in Gujarati on the subject. His poems on nature express his unlimited joy on seeing the beauty of nature. He is at his best in musical poems. Sobriety in depiction of romantic sentiments is his speciality. We also find mystical elements in his religious poetry. His children's poems indicate that he dives deep into the children's mind. The collections of his children's poems are Sone Champo (1959), Allak Dallak (1965) and Zarmariyan (1973). He has received Union Government's as well as Gujarat Government's awards for his children's poems.

Gharman Ganga (Ganga at Home), is a collection of his pen pictures, which indicate his keen power of observation, and his power of portraying characters.

C.S.

DAVE, HARINDRA J. (Gujarati; b. 1930) is a poet, novelist, critic, and journalist. He was born in Khambhra and educated in Bhavnagar, After coming to Bombay he served for sometimes in U.S.I.S. and at present he is the chief editor of Janmabhumi-Pravasi group of newspapers. His contribution in the sphere of modern Gujarati poetry and novel is significant. The introductions and critical comments of his annotated books reveal his love for literature. He is a romantic poet and his poetry is marked with aesthetic beauty. Four collections of his poems are published and they show a growth of his poetic vision which culminates in Suryopanishada. Asava (1961) is the poet's first book of ghazals. Samaya (1972) is another book of ghazals. Asava contains some ghazals but it is in Samaya that one finds the technical excellence of ghazal form and the intense emotional exuberence. Mauna is an important book of lyrics. The restrained form of lyrical expression is exquisitely attempted here. These songs express the delicate sentiments of youthful love. There is a bunch of poems written in the tradition of folk-songs on the Radha-Krishna theme. Suryopanishada (1975) marks a beginning of a new poetic style. The majority of the prose poems indicate the departure from the old style. The first poem has five sections which probe the mystery that surrounds man. It is in the form of a monologue and the lonely character tries to hear the conversation between life and death. The agony of love is resounded in some sonnets and songs. Aganpankhi, Palanam Pratibimba, Anagata, Madhava Kyamya Nathi and Sukha Namano Pradasa are his novels known for their technique and content. The recurrent image of death in all these novels is beautifully blended with the image of life. The quest of love is another theme of these novels. Unlike the socio–psychological themes of earlier novels, the theme of Madhava Kyamya Nathi (1970) is mythological. The novel narrates major events of Lord Krishna's life ranging from his birth to death. The poetic prose rich in dramatic devices reveals the message of Krishna.

FURTHER WORKS: Arpana (verses of prayer), Ugeuge (play), Musayarani Katha, Dayarama, Galib, (critical studies). Madianu Manorajya, Pinjaranu Pankhi, Dharatina Choru, Jyot Sadaya Jale, Parinirvana, etc.

N.R.

DAVE, JUGATRAM (Gujarati; b. 1888) was closely associated with Gandhiji's constructive programme of child education. He has written children's songs, Balvadi (children's garden), Chanibor (a kind of fruit), Rayan (a kind of fruit). These songs depict the working of children's mind and their sentiments in a bewitching manner. Kaushikakyan is a poem based on the Mahabharata story, in which he has depicted Dharmavyadha not as a scholar of the Vedas but as a Harijan who is well acquainted with worldly affairs. The poem is written in the style of an epic, thus in the poem we find the tradition happily blended with revolutionary ideas. In the poem he has for the first time used Marathi Ovi metre. He has in his collection of devotional poems Antarpat (The inside veil; 1926) depicted the longing of the individual soul for the universal soul, as was done by the mediaeval poets.

In his play Andhalanu Gadun (Blindman's cart, 1927), he has propagated the concept of un-untouchability of Mahatma Gandhi in a dramatic manner. In another play Prahalad (1929) he has chosen the mythological character of Prahalad to depict the success of Satyagraha. These plays were written for staging in Gandhiji's Ashram Schools. They became very popular.

In Gurudevnan Gito (Songs of Gurudev, 1932), he has beautifully rendered into Gujarati the songs of Tagore. He in his short biographies of Gandhi, Gokhale and Chunibhai has portrayed beautiful pen pictures, which give us an insight into the working of human minds, and their internal conflicts.

Ma.S

DAVE, JYOTINDRA HARIHARSANKAR (Gujarati; b. 1901, d. 1980) was born and educated in Surat graduating with honours from M.T.B. College with Sanskrit and Gujarati as special subjects in 1923. After a year's fellowship there in 1925, he took his M.A. degree and joined Gujarati (monthly) of Bombay as a sub-editor in 1926. This was followed by a stint of teaching at Kabibai High school, Bombay and his alma mater M.T.B. College, Surat. In 1937, he joined government service as an Assistant Oriental Translator in Bombay, got promoted to the Oriental Translator's post later and held that post till retirement, in 1956. From 1956 to 1963 he was a Professor at Somaiya College, Bombay and Bhavan's College, Andheri, Bombay and the Principal of the Arts and Commerce College, Mandvi, Bhuj. In later years he co-edited the fortnightly Samarpan.

He is known as a great humourist in Gujarati literature. There was a sort of tradition of humour and satire in Gujarati literature from Premanand and Akho, through Navalram Pandya and Ramanbhai Neelkanth to Jayendra Doorkal, Mastfakir, Oliya Joshi and Dhansukh-lal Mehta. Jyotindra Dave not only carried on this tradition but added literary sophistication to it that earned humour an unprecedented place of honour in Gujarati literature. He wrote profusely and brilliantly at a time (1927 onwards) when humorous writing of this literary calibre was a scarce commodity.

Jyotindra Dave has expressed himself largely in the humorous essay form, in a style that is simple yet urbane. His humour is broad on the surface level, accounting for his great popularity with masses. His sharp wit, minute observation of middle class life, and the undercurrent of wisdom born of his scholastic pursuit of Indian Vedic philosophy brought him high literary acclaim.

Dave's first humorous sketches under the pen-name Gupta, published in literary journals from 1927 to 1932 had an electrifying effect on the readers. Nothing of this sort was seen before. The sketches were published later as Mari Nonthpothi, followed immediately by Rangtarang I in 1932. Rangtarang I contains longer humorous essays. Ostensibly these essays are the loose sally of the mind yet at the core they show a unity born out of the writer's consistent comic view of the world. In Rangtarang II to Rangtarang VI, published between 1941-1945, he remains faithful to this form. These collections contain a few short plays, verse-prosodies and writings in other miscellaneous forms, but by and large the author lost interest in forms other than the essays, after his earlier experiments in the Mari Nonthpothi.

A significant departure in form though not in style is the humorous novel (his only one) Ame Bandhan (We all together), co-authored with Dhansukhlal Mehta. It is a humorous account of life in his native city, Surat, and with its picturesque details it reaches almost the level of social history of early years of this century. The plot-line consists of events in the life of the hero Vipin from his birth to marriage. The novel till today remains an unparalleled classic in its field.

From 1946 to almost his last years Jyotindra Dave continued to write and publish essays, which were later collected in Pananan Beedan (1946), Retini Rotali (1952), Najar Lambi Ane Toonki (1956), Trijunsukh (1957) and Rog, Yog and Prayog. Here he continues with his favourite form, the humorous essay, but the sharpness of his wit and gusto of his humour seem now to be wanting, and he becomes more and more didactic, though of course, the sparks of his old writing still abound.

Dave had a stint at autobiography, but later the attempt was abandoned. Alpatma-nun Atmapuran (1947), the incomplete autobiography, is in fact a series of essays. Jyotindra Dave could most naturally maintain a characteristic distance from his material, that is human life. This has resulted in a peculiar objectivity making it possible for him to laugh at almost any human experience, though the immediate target is mostly his own self. This detachment, together with kind-hearted tolerance for life in all forms, makes him a great humorist.

His scholastic writings on Natyashastra, Hasyarasa etc. are compiled by Krishnaveer Dixit under the title Vangmaya Chintan (1984). Dave in his early days wrote a serious play, Veeshpan, and later adapted a Moliere play, Vada-ane-Teta. He also reveals himself as a critic in his Granthstha Vangmaya Sameeksha (1934).

Dave won literary honours in his time. He was elected President of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad in 1965.

B.T.

DAVE, MAKARAND (Gujarati; b. 1922) is a reputed poet of the post -Independence era. Dave has also been an exponent of other genres such as drama, novel, memoirs and essays. His poetic works are Goraj (Evening Time), Taranan (Grass), Jaybheri (Trumpet of Victory), Sangna (Symbol), Surajmukhi (Sunflower), Sangati (Accompaniment). Jhabuk Vijli Jhabuk (Flash of Lightning) is a collection of poems for children. In his poems we find a happy blending of the mysticism of Tagore, the spritualism of Aurobindo and the humanism of Mahatma Gandhi. Being unaffected by contemporary modernist trends he sings about the quest of the soul for the Infinite, using the tunes and images of folk poetry. He invokes the Eternal Being to bless him with the power to understand things. Like the medieval saint-poets he vividly depicts the various moods of a devotee pining for a union with the Almighty. Instead of preaching like them, he transports the reader from the region of individual life to the realm of universality. Thereby he earns a place of prominence not only amongst post-Independence poets of Gujarat, but also amongst Gujarati poets of all times.

In his prose works also, as in Yogapath and Antarvedi, he elevates us from the realm of senses to the realm which is beyond senses. He has lucidly written on Yoga and mysticism.

In his Yogi Harnathnan Sanidvyaman, Dave has depicted his own experiences of Yogi's miracles in an interesting manner. He has been writing columns in the Janbhoumi and the Janshakti, two Gujarati dailies on Yoga.

C.M.

DAVE,NARMADASHANKAR LALSHANKAR (Gujarati; b. 1833, d. 1886) better known to the people of Gujarat as Kavi Narmad, was born in Surat. In the short span of his life of about fifty three years, he became known as a poet, a patriot, a pioneer prose writer of great merit.

He studied at Surat and at Bombay in the college department of what was then called the Elphinstone Institution. During his studies under British teachers he developed a love for poetry and he himself began to write poems.

By the time he began to write the British had firmly established themselves in India, and they had brought with them their own literature, culture, and ways of living and looking at things. The young and impetuous Narmadashankar was very much influenced by all these trends and his life and literature bore the impress of all of them.

Looking at the success of the British in all spheres, his young mind began to feel that it was mostly due to their working through institutions that they are successful.So, at the age of seventeen, in 1850, he formed an institution of like-minded young men called 'The Institution of Young Men for Mutual Aid to Intelligence'. He presented before that institution in 1850 a paper entitled 'The Advantages of Forming Associations'. In 1851, he got that paper published. That became the first piece of respectable prose-writing in Gujarati, because, before that, most of the writing was done in verse.

He too began to write verse, but before that he had become a teacher in a small town, and also, had initiated some social reforms in his stratified society.

The poems that he wrote were in an entirely new vein. They dealt with nature, with subjective emotions, with the need for reforms in an orthodox society, with the plight of widows and many other subjects not touched by poets in Gujarati till then. All these poems were written in a new manner and with a new technique. Only one poet before him, Dalpatram, had written poems in a new vein, but his was a mixture of the new and the old, and his spirit was not of the then new and modern type. Narmadashankar's elan represented the new, not only in the choice of his subjects or the treatment and the technique of his writing, but also in the spirit of the whole thing.

Collections of his poems began to appear from 1858. By 1863, he had collected all his poems in two volumes entitled Narma Kavita. After 1863, he stopped writing poetry which he had started writing since 1855. His poetry writing lasted for a period of eight to nine years only, but the emotion he put into it (for him poetry was an outburst of emotion—Josso, as he called it), the subject matter he chose for it and the treatment he gave it, acquired for him the endearing title of Kavi (Poet). Since those days he is known as Kavi Narmad.

In spite of all his novelty and modernity, his poems had many faults. It was so because it was the work of a man who was breaking a new ground and treading a new path. Even his prosody was not what it should have been, because in his days there were no text books of prosody which could guide him.

Yet Narmadashankar was not a man who could be thwarted or defeated. He went to enormous lengths to find out books about Pingala Shastra (The Science of Prosody), and then wrote a small book about it called Pingala Pravesh (Elements of Prosody). This was in 1857. But prosody is not the only important thing in a poem. Alamkara (Ornamentation) is also an equally important part. He studied that also and in 1858 produced a book called Alamkara Pravesh (Elements of Alamkara). Moreover, in the Indian system of aesthetics Rasa plays a very great part. So he published a book called Rasa Pravesh in the year 1858.

Narmadashankar's hard work and great effort in gathering knowiedge and books about all these scholarly subjects were so tremendous that one bows his head down in respect when one realizes that with his meagre means he could gather all the material that he needed.

Even when he was busy with all these things, his campaign for social reform and his study of history and of the epics continued unabated. He married a widow when none could think of doing such a thing. He wrote books about the stories of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata and singlehanded he composed a dictionary of the Gujarati language calling it Narmakosha. He wrote grammar and history, he wrote about politics and social reform, he delineated the causes underlying the downfall of the Hindus and gathered his prose writings in a big book called Narmagadya.

His study of history and of the epics, and his personal experience of reforms and reformists had convinced him that he was on a wrong course. Without fear, then, in the last years of his life, he took a somersault and began to write against what he was writing and propagating until then. Now he began to write in praise of orthodoxy against which he had campaigned all his life, In 1886, the year of his death, he collected all these newer writings of his and published them in a book which he called Dharmavichar (Thoughts about Religion).

This reversal on his part had created quite a furore against him but he did not care as he had not cared earlier when the older section of the society was criticising him.

By the time he had died he had written about ninety books which contained poems, plays, history, stories from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. social reform, politics and social history. His autobiography Marihakikat (1866) is a unique contribution.

He has given to the people of Gujarat a great song about their land which they sing on all auspicious occasions.

Narmadashankar was not, perhaps, a great poet but he was a great pioneer.

Go.B

DAVE, T.N. (Gujarati; b. 1897) after receiving his M.A. degree in Sanskrit, joined Gujarat College as a Lecturer in Sanskrit and worked there for about 8 years, with small breaks. Thereafter he went to London for his Ph.D. studies. He worked under the guidance of linguist R.L. Turner and received his Ph.D. degree in 1931. Thereafter he worked at the School of Oriental Studies in London as a Lecturer in Gujarati from 1947 to 1956. After leaving London, he worked in several insititutions in Gujarat. He was Director of Research Institute at Dwarka for about five years.

Dave's pioneering contribution was in the field of Gujarati linguistics. His A Study of the Gujarati Language of the 16th century V.S. (1935) is based on an analysis of the language of the Nannasuri's Upadeshmala Balavbodha. It was the first old Gujarati text, grammatically analysed according to the modern historical method. Besides this, the etymological index given at the end of this work is an important contribution to the study of Gujarati lexicography. Another area in which Dave made a pioneering contibution was the study of Gujarati dialects. In some five esearch papers published from 1943 to 1948 in the journal of Gujarat Research Society he presented a linguistic survey of some border-land dialects of Gujarat based on his personal field-work. In this way, he gave a scientific and reliable account of three groups of dialects current in North Gujarat, some borderland dialects of South Gujarat and a few Bhili dialects. This was the first important study of Gujarati dialects after the .work of Grierson.

In 1948 he published a short monograph on the language of Gujarat, a revised edition of which was published in 1964 (The Language of Gujarat). It is a concise account of the historical development of Gujarati and it also gives for the first time a short but systematic description of modern standard Gujarati.

Dave had also helped Turner for collecting Gujarati lexical data in connection with the latter's monumental work, A Comparative Dictionary of the Indo-Aryan Languages. Besides these writings Dave has also written a Gujarati book and a few other research papers pertaining to historical or descriptive phonology, particularly of Gujarati. He was one of the brilliant students of Turner who advanced the study of new Indo-Aryan languages for which modern scientific principles and methods were used. His works in the linguistic study of Gujarati on modern lines can be described as a milestone in that area.

H.C.B.

DAWAR ARUNAI (Assamese, 1955) is a social novel by Jogesh Das. Set against the background of the second World War, this first novel by the author which has also been his best so far, reflects the evil effects of the War on the Assamese society which was directly affected by it.

The setting of the story is an upper Assam tea-estate and its adjoining areas. Of all the areas of present day Assam, the upper Assam districts were more affected by the War, these being nearer to the Naga Hills and Manipur which experienced the direct onslaught of the Japanese. Sighting of the Japanese war-planes, people hiding in the trenches on hearing war-raid siren, the Allied Army vehicles and men moving hectically along village roads, new roads coming up overnight for facilitating movements of armed force,the local people getting contracts or small jobs under big contractors and military suppliers earning money fabulously - such incidents and events form the backdrop of the story through which the social theme is revealed.

The story concerns an idealistic young man Bakhar—a school master by choice. A talented young man, he could well have gone to other lucrative professions and become rich. But Bakhar chooses to remain a teacher and live from hand to mouth with his honestly earned salary. On the other hand, his friends, his kith and kin around, are seen by him indulging in the new profession of contract, supply and commerce. They become rich overnight, even though most of them are of little or no talent and are of dubious character. Though compelling forces are there in Bakhar's private life, excuse enough for swimming with the current and earning easy money, he with his strong moral character, remains firm. But the society around him, drunk with the dream of money and gone thoroughly corrupt, would not leave him in peace. Even his own wife deserts him. False charges are brought against him by the corrupt elements; and his house, too, is set on fire. When his life is thus beset with perils of all sorts, and he suffers an ordeal for his ideal, the clouds of peril disappear from his sky. His wife realises his worth at this juncture-how he is really a bakhar-a jewel-and not a worthless one as she thought him to be, blinded by the glitter of money around her in the society. She now comes back to him to be his real partner in life.

There is also a sub-plot in the novel which highlights the theme further. Here we find a tea-estate labourer devoted to Bakhar. Simple and honest to the core, this labourer Bhim is very near to Bakhar in his ideal. Bhim, too, has to suffer in this society and his beloved is separated from him by the agents of this corrupt society. But in the long run, he also regains peace and his beloved as his master Bakhar does.

The novel with such a criticism of the contemporary society and an emphasis on moral and idealistic values, had a great appeal to the reader when it came out first in the fifties; and the author who had already earned reputation as a young short story writer became at once established as a talented novelist, too.

The story of the novel is told in a very simple and yet appealing language. Indeed this lucidity in style is the characteristic of Jogesh Das as a fiction writer. The plot of the novel, too, is devoid of apparent artifices, and the story free from any unnecessarily striking incident or development.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gobindraprasad Sarma, 'The Assamese Novel since the Fifties' in Littcrit (Vol. V, No.2, Dec. 1979), Trivandrum., Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Upanyasar Gatidhara (Gauhati, 1976).,

Go.S.

DAYANAND SARASWATI (Gujarati, Hindi b. 1824, d. 1883), the enlightened thinker and founder of the Arya Samaj, was born at Tankara, a town near Morvi in Saurashtra. His original name was Mulshankar Karsanji Trivedi. He was Audichya Sahasra Brahmin by caste. Ever since his childhood days, he cultivated a doubt about idolatry. His father was a worshipper of Shiva and on a 'Shivaratri' festival, Mulshankar, at the behest of his father, observed fast and offered prayers. Though barely thirteen, he did everything sincerely. But at the dead of night, he noticed that a rat, comfortably seated on the Shiva 'Pindi' was helping itself to the rice and the sweets. This episode seems to have jolted the faith of Mulshanker: if Shiva, the supposed killer of so many 'asuras', cannot chase even a rat away, then it must merely be a stone idol. Later, when he witnessed the sudden deaths of his sister and uncle, he developed indifference to the world. He set out on an extensive travel in various regions of India from 1846. He also visited Kumbh-Mela in 1855. All these travels, doubled his scepticism towards idolatry and religious rites and rituals.

From 1860 to 1863 Dayanand stayed at places like Mathura, Agra, and acquired proficiency in philosophy and Sanskrit grammar under the guidance of a Dandi Sadhu named Swami Vrajanand. It is said that at the time of Guru-dakshina, Swami Vrajanand. asked Dayanand to devote his life to the removal of darkness, born out of ignorance and to spread the vedic religion which had become extinct. He spent the period from 1864 to 1867 in deep and comprehensive study of the Vedas as well as their precise interpretation. He exposed a vast number of cases of heresy and hypocrisy in various religious sects as also the misdeeds of various personages attached to different sects and religious institutions. He visited many towns and cities in India, between 1867 and 1869, and finally came to Kashi (Benaras) in 1869, where he entered into debate and discussion about the meaning of scriptures with a great many scholars and religious leaders, and convincingly defeated them all. He went then to Calcutta in 1872. He continued his travels and launched a sort of systematic campaign to fight and remove what is known as blind sectarian or communal faith. During a span of fifty years, that is, upto 1874, he acquired intensive knowledge of the contemporary situation prevalent in India, and wrote a volume in Hindi, in order to explain his line of thinking, in a lucid and interesting style. This volume, titled Satyarth Prakash has also been translated into many other languages of India.

On 10 April, 1875, Dayanand established in Bombay the institution named 'Arya Samaj'. He enunciated ten basic tenets. The work of explaining the Vedic principles through books was also started. The books written by Dayanand in number is about thirty, the outstanding among which are: Satyarth Prakash, Rigvedadi Bhashya Bhumika, Rigveda Bhashya, Yajurveda Bhashya, Samskara Vidhi, Gokarunanidhi, Nighantu, Astadhyayi Bhashya, Vyabnabhanu,etc. He started writing books in Sanskrit, but later on switched over to Hindi. Dayanand also undertook many constructive activities for social awakening and prosperity. He established training centres for small industries, cottage industries, and the like. And, he wrote a great number of articles on various topics, such as rural economy, pastoral economy, cottage industry, etc. He helped in awakening the society, in general, for the achievement of independence. He used to arrange meetings and conferences at various places to spread his logical thoughts and ideas. He also received co-operation from many political and social thinkers of his time. He maintained contacts with the founder of Brahmo Samaj, Devendranath Tagore, Keshabchandra Sen, M.G. Ranade, etc. He also had discussions with Syed Ahmad Khan.

In July 1883, Dayanand visited Jodhpur. It is said that he liberated the ruler of the state from his infatuation for a prostitute, who in turn took her revenge by getting his milk poisoned. This poison is believed to have caused his death on 30 Oct, 1883 at Ajmer. However, the name of Dayanand Saraswati lives not only in India, but outside India as well, as an ideal religious teacher, a devoted social servant, a gifted writer and the founder of 'Arya Samaj'.

BIBLIOGRAHPY: Narendra Dave, Krantiguru Dayanand, (Gujarait, 1983); Dayanad—'A Pointer' towards Reassessment, (English 1983).

B.J. & Vi.S.

DAYARAM (Gujarati ; b. 1777, d. 1853). The era of Bhakti poetry which started with Narsingh Mehta in 15th century, ended gloriously with Dayaram, in 19th century. He was born at Chandod in South Gujarat, a town on the banks of river Narmada. His parents were devotees of Krishna and he inherited that rich tradition. His parents died when he was a child. He was brought up by his maternal grand parents. From his early childhood he used to join prayer meetings and his voice being melodious, he became very popular. At an early age, he used to compose devotional songs. At Dakor—a place of pilgrimage in Gujarat - he met one Ichhasanakar Bhatta, a scholar of Pusti sect, who noticing Dayaram's melodious voice and his devotion to Krishna made him his pupil, and converted him into an ardent follower of Pusti sect. Ichharsankar further inspired him to dedicate himself to Krishna, which resulted in imagining himself to be a love-lorn gopi and describing her various moods and sentiments. As desired by his teacher, Dayaram travelled thrice all over the country and visited Shrinathji 'the citadel of Pusti sect' seven times. These travels widened the horizons of his knowledge, and he mastered the languages of the different regions that he visited to such an extent that he composed poems in those languages. He has written poems in Brajbhasha, Marathi, Punjabi, Marwari, Sindhi and Urdu. Besides he had written many books in Brajbhasha Almost the whole of his youth was spent in travelling and the later part of his life he spent at Dabhoi, where daily he sang his devotional lyrics and the whole town thronged to hear him. By the time he died in 1853, modern era had started dawning, but he remained unaffected by its influence and that is why he is considered as the last poet of the mediaeval era in whom one finds all the beauty, richness, and glory of the mediaeval poetic tradition.

Dayaram has written several treatises on Pusti sect both in Gujarati and Brajbhasha. His Rasikavallabh explains the levels of Pusti sect. He has tried to establish superiority of the devotional approach of Vallabhacharya to the philosophical approach of Sankaracharya. He says that philosophy is a weak medium; powerful medium is undistracted devotion based on love; only those devotees who are favoured by Krishna are able to have a taste of that love. Such a devotee enjoys the fruit of total surrender to the lord. The book contains 109 padas and it is in the form of dialogue between the teacher and the pupil. Attitude of self righteousness and tendency to deride monism and use of undignified language turns this only treatise in Gujarati on Pusti sect into a second rate work, though Govardhanram in his book Classical Poet of Gujarati adjudged it as his best work. His second book on the sect is Bhakti Poshan. The book contains one hundred and one padas written in Chandraval metre and it states the importance of Bhakti, its different forms and types giving abundant illustrations, but the work lacks coherence. He has written two treatises Rasikranjan and Bhaktiranjan in Brajbhasha.

Dayaram was a devotional poet. He has used various poetic forms to express his devotion. He has also written longer narrative poems based on the incidents of the Mahabharata such as 'Rukmani Vivah' (marriage of Rukmini); 'Satyabhama Vivah' (marriage of Satyabhama); 'Ajamilakhyana' (story of Ajamil), 'Okhaharan' (abduction of Aniruddha by Chitralekha, friend of Usha, who fell in love with Aniruddha, grandson of Krishna. In Ballila, Patralila, Kamalila, Rasalila, Ruplila, Murlilila and Danchaturi he has described different facets of the life of Krishna in Gokul. Though the source of the incidents depicted is the Bhagavata the poet's flight of imagination and romantic faculties have a full scope, making these poems even more interesting than their originals.

His Premarasgita and Prempariksha (song of love and the test of love) respectively deal with Krishna's message to his foster parents and the maids of gokul not to insist on having a glimpse of Krishna but to take life philosophically. The answer of Radha and the maids of Gokul reflects the poetic brillance of the poet. They say:

Your Hari is omnipresnt, ours is only at one place,
You are satisfied with moon light, but we rejoice only if we get the moon.

Thus Dayaram has been able to establish the superiority of love to philosophy.

Dayaram is at his best in 'Garbis' (poems which are sung while dancing). There is abundant variety of situations and feelings centering round the love affair of Krishna with Radha and the milk-maids.

There is a suggestion in one of his poems that Radha and Krishna would embrace twice and thereby exchange their complexions. In another Garbi, Radha takes a vow that she will never touch anything that is black. Then she prepares a list of black things which she wants to avoid. At the end of the poem the poet gives fine psychological touch when she says: "It is only in words that, I have taken a vow, but my mind says, that it won't keep the word even for a moment".

Indeed, the poet has recreated all the charm of Gokul in his Garbis. "His poems on Krishna and the maids of Gokul are a stream of burning lava of realistic passion and love" says Govardhanram Tripathi.

Dayaram has composed some diadactic poems and though there is a preaching tone, they are not devoid of poetic value. In one of such poems he denounces a mere logician, who wants to approach God logically, and he says:

"How can a mere logician know the essence!
Though a container is full of ghee, it does not know the taste of ghee."

He wants to convey that though God is within us we are not able to know Him, because we try to seek him outside us.

He thus desires complete merger of individual will to the universal will.

The number of Dayaram's published works is 86. Out of which 64 are in Gujarati, 20 in Brajbhasha, 1 in Marathi and 1 in Sanskrit. Thus he was a voluminous writer and quality of his works in also very high.

C.M.

DE, BISHNU (Bengali; b. 1909, d. 1982) was a noted Bengali poet. Born in a well-known family of North Calcutta, he was educated in Sanskrit Collegiate School and St. Paul's College and later obtained the M.A. degree in English from Calcutta University. He started his teaching career in 1935 as a Lecturer in English at Calcutta's Ripon College, from where he moved to Presidency College and finally to Islamia College before retirement. He is generally considered as the most complex personality that modern Bengali poetry has so far produced. Marxist in approach but primarily an individualist, he combines an urge for humanism in the strictly contemporary sense of the term and a genuine, inner compulsion to remain aloof from the tumultuous society of the people. He has an astonishingly profound interest in lands and artistic traditions other than his own, yet very few of his counterparts in today's Bengal have been so deeply rooted in their social and cultural milieu as he has been. The paradox, which often characterises his work, is also his most distinguished quality. Without suggesting in the least any borrowed affinities one might say that if an Aragon, the French Marxist and poet, and a Mallarmé, the celebrated French poet and theoretician of poetry universally acknowledged as one of the masters of modern European poetry, could be rolled into one, the result would somewhat look like Bishnu De. Each new book of poems by him is a distinct footprint on the journey to that at least seeming paradox, and it must be said in his favour that he has never sacrificed the one for the other in order to be more easily and totally accepted either by the so-called "progressives" or by the aggressive "individualists". Added to this, he has an almost excessive reverence for Tagore's literature and the Tagorean ideal which, to some critics, may appear perplexing. Few living writers in Bengal, if any, have been inspired in their creative endeavour by such a great attachment to Tagore. Yet, what further adds to the growing confusion, either in his diction or in the depiction of his world, is that Bishnu De has always sought to identify with a very different literary tradition from Tagore's. T.S. Eliot, whose poetry he has translated, has also been for him a long and important literary inspiration. On the other hand, knowledge of and involvement with traditions other than merely literary have shaped his personality and contributed to his literature. For example, the art forms of his country, particularly the painting of Jamini Roy, of which he has been a known exponent, have influenced his thought and work considerably. While still a student, he was also initiated into some forms of Western classical music and in subsequent years his interest in the subject grew considerably. His first published writing, a short story entitled Puraner Punarjanma/Laksmana, appeared in 1928 in Pragati, a journal which used to be published from Dacca. The other magazine to which he has contributed regularly and devotedly is Parichay, the very first issue of which, published in 1931, carried two poems by him and his translation from Marcel Proust. His first book of poems was Urvasi o Artemis, published in 1933 and containing, in the beginning, two quotations from T.S. Eliot's The Sacred Wood. The Successive collections of poems which soon followed were Chorabali (1937) Purvalekh (1941), Sat Bhai Champa (1945), Sandviper Char (1947), Anvista (1950), Nam Rekhechi Komal Gandhar (1953), Alakhya (1958), (Tumi Sudhu Pachise Baisakh (1958), Smrti Satta Bhavisyat (1963), Ekus Bais (1965), Sei Andhakar Chai (1966), Rupati Panchasati (1967), Samvad Mulata Kavya (1969), (Itihas Traqik Ullase (1970), Ravi Karojjvala Nijadesh (1973), Isavasva Divanisa (1974), Chitrarup Matta Prithivi (1976), (Uttare Thako Mauna (1977). Among his essay collections are Ruchi O Pragati (1946), (Sahityer Bhavisyat (1952), Elomelo Jiban o Silpasahitya (1958), Sahityer Desh Bidesh (1962), Rabindranath-o-Silpasahitya Adhunikatar Samasya (1966), Michael o Rabindranath o Anyanya Jijnasa (1967), Jana-sadharaner Ruchi (1975), and Jamini Ray (1977). His translations from foreign literatures have also been published in several volumes: Samudrer Mauna (1946), translations of the anti-Fascist story Le Silence de la Mer by the French Writer Varcors; Elioter Kavita (1953), translations with an introduction, of eighteen poems by T.S. Eliot; He Bidesh Phul (1956), translation of poems by Mao-Tse Tung, Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Rimbaud, Apollinaire, Eluard, Aragon, Shakespeare, Lorca, etc.; Mao-Tse Tung: Atharoti Kavita (1958). (translation of eighteen poems by Mao-Tse Tung;) and Aphrikay Esiyay Murali Mridange Turye (1970), translation of fifteen poems by a few African writers published on the occasion of the Afro-Asian Writer's Conference. In addition he is also the author of the following books in English: The Paintings of Rabindranath Tagore (1958), India and Modern Art (1959), Satyendranath Bose/A Legend in His Life-time (1964) and In the Sun and the Rain/Essays on Aesthetics (1972). Honoured earlier by the Sahitya Akademi, he was also the recipient of the Jnapith Award in 1971.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Buddhadeva Bose, Kaler Putul-Calcutta 1946.

Lo.B.

DE, PANCHKARI (Bengali; b. 1873, d. 1945) was a famous pioneering writer of Bengali detective novels. His early education was in Bhawanipur, Calcutta. The topological features of his novels are also centered around Calcutta. He was, as he himself claimed, the first to introduce 'sensational novel' in the history of Bengali fiction. But much of that was based on the pattern of Conan Doyle: his Mayabini (1928), for example, did, in fact, introduce Sherlock Holmes for the first time in Bengali novels. In the structural design of the novel, the skill of weaving the incidents, shaping of the situations with thrill and shock, Panchkari was largely influenced by Conan Doyle. His much popular novel, Mayabini was a trilogy of Nar Nayani, Shathe Shathyam Samacharet and Pishachir Prem. 'Chithi Churi' was a detective story which was included in his novel Chhadmabesi (1955, 5th edn.) and which was dedicated to Rabindranath Tagore; the story, of course, was more for the children than for the adults. Panchkari De, however, used to write regularly in the literary journal, Galpa Lahari. He wrote more than thirty three novels, all of which were detective in genre. His writings earned him tremendous popularity. Almost all the leading journals praised these writings. These journals included Bangadarsan, Indian Empire, The Bengalee, etc. Some of his publications are: Parimal (1943), Selima Sundari (1955, 10th edn.), Sonit Tarpan, Bhishan Pratihimsa, Kalsarpi, Mrityu Bibhisika, Hatyakari Ke, Hatya Rahasya, Rahasya Biplab, Mrityu Rangini, Manorama, Naradham, Nilbasana Sundari, Hartaner Naula, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY S.C. Sen, Samsad Bangali Charitabhidhan (1976), S.K. Das, Bangla Chhotagalpa (1963).

Na.S.

DE, SUSHILKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1890, d. 1968) was a Sanskrit scholar and Bengali litterateur. Having passed the M.A. examination of the Calcutta University in English with a first class in 1911, Sushilkumar served the Presidency College, Calcutta and the Calcutta University upto 1923 as a lecturer in English. After obtaining Premchand Roychand scholarship of the University in 1919, Sushilkumar went to Europe for research and study. He got his D. Litt Degree from the University of London on his thesis on Sanskrit poetics. Thereafter, he studied Sanskrit at the University of Bonn under the celebrated Sanskrit scholar Herman Jacobi (1850-1937). On return to India, Sushilkumar joined the University of Dacca first as a Reader and then as a Professor of the Deptt. of Sanskrit and served in that capacity till his retirement in 1947. However, during his tenure of office at Dacca, Sushilkumar on request had to take leave for two years for editing the Drona and Udyaga Parvas of the critical edition of the Mahabharata under the aegis of Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Pune. From 1956-60 Sushilkumar served as the Head of the Deptt. of Bengali of the University of Jadavpur (Calcutta). Sushilkumar, a versatile scholar, specially distinguished himself for his studies on Vaishnavism, 19th century Bengali literature and Sanskrit poetics. He was also known as a poet of classical style in Bengali. Sushilkumar was invited by the Chicago University (U.S.A.) to deliver the Tagore Memorial lectures of the University in 1966. He also served as a member of the Sanskrit Commission instituted by the Govt. of India (1957-59). From early youth, Sushilkumar was connected with the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad in various capacities. For two terms in 1950 and 1960 he was elected its President. Sushilkumar earned various other honours both at home and abroad as a scholar of great erudition.

His other works include: The Early European Writers of Bengal, (Calcutta, 1915); History of Bengali Literature in the 19th Century, (Calcutta, 1915); Vakrokti Jivita (ed.) (Calcutta, 1923); Studies in the History of Sanskrit Poetics, (2 Vols., London, 1923-25); Ancient Indian Erotics and Erotic Literature, (Calcutta, 1929); Treatment of Love in Sanskrit Literature, (Calcutta, 1929); The Padyavali, (an anthology of Vaishnava verses in Sanskrit by Rupa Gosvamin) (ed.) (Dacca University, Dacca, 1934); Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, (Calcutta, 1942); Valma Pravada, (Collection of Bengali proverbs) (Calcutta 1945); A History of Sanskrit Literature (with S.N. Dasgupta, to Classical period) (Calcutta, 1947); Dinabandu Mitra, (Sarat Chatterjee Memorial Lectures delivered at the Calcutta University, Calcutta, 1951); Sayantani, (Poem) (Calcutta, 1954); Nana Nibandha, (Essays) (Calcutta, 1954); Krishna Dipika, (Collection of Sonnets in Bengal) (Calcutta, 1958); Sanskrit Poetics as a Study of Aesthetics (Tagore Memorial lectures at the University of Chicago, 1966).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.C. Banerjee & R.C. Hazra, Dr. S.K. De Memorial Vol. Calcutta, 1972.

G.S.

DEB,JALANDHAR (Oriya; b. 1873, d. 1952) was an essayist. He was related to the royal family of Bambara, a feudatory state of the then Orissa. Though he had to serve as a Diwan and a magistrate still he wrote a number of socio-religious essays. His discussion on pros and cons of marriage entitled Bibaha Bichara (The Choice in Marriage, 1928) had aroused interest in the minds of the readers. His essays like Veda-O-Hindudharma (The Vedas and Hinduism, 1952), Barna-O-Jatiyata (Caste and Creed) and Bhagava Gita bear testimony to his insight and wide range of study. Diaryra Kiyadansa (Some pages of Diary, 1952), a collection of essays on travel is also worthy of attention. Besides these, he also wrote a few short stories, some historical playlets (Uday Singha, 1934, Ranasinghankara Mahaprayana) and poems Meghabhabana (Thoughts on Cloud 1934), Asprisya (Untouchable woman, 1934). Jalandhar was noted for his liberal thinking and reflective essays.

BIBLIOGRPAHY: Ramachandra Brahma, Adhunika Odia Sahityaku Bambadar Dana ,Cuttack, 1977.

S.P.

DEB, NARENDRA (Bengali, b. 1888, d. 1971) was a versatile writer. He was intimately connected with the world of literature, theatre and cinema for half-a-century (1920-1970). He was a link between three generations of writers and popularly known as Naren-da.

He came of an aristocratic family, Dev-family of Thanthania in north Calcutta. His uncle Upendrachandra was a Derozian and father Nagendrachandra was a man with progressive views. In early youth Narendra Dev came in contact with the revolutionaries of Bengal through his cousin Rajendra Dev, but this connection was short-lived. He passed the Matriculation examination from Metropolitan School with credit, but ill health prevented him from joining college. He was a keen student of various subjects throughout his life.

Narendra Dev had a long career in the field of art and literature. He had connection with Rabindranath Tagore, Saratchandra Chattopadhyaya, Akshaykumar Baral, Rajanikanta Sen, Kazi Nazrul Islam, Satyendranath Dutta, Pramatha Chaudhuri, Mohitlal Mazumdar and Sishir kumar Bhaduri. He had close ties with Bharati, Kallol and Krittibas groups.

Narendra Dev was the president of P.E.N. West Bengal Branch, Sishu Sahitya Parishad, Sarat Samity and Sahitya Tirtha. He was elected twice vice-president of the Bangiya Sahitya Parisad.

Narendra Dev edited the weekly Nachghar (devoted to the cause of Bengali Theatre), weekly Bioscope (devoted to the cause of Bengali cinema) and Pathsala (Childrens monthly) for 15 years.

He visited western European States and attended the International P.E.N. Congress in Edinburgh in 1950. Again he visited eastern European States and attended the World Peace Congress at Helsinki in 1955. He had a close connection with Sherwood Anderson, Stephen Spender, Agatha Christie, Elia Ehrenburg and Mikhail Solokov. He received three literary prizes—Mauchak Puraskar (1964). Bhubaneswari, Gold Medal and Sisirkumar Puraskar (1971).

His first writing, a poem was published in the Sandhya edited by Brahmabandab Upadhyaya. His first novel was Garmil, first book of poems Basudhara and the first collection of stories Chaturvedashram. He wrote short stories, novels, poems, songs, plays, travelogues, essays and juvenile writings with equal grace and facility. Moreover he wrote satirical sketches under the pen-name 'Manabendra Sur'. Sisirkumar Bhaduri produced a play for children, Phuler Aina on the board of the Theatre. This was written by Narendra Dev.

He wrote a treatise on cinematic arts as early as 1934. This book, Cinema, is the pioneering work on lthe subject in Bengali. He coined a good number of Bengali technical terms for this book.

Narendra Dev published 36 titles of which four were translations in verse (among them are Meghaduta and Omar Khyyam), one scientific treatise on cinema, one book of belles-letters, one book of poems, three collections of short stories Chatur Vedashram, Bojhaparha, and Suhasini, one biography (on Saratchandra), three travelogues, nine novels, one play, eight books for children, and four edited collecions of stories, poems and memories (Katha Shilpa, Kavya Dipali, Sonar Kathi and Sarat Bandana).

Narendra Dev married a young widow Radharani Datta in the early twenties, This created a stir in the then Bengali society of Calcutta. Rabindranath and Saratchandra came on their own to bless the newly wed couple. Their only issue is a daughter—Navanita. All of them have been devoted to literature and arts.

A.M.

DEB, RADHAKANTA (Bengali; b. 1783, d. 1867) was an orthodox Hindu socio-religious leader of the early 19th century. He belonged to the royal family of Sova Bazar, Calcutta; his father was Gopimohan Deb, son of famous Raja Nabakrishna Deb. He received early education from Calcutta Academy and in the process learnt Sanskrit, Arabic and Persian. Radhakanta was associated with the elite of the 19th century Bengal of his time. He was actively associated with many socio-cultural organisations and educational institutions. He succeeded his father as the director of Hindu College (1817). He was deeply connected with this socially important institution for long thirty-five years; and it was due to his continuous effort that the Bengali department started functioning in Hindu College from 1839. But since Kalidas Basu, a teacher and Gurucharan Sinha, a student were converted into Christianity by some missionary, Radhakanta, on protest resigned from the institution in 1850. Radhakanta Deb took keen interest in the educational system of our country. He founded Hindu Charitable Institution in 1846. Bhudeb Mukhopadhyay, and Debendranath Tagore, the two socio-literary giants of the 19th century, extended their generous support; and with all co-operation of Matilal Seal and Rajendraalal Dutta, he founded Metropolitan College, the first national college in Calcutta. Radhakanta was the president and Debendranth Tagore was the secretary of the college.

It was quite interesting to note that though a conservative, Radhakanta had shown a great deal of interest in female education and though he himself did not like to send the girls out for schooling, he had founded a girls' school at his house and helped financially in bringing out a book on female education, Stri Shiksha Vidhayak by Gaurmohun Vidyalankar.

It was again chiefly through strenuous effort of David Hare and Radhakanta Deb that Calcutta School Society was founded on 1st September, 1818. Radhakanta was the secretary of this organisation and he used to supervise many English teaching schools, specially from Central and North Calcutta. He was also an influential member of the School Book Society (1817) where he used to select Bengali school texts. He would often recommend generous financial help to the Hindu students for going to England for higher studies.

He wrote some important articles on agricultural science; one such article on horticulture written in Persian was translated into English and was sent to the Royal Horticultural Society of Britain for which Radhakanta earned a lot of reputation at home and abroad. He advocated education through mother-tongue even in the studies of sciences. He desired to establish some agricultural as well as industrial educational institutions.

He had also great interest in Sanskrit education. He was a member of the executive committee of the Calcutta Sanskriti college during 1836-37. He gave generous donation for the development of Sanskirt Primary schools of Bengal. In this direction his highest achievement was a compilation work of encyclopaedic nature, known as Sabdakalpadrum. It took him long thirty-three years to complete it in seven volumes. The first volume was published in 1818 and the last volume in 1858. An abridged edition was published in 1827, and the supplement was brought out in 1858. Radhakanta engaged all foremost Sanskirt scholars to get this voluminous work done comprehensively. He was praised and honoured by many societies and individuals including the Royal Asiatic Society. He was honoured by Lord Amherst with 'Khelet' and 'Sherpeth' on 7th February, 1824, and a special function was held in Agra where the governor of the then North Western province felicitated him. He was awarded the title of Rajbahadur in 1837, and K.C.I.S.I. on 30th April, 1866. Radhakanta took initiative to felicitate Rev.Long for his patriotic role in the indigo-movement. He also took part in the land law movement. He spent the last three years of his life in Vrindaban.

His literary contributions are: Nitikatha (1818) (This book was, however, jointly written with Tarinicharan Mitra, and Ramkamal Sen. It consisted of thirty-one stories translated from English and Arabic into Bengali); Bangla Shiksha Grantha (1821) (Its abridged form was published in 1827. This was a book of Bengali spelling after Lindley Musay's plan. It included alphabets, grammar, history, geography and elementary mathematics); Padavali (Vols. 1 & 2, 1864-67).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.N. Bandyopadhyay, (ed). Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala (Vol. 2 book No. 20) (1947), S.K. De, Bengali Literature in Nineteenth century (1962).

Na.S.

DEB, SACCHIDANANDA TRIBHUBAN (Oriya; b. 1872) was the eldest son of Vasudev Sudhal Dev, the renowned ruling chief of Bamra, a Feudatory state of Orissa. He was particularly interested in art, literature and music from his adolescent period and through his effort two cultural associations named Bamra Chhatra Samity (Student's society of Bamra) and Sahitya Alochana Sabha (An association for literary discussion) were set up at Debgarh, the capital of Bamra. He earned proficiency in Sanskrit, Bengali, Hindi and English.

In 1903, after the death of his father, Sacchidananda became the ruler of the State. He was a patron of learning and culture. He used to invite the poets, scholars of Orissa, Bengal, Madhya Pradesh and Madras to his capital and honour them by offering titles and certificates of merit. Incidentally, Fakiramohan, the eminent novelist of Orissa and Lochanprasad Pandeya, the eminent Hindi writer were given the titles of 'Saraswati' and 'Kavya Vinod' in his court.

Most of his poetical works are romantic in nature written in imitation of the style of poet Radhanath. His language is refined, ornamental and dignified. His Alankara Sora is a work on prosody and poetics written on the basis of Sanskrit poetics and Kadambari is a poetical rendering of Sanskrit Kadambari of Banabhatta. His Bristi Vigyana is a treatise on Meteorology, the first of its kind in Oriya language. His travelogue Bhramana Brittanta and prose work Rasa Rahasya shows his refined and ornamental prose-style.

FURTHER WORKS: Maya Sabari, 1894., Ananga, 1894., Vishma, 1894., Chandra Duta, 1899., Chitra, 1910., Sundari, 1911., Prakriti, 1911., Jouna Nirbachana, 1912., Abahana, 1913.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. Praharaj, Oriya Vasa Kosa, 1941., R. Brahma, Adhunik Oriya Sahityaku Bamrara Dana, 1977.

J.B.M.

DEDICATION (Telugu) It has become customary in Telugu literature for a poet to dedicate his work to a 'Kriti Pati' or patron. Such a custom was not in vogue in Sanskrit literature. Sri Paravastu Ramavuji Swamy mentions in his book Andhras and Sanskrit Literature that Vidyanad decicated his book on Rhetorics, Pratapa Rudriyam to Pratapa Rudra II (of 13th century). No doubt many shlokas in that work were in praise of Pratapa Rudra, but it does not suggest the dedication in any explicit matter. Rajanadha Dindima Bhattu, a poet in the court of Atchyuta Dava Raya wrote Bhagavatnam in Champu form (Sanskrit) and dedicated it to his king. This may clearly show the influence of Telugu poetic custom. The ancient Kannada poets had a tradition of dedicating their works to either kings or to their gurus. Even in Tamil, seeking the King's favour through dedication was not unknown.

The earliest work in Telugu, Nannaya's Mahabharatam does not contain any word of dedication. He did not make any special mention of Raja Raja as his patron nor can be found anywhere, either in the foreword or epilogue any verses of blessing, well-wishing or even a mere description of his family. But verses at the end of the cantos suggest that the king was his partron.

We can say Nannechoda was the poet who started this poetic tradition of dedication in Telugu. He dedicated his poetic work Kumarasambhava to his Guru, Jangama Mallikarjuna. The poet successfully established the non-duality between his teacher and the lord Shiva. Under the pretext of singing about Shiva, the poet sang the praises of the patron. The poet here was following the tradition of the Kannada poets bringing the non-duality beteen the patron and the subject of the poem. Nannechoda appears to be unique in Telugu literature in establishing such similarity between the hero and the patron. Similarly he is the first to dedicate the work to his teacher, though there was the tradition in Telugu of dedicating works to religious heads. Simhadri Venkatacharya dedicated his work Chamatkara Manjari and Lakshmana Parinayam to Varadacharya, renowned among the Vaishnava heads.

Phulkuriki Somana mentions the names of three auditors to three of his works—Godagi Thripurari for his Anubhava Saram, Gobburi Sanganamatya for his Basava Purana and Palkurki Suranamatya for his Panditaradhya Charitra. There is a speciality in the last work. It is dedicated to Lord Basaveshwara, but is recited to a mortal man. This clearly shows the deep devotion of the poet. In the beginning and the end of each canto of the last two works, there is a clear mention of the auditors.

Pothana wrote his Virabhadra Vijayam with his teacher Ivaturi Somana as auditor. Batchu Siddha Kavi of 17th century wrote his Mari Basava Purana with Sangaya as auditor. But this has not become established as a tradition in Telugu literature.

With Ranganadha Ramayana started the tradition of dedicating the work to the 'Kritipati' or patron. Kona Buddha Bhupati was asked by his father Vittalnadha to write a book and make his name immortal in this world. His own sons Kacha Vibhudu and Vitthalnadhudu together wrote Dwipadothara Ramayana and dedicated it to their father Buddha Bhupati. Gowrana wrote Navanadha Charitra in the name of his patron Mallikarjuna. Avachi Tippaya Setty asked his boyhood friend Srinadha to write a Shaiva work in his name and Srinadha wrote Hara Vilasam and dedicated it to him. Thus in Telugu literature was established the tradition of a poet (Kriti Karta) writing a work and dedicating it to the patron (Kriti pati).

This roused the ambition among kings, ministers, and commanders-in-chief to encourage one poet or the other to write a work and dedicate it to them. By the time of Thikkana this tradition was well-established and Vinnakota Peddana (1402) wrote in his Kavyalankara Chudamani that by now poets were very greatly honoured.

The tradition slowly took a new turn: the poet was the father, the poetic work the bride and the patron the bridegroom. The prolific writer Thikkana was addressed by king Manumasiddhi as 'mama' (father-in-law) and the poet made the relationship come true literally, by offering his Nirvachanottara Ramayana to him as bride. The poet says that Lord Hariharanadha appeared in his dream and begged him to offer his Bharatam in dedication to him. Even gods were attracted by these 'Kavita Kanyakas' (literary brides). Manchana wrote Keyurabahu charitra at the request of his dear friend Manduri Gundaya and dedicated it to him. Thikkana's disciple Marana dedicated his Markandeya Puranam to Gannaya, the commander-in-chief of Kakatiya Pratapa Rudra. Thus the practice spread wide among members of royal court receiving poetic works in dedication in the post-Tikkana period.

Reddy Kings were the greatest patrons of poetry. They honoured and maintained poets and scholars. Mukku Thimmana dedicated his Parijatapaharanam to Srikrishna Deva Raya without being requested. So did Saluva Narasimha Rayulu recive Jaimini Bharatam and Saluvabhyudayam. Raghunadha Nika was not only a poet, but he received other's poetic works in dedication.

A Pandya King Muddalghari (1670) accepted the dedication of Satya Bhama Swantanam and Rukmini Parinayam by Linganamakhi Kameswara Kavi. Under the patronage of the same king, Ganapavarapu Venkata Kavi wrote Vidyavati Dandakam.

Srinadha always used a new work of his as a lever to get him into any Samsthana. When he wanted to enter the court of Pedakomati Vema Reddy, he dedicated his Sringara Naishadham to his minister Mamidi Singana. He dedicated his Bhimeshwara Puranam to their minister Bandapudi Annamantri, so that he can enter into the court of Vema Virabhadra Reddy of Rajahumundry. Similarly he dedicated his Hara Vilasam to Avachi Thippaya Setty, Treasurer-in charge of spices and cosmetics in the court of the king of Komaragiri, and his Kasi Khandam to Virabhadra Reddy. He outlined the history of the Reddy kings only with the express wish of getting into their good books. He followed this pattern in the introuction, dedication and the prologue and epilogue of each canto of his works.

The notable among Reddy Kings who have honoured and patronised poets and received from them poetic works in dedication are Dodda Reddy, and Raghava Reddy. While the former received Shiva Leela Vilasam of Nissanka Kommana, the latter received Vishnu Purana of Vennalaganti Surana.

To name a few more dedications: Saluva Narasinga Rayulu (1485-93) received Jaimini Bharatham from Pillalamarri Pina Veerabhadrudu; Saluve Thirumala Raju received Vipranarayana Charitra from Chadaluvada Mallana; Vejerla Gopamanthri received Hairavana Charitra from Madayya Kavi. It is a noteworthy fact that even music and dance teachers were considered fit to receive 'krits' in dedication during the Vijayanagra days.

We come to know that even the queens in the Araviti dynasty patronised poets. Andugula Venkaiah wrote in his Rama Rajiyam dedicated to Kodanda Rama Raju, that the wife of Araviti Tirumala Raju, who wrote a Dwipada Ramayana, patronised poets and received works in dedication.

It is quite remarkable that even Muslim rulers patronised Telugu poets and received works in dedication. Addanki Gangadhar was the first among such poets. He dedicated his Thapati Samvaranopakhyanam to Malkibharam. He mentioned in his work that Malkibharam had received more than one work in dedication. Pannikanti Teleganna, urged by Marimganti Appanna, dedicated his Yayathi Charitram to Amir Khan, an officer in Malkibharam's court. Though Thelaganna dedicated his work to a Muslim, he did not lose the freedom of his faith by any false praises showered on his patron.

Though Thikkana and Rama Raja Bhushana dedicated the earlier works to mortals, later they resented the practice and offered their poetic brides to gods of their choice. But they did not talk ill of royalty. Some poets did this while offering their poetic works to gods, maybe because their approaches to those kings were spurned. Pothana, for instance offered his earliest work Bhotini Dandakam to Singa Bhupala, but in his later work Bhagavatam he denounced the kings as mean and deparaved.

Religious heads of Mathams and Pithams encouraged and patronised poets and received work in dedication In Shrishailam there was a 'math' of beggars and its head Santha Bhiksha Vritti instructed his servent Santayya to seek the dedication of a work from Srinadha. This can be seen in the introduction (avatarika) to Sivaratri Mahathmyam. Santa Bhiksha Vritti himself accepted Gowrana's Navanadha Charitra, dedicated to Lord Mallikarjuna.

There are sons who dedicated their works to their fathers on request. Ranganatha Ramayana is the first of its kind. Damerala Vengala Nayaka, inspired by Lord Sri Rama, seen in his dream, wrote Bahulashwa Charitra and dedicated it to his father Venkatadhisia. Pingali Surana dedicated his Prabhavati Pradyumnam to his father Amaranamathy. Bhosla Ekoji (1736) dedicated his Dwipada Ramayana to his father Thuluja Bhupala.

Savaram China Narayana wrote his witty work Kuvalayaswa Charitra and dedicated it to his foster father Pada Narayana. Araviti king Thirumala Raju asked Donuri Koneru Nadha Kavi to dedicate his Bala Bhagavatam to his father Rama Raju Thimmaraju

It can be seen in the forewords to many kavyas how poets dedicated their works to one god or the other inspired by their forefathers. Instances are there where the patron himself asked the poet dedicate a work to god.

Even Lords of various Samsthanas in the pre-In dependence India accepted dedications. In the more recent times poets, prose writers, propounders of philosophies, and writers of many other literary forms have dedicated their works to their parents, teachers, well wishers, friends or other artists and so on. Sri Viswanatha Satyanarayan dedicated his Andhra Prasati to his dear friend Mallampalli Somasekhara Sarma. To this same great historian of Andhra C. Narayana Reddy offered his Karpoora Vasanta Rayulu in dedication. In such offerings only deep respect and love but no ulterior monetary considerations are involved. In the post-Independence period, we see writers offering their works in dedication to ministers, officials and the moneyed people with an eye to some personal gains. In a way the history of dedication in Andhra literature is also in effect the history of patrons of letters in Andhra.

V.S.C.

DEEP, VED PAL (Dogri; b. 1929) is an eminent Dogri poet, also called the 'Ghalib' of Dogri poetry on the strength of his Ghazals. He started writing poetry in Hindi in the forties while still at college in Jammu and published four booklets of his poems which made him popular in college circles. He changed over to Dogri, his mother-tongue, when he was the editor of the Dogri section of the college magazine for about 2 years. His early compositions which were full of great promise first appeared in a collection of poems of 12 Dogri poets called Jago Duggar published by Dogri Sanstha Jammu in 1949. He did his M.A. (Hindi) from Lucknow University. He continued to write poetry in Dogri and participate in 'Kavi Sammelans' and literary get-togethers. His selected poems were published in Madhukana, the third volume of selections of Dogri poets, brought out by the J & K Academy of Art, Culture and Languages. In the meantime he was married to the first Dogri poetess Padma Sharma in 1957. Some years later they were separated. As Te An Banjare Lok, a collection of his ghazals came out in 1968. The book contains some of the choicest ghazals of Dogri covering the whole gamut of human emotions like love, suffering, frustration, patience and commitment to social upliftment. They reveal Vedpal 'Deep' as a man of deep and abiding love, sincere and committed, full of courage and dignity. His poems, though few and published in Dogri journals only, show him as a poet of fine sensibility, wide human sympathies and creative imagination. Some of these poems are 'Kala Mahnu' on the struggle of Negroes for emancipation, 'Nana Juga' on the simmering of a new age of hope, 'Geet Mera', 'Ikkaila Nayin' on Indo-Pak and Sino-Indian wars and 'Badalen Nain Sijji Ri Sanjha '

Ved Pal 'Deep' is a prominent leftist leader of Jammu but his poetry is largely free from political ideology and propaganda. He has been editor of an Urdu weekly, the organ of Communist Party, Jaddo Jahad and joint edito. of English daily Kashmir Times. He has translated poems from English and Kashmiri and edited a selection of Dogri poems. His Lall's Bachanamrit, translation of poems of Lall Ded was published in 1980. And Azadi Bad Di Dogri Kavita, selection of Dogri poems edited by him, was published by the J & K Academy in 1982. He has been presented with a robe of honour for his services rendered to Dogri by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy.

Sh.

DEKA, HALIRAM (Assamese b. 1901, d. 1962) was an Assamese short story writer and the first Assamese novelist in the epistolary form. Born in a lower middle class family living in a village, he was the first Assamese Chief Justice of a High Court. He passed his Matriculation Examination from Cotton Collegiate School, Gauhati in 1917 and graduated from Cotton College, Gauhati with Honours in Mathematics. He secured first class in M.A. in Bengali from Calcutta University and had his law degree from the same. He was an advocate in the Calcutta High Court for about fifteen years and then joined Assam state government service in 1946. In 1950 he was appointed a Justice of the Assam High Court from which position he was promoted to the post of the Chief Justice of the same High Court in 1961.

Alakalai Chithi (Letters to Alaka, 1948), a novel in the form of letters is his first work, and the first epistolary novel in Assamese. Deka has shown here his power of reflecting the action and reaction in the mind of his characters. The story element which is unfolded through letters is sparse, though the internal feelings and emotions get well reflected. The novel is important from the point of view of its internalised action against as the large number of novels in Assamese of external action. His second work of this kind is Arunalai Chithi (Letters to Aruna, published posthumously in 1967). This is more a collection of personal essays in the form of letters written to the writer's beloved of the past than an epistolary novel proper. A more or less common theme in these letters binds them together; and there is not a plot built up or a story told. The common theme highlights the importance of the natural feelings, a moral concern, and a sympathetic heart for all people. His writings are however rich in wit and humour interspersed with occasional satire.

Yatkinchit (A Little) is another work of Haliram Deka under the pseudonym Chitrasen Yakhariya. It is a collection of satirical essays through which the author criticises the weakness, selfishness and pride of man. His skilful use of wit and humour makes these essays readable. These essays were first published in the magazine, Abahon. Haliram Dekar Chuti Galpa Samkalan is (1974) his only collection of short stories published in book-form posthumously, though all these stories were published in various Assamese magazines during Deka's life-time. In his short stories a satirical tone and a despondent mood recur frequently. Though some of his short stories seem to be light-hearted, yet in some others Deka proves himself to be a serious writer with marked conflicts, both external and internal. His language is always lively and suitable to the occasion. Calicuttai Mok Ki Sikale (What did Calcutta teach me), an autobiographical essay about his early life in Calcutta was also published posthumously in a special issue of the magazine Nilachal in 1971.

Though not a voluminous writer, Deka displays intellectual brilliance and witticism in his writings that generally evince a social concern. From this point of view, Haliram Deka holds an important place in Assamese literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Sahityar Samiksatmak Itibrittva, Gauhati, 1981; Trailokyanath Goswami, Adhunik Galpa-Sahitya, Gauhati (2nd Edn.), 1972.

An.S.

DEKA, HAREKRISHNA (Assamese; b.1945) is basically a poet. His collections of poems are: Swarabor and Ratir Shobhayatra (1981) Harekrishna Deka belongs to that group of neo-romantic poets in Assamese who appeared in the sixties of the present century. Unusual images, symbolic language and a restricted mode of expression mark his poetry. His technique is somewhat novel, language pregnant with thoughts and emotion. He has made dramatic use of the spoken words of the common man, his images express the awareness of the crisis of the modern man in the vortex of modern materialistic civilization.

An MA in English and a senior officer in Indian Police Service, his poetry expresses unusual experience of life in a language of unusual rhythmic beauty.

Some of the poems included in his latest collection, Ratir Shubhajatra, like 'Ata Sinaki Station', 'Bara Basarar Pasat', 'Guwahatit Ratipuwa' 'Sarai Ghatar Dalangar Para', 'Ratir Sahar Parikrma', 'Rail Station', are expressive of the pain of his realistic experience, a deep awareness of social milieu, a sort of lonelines which is more social than individual. In the recently published poems, Deka seems to have come out of the beaten track of his symbolic poetry.

Deka is also a successful short story writer. His stories published in various literary magazines of Assam express his varied experience of life, his deep conviction that life of the humblest of the humble is not a life wasted.

DEKA, HITESH (Assamese b. 1928) is a popular Assamese novelist. Born in a poor village family, he passed Matriculation from Sarthabari High School, and B.A. from Nalbari College. A freedom fighter, he had to go underground for three years during the freedom movement. He is a secondary school teacher by profession and is at present the Assistant Headmaster of Jalukbari High School. He started his literary career as a short story writer but soon concentrated on the novel. He has to his credit two collections of short stories viz. Prayashchitta 1949) Gadakhahaniya (Erosion, 1954) and nine novels Ajir Manuh (A Man of to-day, 1952), Natun Path (New Path, 1954), Mati Kar (Who owns the Land, 1956), Bhara Ghar (Rented House, 1958), Eyeto Jivan (This is Life, 1960), Simar Kajiya (Quarrels for a Boundary, 1962), Asal Manuh (The real Man, 1964) Bairi Manuh (The Enemy, 1965), and Jivan Samghat (Conflict of Life, 1969). Besides these novels, Deka also attempted plays and his two plays are: Mantrir Hukum (The Order of the Minister, 1970) and Asamir Pranar Katha (Intimate feelings of Asami, the motherland, 1971).

Though in the main a popular novelist, Deka's novels have generally a social overtone. Though he attained artistic success even with such an overtone in his first novel viz. Ajir Manuh which has been his best, , in others he seldom shows this kind of success in blending art and social ideal.

In Ajir Manuh, the young idealist hero Pratap feels frustrated in his emotional life as well as in living according to his ideal. He fails to marry his beloved who is in sympathy with his ideal and then suffers from the mental torture of marrying and living with one who cannot understand his Gandhian socialist ideal. The construction and development of the plot of his second novel, Natun Path, resemble those of the first; and the theme, too, bears the same social overtone. But it remains an inferior work of art. Mati Kar asserts the need for identification with the permanent inhabitants of the state and the problems of those who migrate to Assam and settle here.

Eyeto Jivan is another important novel by Deka that needs special mention. A large novel in three volumes, this shows the sweetness and harmony that lie in a traditional joint family in an Assam village. Technically, however, it is not flawless. It has quite a few sub-plots; and all of them do not adequately contribute to the development of the main plot.

As a social novelist, Deka brings into his novels the common maladies of the society like corruption of offices, ignorance of the ordinary village people that makes them superstitious and the like. At the same time he shows the innocence, simplicity and religiosity of these village folk. Though Deka shows thus a concern for the poor and ignorant villagers, he does not always attain artistic success here. His language, too, is rather simple and straightforward which is more suitable for non-fictional prose. This comment is not applicable, however, in the case of his first novel.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Satyendranath Sarma–Asamiya Upanyasar Gatidhara, Bani Prakas, Gauhati, 1976.

An.S.

DEOKOTA, LAXMI PRASAD (Nepali; b. 1909, d. 1959) is one of the great three of Nepali literature, the other two being Lekhnath Paudyal (1884–1965) and Balkrishna Sama (1902–1981). He graduated in 1928 and passed law in 1934 from Patna. He loved writing and led a life of hardship and penury lightened, however, by the high regard of the literary community.

The corpus of his literary writings include five mahakavyas (epics), fifteen khanda-kavyas (partial epics), two plays, one novel, two collections of essays, one of short stories and several volumes of poems. All of his writings have not been collected or published yet. His greatness is not measured by counting the number of books he wrote. He could, when challenged, produce a full-fledged epic Sulochana in ten days, dictate at a single sitting a khanda-kavya Aasu, or dictate a collection of short stories in about four hours. It is in the flight of his imagination soaring on wings of his ever fresh and innovative language that we feel Deokota in his essence. Rahul Sankrityayan, rightly described him as an aggregation of Pant-Prasad-Nirala and more.

Muna-Madan (1936) composed in the Nepali 'Ghyawre' folk metre, narrates the story of Madan who leaves for Lhasa to trade and secure happiness for his family only to return after years filled with vicissitudes of suffering to find himself a bereaved husband. By its quality of poetic imagination, evocation of mythic folk theme and making a literary use of the commonly sung 'ghyawre' folk tune Muna-Madan has endeared itself to a very wide segment of the reading public.

Of his five voluminous epics, Shakuntala and Pramithas exhibit the tour de force of his epic power.

If his plays, short stories and novel do not come up to the first order, his essays undoubtedly do. He had pondered deeply and long over the art of essay writing as his preface to the Laxmi Nibanda Sangraha (1945) evidences. As a master essayist he is of the order of the most renowned of the English romantic essayists.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kumar Bahadur Joshi, Mahakavi Deokota Ra unka Mahakavya, 1974., Nityaraj Panday, Mahakavi Deokota, 1960.,Paras Mani Pradhan, Laxmiprasad Deokota (In English), 1978., Ram Mani Risal, Nepalika Kahi Aadhunik Sahityakar, 1969.

M.D.R.

DERASARI, DAHYABHAI (Gujarati; b. 1857, d. 1938) has written several books on science. He was a scholar of Gujarati literature. His work Haridharma Satak (1878) is a satire on the religious rituals but it is without any sting. His second book Bulbul (1882) is a longer poem of four hundred lines, in which there is a happy blending of metres of Urdu and mediaeval Gujarati poetry. His third book Chameli is written in Harigeet metre which was in vogue in mediaeval period. The speciality of his poetry is that poems are musical and melodious. But the book that established him as a great scholar is Sathinan Sahityanun Digdarshan (a survey of the literature of sixty years–1840 to 1900) in which he has analysed the literature of the time giving its background and merits and demerits. In 1913 he edited mediaeval Gujarati historical poem Kahanade Prabandh, which throws light on qualities of his research. He has compiled a dictionary of mythological stories in his Pauranik Kathakosh (1927-31). He has also made a research on the contribution of Gujaratis to Hindi literature and his findings saw the light of the day in his book Gujaratioe Hindi Sahityaman Apelo Ralo (1937). He has also written a satirical novel Ek Ghodani Atmakatha (autobiography of a horse).

P.V.

DEROZIO, HENRY LOUIS VIVIAN (English; b. 1809, d. 1831) was the first Indian poet in English, and was a leading spirit during the early Bengali renaissance in letters. The earliest biography of Derozio appeared in the Calcutta Review in 1881, and was published under the title Henry Derozio: The Eurasian Poet, Teacher and Journalist in 1884. There are other pamphlets which throw light on Henry's life: Madge's Derozio's Life gives more details of his life; F.B. Bardley Birt's A Forgotten Anglo-Indian Poet, published by Oxford University Press in 1923 is another source book. Henry was the second of the five children of Francis Derozio and his British wife Sophia, sister of Arthur Johnson, an indigo planter in Bhagalpur. He was born in 1809 and died of cholera in 1831 at the age of twenty-two.

Henry studied under a Scotsman, David Drummond, but he left school very early, at the age of fourteen. He took up a clerical job which he gave up soon and landed in the indigo plantation at Bhagalpur owned by his uncle Arthur Johnson. The early influence of his mother and teacher seems to have helped to establish the dimensions of his thinking and writing and he wrote The Fakir of Jungheera, a Metrical Tale (1828) inspired by the gigantic rock rising out of a river and woven around Nalini, a young Brahmin widow. This poem launched him on his rewarding poetic career; he came into contact with John Gant, Editor of The Examiner who helped him to get an important position in The Indian Gazette in 1826; and in November of the same year he was appointed Professor of History and English Literature in Hindu College (now known as Presidency College), where he formed a sort of discussion centre called the Academic Association, which attracted, among others, Raja Ram mohan Roy. The weekly meetings did much to stir the intellectual life of Calcutta. But his progressive ways and his aggressive views on orthodoxy and superstition were not tolerated. Hence his days as professor were soon to end.

The Calcutta of Derozio's days was intellectually alive; there were a number of literary magazines which fostered aspiring writers. Derozio himself was the editor of the Kaleidoscope for a year and, on his resignation from the Hindu College, he became a journalist and launched a paper called The East-Indian. This gave him freedom to propagate free thought and condemn superstitions like the 'Sati', which he had attacked in his early poetry.

His most famous poem still is the Fakir of Jungheera in two cantos, each of about a thousand lines. The poem deals with the fierce conflict between a Hind widow's sense of religious duty and her desire to live. Nalini is a widow soon to be burnt dutifully as her religion decreed. But she is soon carried away by a robber chief to be his wife. A battle ensues, and he is killed. Nalini is a widow once again and unable to bear her sorrow, she dies on the battlefield. This is a poem of great metrical virtuosity. The chorus of women persuades her to climb the funeral pyre:

> Happy! thrice happy! thus early to leave
> Earth and its sorrows, for heaven and its bliss!

It is a narrative poem of suspense, excitement, love, war and death. The heroine Nalini and the Fakir are important characters, and the poem is a criticism of 'Sati' and religious bigotry. The epigraph of the first canto is very significant:

> Affections are not made for merchandize.
> What will ye give in barter for the heart?
> Has the world's wealth enough to buy the store
> Of hopes, and feelings, which are linked for ever
> With Woman's soul?

Like most educated Indian of the period, he was also under the influence of the Romantics. Wordsworth's ideas of nature appealed to him. Sonnet writing seems to have been popular with most of our early poets: his sonnets are both Petrarchan and Shakespearean. "Poetic Haunts" and "A Poetic Habitation" deal with the nature of poetry. To Henry, a poet is a minstrel and a poem stems from his imagination of the universe:

> Sweet madness! When the youthful brain is seized
> With that delicious frenzy which it loves
> It raving reels, to very rapture pleased.

His sonnet, 'To the Pupils of the Hindu college', suggests that he might have read Geoffrey Chaucer's 'Prologue to the Canterbury Tales' as he speaks of 'freshening April showers', and the young mind expanding 'like the petals of young flowers'. His themes are nature, love, death and freedom, and show signs of an early Romantic. Of his early poems, 'The Harp of India' with romantic nuances is well known. 'To India-My Native Land' demonstrates his patriotism; the image of an eagle being chained down and 'gravelling in the lowly dust' describes the condition of India's dependence. He is aware of the consequences of the French Revolution and Byron's part in the freedom of Greece. Like most progressive thinkers, he hated war as is seen in his 'Address to the Greeks'. 'Song of the Hindustanee Minstrel' is the culmination of his unhappily brief poetic career. Derozio's sonnets, lyrics and songs are not derivative, although there are echoes of the Romantics. He seems independent of the poets he has read; he has grown from his dependence on English romantic poetry to be an independent thinker of India's social problems. It is a pity that he was cut off so early in life. There is a film on Derozio's life by Utpal Dutta, called "Jhor" (storm).

H.A.G.

DESAI, AMBALAL SAKARLAL (Gujarati; b. 1844, d. 1914) was a translator, lexicographer, economist, sociologist and writer on political and literary topics. He was born in Alina, a village near Nadiad in Kheda District. After doing his M.A. in 1870 he obtained his LL.B.degree securing first position. He worked as an Assistant Teacher from 1861, and later on was appointed a Head-Master. From 1876 he worked as Editor of the journal titled Bal-Lagna Nishedh Patrika in Ahmedabad. From 1876 onwards he was a Judge at Kadi and Baroda, and was then promoted to the rank of Chief Judge. In 1889, he was made a Judge in the Supreme Court. After his retirement in 1899, he participated in social activities. In 1900, he was awarded the title of Diwan Bahadur. He got the agency of Ahmedabad Merchants' Mill, in 1901, acted as the Vice-President of Ahmedabad Municipality in 1904, and as the President at Industrial Conference in 1907. He also presided over the Third Gujarati Sahitya Parishad held at Rajkot in 1909.

His bunch of articles on economics, sociology, politics and literature were compiled and published posthumously in 1928 by Vaikunthrai Shripatrai Thakore under the title 'Diwan Bahadur Ambalal Sakarlal Desaina Bhashano Ane Lekho (Speeches and Articles of Late Diwan Bahadur Ambalal Sakarlal Desai). The second edition of this book was published in 1932. The most significant aspect of his articles is an impartial description of human development and contemporary situation. He always craved for social development on a wide scale.

There was a great force in his style which was characterised by simplicity, lucidity and logical outlook. His biography titled Ambalalbhai (1928) was prepared and published by the well known poet and critic, B.K. Thakore, who has furnished an elaborate description of the multifarious aspects of his personality. His translations of Sanskrit books were, too, held in high esteem as standard works, and won great popularity. Likewise, the English-Gujarati Dictionary compiled by him was looked upon as an outstanding book.

Through his English and Gujarati articles published in a journal titled Hitechchu he had attracted the attention of many thinkers. From his speeches which he delivered at Gujarati Sahitya Parishad, and at the Diamond Jubilee Festival of Gujarat Vidyasabha, we are able to visualise his love for literature. He was the first to mention the idea of teaching through mother-tongue, Gujarati.

B.J.

DESAI, ANITA (English: b. 1937), the well known novelist in English, is a Bengali on her father's side and a German on her mother's. She holds a Master's degree from Delhi University in English Literature, and lives in Bombay. She has so far published five novels and a children's book, The Peacock Garden (1974). She also writes short stories. Mrs. Desai's major theme is the frustration, loneliness and defeat of woman in comtemporary India, and she brings to it a genuinely modern and poetic sensibility. Cry, the Peacock (1963) her first novel which, in many ways, still remains her most represenative work, is an exploration of young Maya's married loneliness in terms of her complex psychic experience. Monisha of Voices in the City (1965), Sita of Where Shall We go This Summer? (1975) and Nanda Kaul of Fire on the Mountain(1977) are related images of the lonely woman. Monisha's suicide, Sita's flight and reabsorption into quotidian life, and the tragic end of Nanda Kaul's deliberate isolation are but different aspects of an organic and central vision. Only Bye-Bye Blackbird, her third novel, attempts a new theme, that of India's ambiguous relationship with England. Voices in the City, which projects the failure of Nirode, Monisha and Amla, a brother and two sisters, to preserve their authentic selves in a hostile and meaningless world, against the background of the 'devil city' of Calcutta, is her most ambitious, though not her most successful novel. Anita's sense of place—Calcutta, London, an island off Bombay or Kasauli—is strong, and she is always able to recreate it in evocative language. The strength of her work is in the rich quality of her imaginative world and her artistic ability to realise intensely felt experiences through authentic image and symbol. Her work shows strong affinity with that of Albert Camus and J.D. Salinger.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, Indian Writing in English (1973), Meena Belliappa, The Fiction of Anita Desai (1972), Raji Narasimhan, Sensibility Under Stress; Aspects of Indo-English Fiction (1976).

R.Pa.

DESAI, DINKAR (Kannada; b. 1909) is a poet, journalist and Trade Union leader. An M.A. of 1934 (Bombay Univ.), he joined the Servants of India Society and had his first lessons in Trade Union activities under the savant, N.M. Joshi. He founded the Seamen's Union and was its first General Secretary and later its Chairman continuously till his retirement in 1962. He attended the International Trade Union Congress at Copenhagan in 1945 and at Seattle in 1946. He was General Secretary of Bombay Provincial Trade Union Congress for 10 years and also of All India Hind Mazdoor Sabha. He was a member of the Bombay Municipal Corporation from 1948 to 1961. He fathered the Ryot Movement in North Kanara district and led the 'Land for the Tiller' Movement. In 1953, he founded the Kanara Welfare Trust, which runs 18 work centres for the rural backward classes besides important colleges and schools in North Kanara district. He is the moving spirit behind major educational thrust in the district. In 1967, he was elected M.P. He ran a Kannada weekly for the district for nearly 18 years. Besides education, literature is his major love. He is respected for his lively children's poetry. He has been contributing piquant, barbed, rhymed witticisms in a form he has perfected, known as Chutuku (Limericks). It is a single unit of two rhymed couplets. Collected under the title, Dinkarana Chaupadi (1978), nearly 15,000 of such verses sparkle in brilliant, sometimes irritating array. He received the State Sahitya Akademi award in 1972. In 1975, Karnataka University conferred D.Litt. on him. He has written 10 books ranging from serious historical research to travelogues and on education: Prapanchada Kelasagararu (1948), The Mahamandaleshwaras Under the Chalukyas of Kalyan (1951, English), Makkala Gitegalu (1951), Kavana Sangraha (1951), Makkala Padyagalu (1956), Hugonchalu (1958), Na Kanda Paduvana (1961), Primary Education in India (1961, English), Makkala Padya (1976) and Dinakarana Chaupadi (1978). His best loved works are children's poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.M. Nayak, Samputa, Suruchi, Mysore, 1981.

S.M.P.

DESAI, ICHHARAM SURYARAM (Gujarati; b. 1853, d. 1912) did not receive formal education beyond high school, but in his youth he had cultivated a deep interest in and taste for manuscripts. After initially working in a printing press, Deshimitra, he worked as a proof reader for a daily- Mumbai Samachar and as a journalist for a monthly-Swatantrata and for a weekly Gujarati which was founded in 1800 and to which Narmada gave its name He was all his life a devoted and dauntless journalist.

He was most outstanding as a Research Scholar and Editor. The Brihat Kavya-dohan, Volumes I-VIII (1886-1913), which is an anthology of medieval Gujarati poetry, is his gareatest achievement. He collected many manuscripts and wrote many brief critical biographies of some of the outstanding medieval poets such as Narsimha, Akho, Preetam and Vasto which he included in these anthologies. He also edited Dashamskandha of Premanand as well as of Sunder, Bhagavata Kavya of Vyas-Vallabh of Gandevi and collected poems of Narsimha Mehta, Narsimha Mehtakrit Kavya Sangrah (1913).

In Chandrakant, a serial of philosophical writings (Vol. I, 1891; Vol. II, 1901; Vol. III, 1970), he has presented Vedanta in simple prose and anecdotal style. He planned seven volumes in the series but could not complete it since he died while working on the fourth volume.

He also wrote fictions and serialised them in periodicals. His noteworthy work of fiction is Hind Ane Britannia (1886), a popular and realistic portrayal of the Indian society and its politics against the background of Indian and English history. The book was dedicated to Lord Ripon, the then Viceroy of India. In 1888, he published two stories in one volume Ganga-Ek Gurjar Varta, a social novelette and Suratni Shivaji-ni Loont, a historical novelette. Among his other creative writings are Savita Sundari (1890), a social satire on an old man marrying a young girl; Tipu Sultan (1889), an incomplete historical fiction, and Raj Bhakti Vidamban (1889), a prose work in the Sanskrit tradition.

Among his translations from Sanskrit are Kala Vilasa and Charucharya (1889) of Kshemendra, Katha-Sarit Sagar in two parts, Vidurniti (1890), Kamkandakiya-Nitisar (1890), Saral Kadambari (1890), Shreedhari Gita (1890), Shuk-niti (1893), Valmiki Ramayana (1893), Raj Tarangini Athva Kashmirno Itihas I (1898), Panchadashi (1900).

B.A.

DESAI, JHINABHAI RATANJI (Gujarati; b. 1903) was born in Chikhli in Valsad district. As a man of letters he is known by his pen-name 'Snehrashmi'. He received his schooling at Bombay, Broach and his native town Chikhli. He left his studies in 1920 when he was in the last year in school to join the movement known as 'Asahakar' (non-co-operation) led by Gandhiji. He, then, joined Gujarat Vidyapith in Ahmedabad in 1921 and stood second in 'Vinit' examination.

He graduated from Vidyapith in 1926 with politics as his main subject. Though he was a student of politics, literature always remained his first love.

He started his career as a professor of History and Politics at Gujarati Vidyapith in 1926 and served there till 1929. In 1930, during the movement of civil disobedience he edited the Satyagrah Patrika, and was sent behind the bars for nine months. Now he was active in Indian politics. He was elected president of the Surat City Congress in 1931. He was arrested and sent to jail again for two years and was released in 1933. Then he shunned active political life and took up an academic career. He joined the National School of Vile Parle at Bombay in 1934. He left Bombay for Ahmedabad in 1938 and joined C.N. Vidyavihar as principal and director. He received the President's Award in 1961 as a teacher, and received the Chandrakant memorial prize for his best contribution to the field of education. He was a member of the senate and the syndicate of the Gujarat Univeristy from 1950 to 1973. He worked as an acting Vice Chancellor of the Gujarat University on three occasions.

As a man of letters his contribution can he seen in various forms of literature. His best contributions are his lyrics, haikus and autobiography. There are nine collections of poetry to his credit. Arghya, Panghat, Soneri Chand Ruperi Suraj and Nijlila are noteworthy amongst them. He was awarded the Ranjitram Suvrna Chandrat in 1963 for his best contribution to Gujarati poetry. He has been recently awarded the Narmad Chandrat for his autobiography, Safalyatanu. He was elected the president of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad in 1972. He is actively associated with more than one literary institution.

As a poet he is acclaimed for his lyricism. His poetry is marked by delicate sentiment and beauty of rhythm. He is the first matured haiku-poet and started haiku movement in Gujarati literature in the late 70's of this century. He has also contributed a new form of poetry named 'Nijlila' much nearer to nonsense rhyme. He has given four collections of short stories named Tutela Tar, Gata Asopalav, Swarg ane Prithvi and Hiranan Latakania. His stories are mostly romantic except a few realistic ones. Antarpat is his only novel based on an idealistic theme Matodun ne Tulsi Ane Bijan Natako is the only collection of his traditional one-act plays. In Paratisad he has given the best of his literary criticism. Mari Dunia and Safalyatanu are two volumes of his autobiography. His poems till date are collected in the omnibus volume named Sakal Kavita.

D.P.

DESAI, MAGANBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1899, d. 1969) was awarded Parangat (M.A.) degree by Gujarat Vidyapith for writing the thesis 'Analysis of Satyagraha'. After that he joined Borsad National School. In 1933 he was appointed a fellow in Mathematics in the Gujarat Vidyapith. For a year he was in charge of Mahilashram in Wardha. In 1930 and 1932, he was jailed for joining Satyagraha Movement. In 1937 he was appointed Registrar in Gujarat Vidyapith and remained in that position till 1961. He was again jailed in 1942 for taking part in Quit India movement. After Independence he took active part in reorienting education system. He started Mahadev

Desai School of Social Sciences and activised the institution. He played an active role in completing the Gujarati Dictionary. From 1938 he edited a monthly called Sikshan Ane Sahitya (Education and Literature). For four years he was the editor of the Harijan -a weekly started by Gandhiji. He was also the editor of the Satyagraha till his death. His contribution to the development of Navjivan Publishing House is noteworthy. In 1957 he was the Chairman of Journalism section of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad; from 1946 to 1953 he was the Chairman of the Ahmedabad Municipality School Board; from 1957 to 1960 he was the Vice Chancellor of Gujarat University. He put into practice his decision to switch over to Gujarati medium in all the branches of learning during his tenure. Government nominated him as a member of the upper house of Bombay State legislature. He was also a representative of a commission appointed by the Union Government to probe into the question of the Union language and also a member of 35 different committees.

Maganbhai was a great educationist. His contribution to the fields of religion, culture, history, language, adult education, literature, dictionary, etc. is noteworthy. He prepared the authorised editions of Kunverbajnun Manmerun (1940), Sudama Charit (1942) and Nalakhyan (1951), well known texts of mediaeval Gujarati literature. His contribution to the development of Gujarati prose is praiseworthy. He was logical and clear in his arguments. In his prose one can see the beauty of different dialects. He had good command over English and wrote on subjects like Our Language Problem, Planning for Basic Natural Recovery, Language Study in Indian Constitution and Population Control. He also translated in Gujarati Tolstoy's book What is Art in 1945 and edited Sukhmani (1933), Sikh devotional poetry and Japaji (1938), Sikh religious scripture. His main works are: Gujarati Kosh (dictionary) (1941), Khisakosh (pocket dictionary, 1941), Rastrabhasano Gujaratikosh (Gujarati dictionary of national language), Vinit Jodani Kosh (Students' dictionary, 1954), Hindustani Gujarati Kosh (Hindustani Gujarati dictionary). His translations include Kala Etle Shun (Tolstoy's What is Art?), Jekyll Ane Hyde (1938), Apangni Pratibha (translation of the autobiography of Hellen Keller), Kenopanishad (1956), Mandukopanishad, Jagatno Avatikalno Purush (translation of Kalki by Radhakrishnan, 1939), Satyagrahani-Mimansa (Analysis of Satyagraha, 1934), Angreji Ane Sanskritik Swarajya (English Men and Cultural Independence, 1957), Swaraj Etle Shun (What is Independence, 1956, and Yog Etle Shun (What is yoga, 1952).

P.V.

DESAI, MAHADEV HARIBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1892, d. 1942), translator, biographer, writer of diary, was born at Saras in Surat district. He obtained primary education in various towns, secondary education at Surat and college education at Elphinstone College, Bombay. After passing his B.A. and LL.B. Examinations, he commenced legal practice at Ahmedabad, but did not succeed in the legal profession, and later on joined Government service. Thereafter, in 1917, he came under the influence of Gandhiji and remained with him throughout as a loyal pupil and a devoted disciple. He died in 1942 while he was in jail.

He translated the autobiography of Gandhiji into English. Moreover, he produced two books in English independently. His fluent and lucid English is quite remarkable. His popular translations, in collaboration with Narhari Parikh, are: Chitrangada (1914) and Viday Abhishap (1920). His important productions include Gokhalena Vyakhyano (1916), and Ek Dharmayuddha (1917). His other works include Arjunvani (1923), edited by him, and the translation of Saratchandra's novel, Viraj Vahu (1923), whereas his widely read volumes are: the translation of Tagore's Prachin Sahitya, Tran Vartao (1923), the translation of Morley's book On Compromise, Satyagrahani Maryada (1924), Bardolina Satyagrahano Itihas, and the like. On the other hand, Veer Vallabhbhai (1929), Be khudai Khidmatgaro and Sant Francis are his famous biographies. More particularly, his diary happens to be a singular event in Gujarati literature, which furnishes the most minute details in respect of his close association with Gandhiji and the various activities carried out with him. All portions of his diary are published in several volumes under the title Mahadevbhaini Diary.

In his books, neatness of style and short, meaningful sentences at once draw our attention. Even in his translations, he has made a sincere and elaborate effort to reproduce the mood and meaning of the original and he has succeeded completely. Likewise, in his biographical sketches, he delineates the characters quite impartially. The prose-writings of his diary are penetrating. He seems never to have missed the minutest details and failed to record anything that is important and relevant. These diaries bear ample testimony to his sense of dedicaion towards Gandhiji and his concern for the great leader of the nation.

Mahadevbhai has carved a position for himself among the creative writers of Gandhian era. The emergence of diary as a form of literature in Gujarati dates back to Scrap-Book by Govardhanaram and Rojnishi by Narsinhrao. The diary of Mahadevbhai, of course, is not about himself. It is all about Gandhiji. It acquaints us, nevertheless, with his wide reading, his world of ideas, his sincerity, and his likes and dislikes. Mahadevbhai's contribution in this direction is a sort of landmark in the Gujarati diary literature.

B.J.

DESAI, MINU BARJORJI Gujarati), a Parsi poet from Navsari, has occupied a remarkable place in the Gujarati literature. He was an Assitant Editor in the daily Mumbai Vartaman.

He describes patriotism, social conditions and undulations of city life, in his poetry. These compositions exhibit his command over metrical patterns. He employs diction which is in perfect harmony with emotions. His anthology of poems titled Padthar is worth mentioning. His poetic compositions, though meagre in number, are rich in poetic qualities.

He used to write a column titled 'Saf-Saf' under the psuedonym 'Ghanghanghori'. He had carried out the job of column-writing in a couple of newspapers regularly for quite a long time. He used to expose the hypocrisy prevalent in society through his sharp, pungent satire. At the same time, these columns also reflected his humorous nature. At times, he projects either satire or humour even in a tiny sentence or a word. The elements of satire and humour are the chief characteristics of his columns. These writings also reflect his fearlessness. On the basis of these columns, he had started the work of acquainting the society at large with true and realistic conditions of life. Nevertheless, he had never intended to run down anyone or to hurt the feelings of anyone, and yet he was able to challenge the vices and evils of society through his columns, and he achieved complete success in it. Among the Parsi creative writers in the field of Gujarati literature, Minu Desai deserves special mention.

B.J.

DESAI, MOHANLAL DALICHAND (Gujarati) showed keen interest in research work in Jain Literature while following the legal profession at Bombay. Scholar of ancient scripts, he visited a vast number of store-houses of manuscripts, accumulated a good amount of material pertaining to Jain Literature, and prepared Jain Sahityano Samkshipt Itihas (A short history of Jain Literature). This great volume of 1080 pages depicting the history of Jain Literature contains almost all necessary details relevant to the topic. Published in November, 1932, this volume provides a detailed and elaborate study of the medieval Jain Literature.

Jain Gurjar Kavio (Vols. 1,2,3) is yet another book produced by him which is one of the finest works of research. Vol.1 of Jain Gurjar Kavio was published in 1926, Vol.2, in 1931, and Vol. 3 having two Sections, in 1944. This book runs into 4061 pages and it contains introduction to 987 Jain creative writers and their 2055 literary compositions, 141 Jain prose writers and their 850 prose-writings, as well as 90 creative writers other than Jain and their compositions. Desai has also written several useful and elaborate articles in some of the volumes of Anand Kavya Mahodadhi.

B.J.

DESAI, RAMANALAL VASANTALAL (Gujarati; b. 1892, d. 1954) was a Gujarati litterateur, chiefly novelist. After obtaining his M.A. in 1916 for some months he worked as a school teacher but soon switched over to civil service in the former princely state of Baroda. Till he retired from the service in 1948, he served in various capacities the ruler of Baroda and it was because of his close association with the literary and cultural activities of the state that he first took upon himself the task of writing biographies like Maharana Pratap (1919) and Nana Phadnavis (1922). He was very much attracted and influenced by the Gandhian ideals, ideas and programmes and it was a faithful reflection of these in his novels that made him popular and earned for him the distinction of being eulogized as 'Yugamurti Vartakara'. His extremely happy married life prompted him to draw pictures of happy, contended and successful love and marriage in his novels. This too, contributed much to the popularity of his novels. In 1952 he visited Soviet Union as a member of an official delegation. In 1932 he was awarded the 'Ranajitarama Suvarnachandraka' for his contribution to the Gujarati literature.

During a life span of 62 years he wrote 68 books which include 27 novels, 9 collections of short stories, 11 plays, 2 collections of poems, 10 books of essays, articles and literary criticism, 5 books of biographies and history and 4 autobiographical books.

Gai Kala (1950) and Madhyahnanam Mrigajala (1956) give autobiographical account of the author's life from his childhood to the year 1931. Rasiya ane Manavashanti (1953) is an account of the author's visit to the Soviet Union. Pavagadha (1920) is a small travelogue. Tejacitro (1942) and Manavasaurabha (1960) are two major collections of biographical sketches of some leading individuals of Gujarat. Bharatiya Samskriti (1954), Gujaratanum Ghadatava (1945), Gramonnati (1940) and Apsara, Vols. 1–5 (1943–1949) display the author's keen interest in history, culture and social and economic problems. The last one is a remarkable effort at tracing the history and development of the age-old institution of prostitution not only in this country but in many major countries of the world. The author has steered away from the temptation of earning popularity by succumbing to cheap sensationalism. Jivana Ane Sahitya, Vols. 1, 2 (1936, 1938), Urmi Ane Vichara (1946), Sahitya Ane Chintana (1952) and Kalabharana (1962) contain his essays, articles and attempts at literary criticism. Niharika (1935) and Samanam (1959) are two collections of his poems.

Desai entered the literary scene with his play

Samyukta (1923). This was followed by Sankita Hridaya (1925), Anjani (1938), Pari Ane Rajakumara (1938), Gramaseva (1941), Tapa Ane Rupa (1950), Pushponi Shrishtimam (1952), Uskerayelo Atma (1954), Kavidarsana (1957), Baiju Bavaro (1959) and Videhi (1960). The first three and Gramaseva are full length plays while the rest are collections of shorter plays and one-act plays. These plays have played an important role in the development of the Gujarati theatre. They prepared the Gujarati stage for a transition from the traditional plays put up by the professional theatrical companies to the more refined and sophisticated plays performed by the amateur groups.

Desai has written about 140 short storeis but he has not been able to contribute substantially to the development of the Gujarati short story. Most of these were written to satisfy the constant demand of some of the literary and popular periodicals of the day. Such stories have been collected in Jhakala (1932), Pankaja (1935), Rasabindu (1942), Kanchana Ane Geru (1949), Divadi (1951), Bhagyachakra (1952), Sati Ane Svaraga (1953), Dhabakatam Haiyam (1954), and Hirani Chamaka (1957).

But novel was the forte of Desai. Jayanta (1925) was his first novel to be published in book-form. His last novel Arikha Ane Anjana was published posthumously in 1960. In between he wrote 25 other novels. These novels fall into three broad categories. The first group, based on historical and mythological themes and characters, consists of 8 works. The second group of 12 novels deals with the social life of Gujarat in the thirties and the ideas, ideals and activities of Mahatma Gandhi. The novels published after 1941 show increasing influence of the Marxist ideology on the author. Seven novels of this kind constitute the third group. His well known historical novels are Bharelo Agni (1935), Kalbhoj (1939) and Balajogana (1952) of which the first is considered to be his best work of the genre.

But Desai was at his best in his social novels. These novels combine eternal human emotions like love, hate, compassion, revenge, tolerance, and impatience with the social, economic and political problems of the day and suggest that these can best he solved by following the Gandhian ideals. The freedom struggle forms the backdrop of many of these novels. Divyachakshu (1932) is a typical example of his social novels. It presents almost a documentary picture of the days of the freedom struggle against the backdrop of a triangular love story. Purnima (1932) takes up the issue of an honourable place in the society for a young girl who was driven to prostitution by her elders and the circumstances. Gramalakshmi, vols. 1-4, (1933-1937) is the author's most expansive as well as the most idealistic novel. It runs into 1233 pages and deals with almost every conceivable ill of the rural society. His other social novels are: Sirisha (1927), Hridayanatha (1930), Bamsari (1933), Patralalasa (1934), Snehayajna (1931), Sobhana (1939) and Hridayavibhuti (1940).

The last group of novels show that the author had got disillusioned not with Mahatma Gandhi but at least with his self-admiring, self-aggrandizing and self-glorifying followers. His deep and genuine concern for the social transformation led him to the Marxist ideology. Chayanata and Jhanjhavata are the best of these novels.

His most valuable contribution to the Gujarati novel was that for first time the common man was on the pedestal of the hero.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D. Mehta, Ramanalal Desai; Hasamukha Dosi, Ramanalal Desai, Vyaktitva Ane Vangmaya, vols. 1, 2; Sri Ramanalal Vasantalal Desai Abhinandan Grantha.

D.B.M.

DESAI, RANJIT (Marathi, b. 1928) started his literary career in 1947. In 1947, his short-story 'Bhairav' was awarded a prize in a short-story competition organised by the Prasad magazine. Most of his short-stories were published by the Satyakatha magazine. Rupmahal (1952), Morpankhi Sawlya, Alekh, Katal and Kumodini are his notable short-story collections. Though Desai is famous as a writer of historical novels, he has also written short-stories and novels on social themes. Even in his pastoral stories, Desai blows up the better side of the villages and villagers. His short-story collections, Kanav, and Jan contain some of his remarkable short-stories. 'Pera Ugawla' and 'Pandhri Uthli' from the book Katal show his attitude of exaggerating and overcolouring.

Though his novel Samidha (1979) portrayed injustice suffered by the Dalits, the downtrodden people, his historical short-stories and novels have proved that he is at his best in depicting historical personalities. His historical novels Swami and Shriman Yogi have set new records of popularity. These biographical novels are Desai's priceless contribution to Marathi literature. In Swami, which is based on the life of Thorle Madhavrao Peshwe, Desai has succeeded not only in the characterisation of Thorle Madhavrao Peshwe but also in the portrayal of the socio-political circumstances of that time. Swami has given a new dimension to Marathi historical novel. Shriman Yogi can be compared to the Kailasa temple in Ellora in its expanse, craftsmanship, composition and details. This novel, based on the life of Maharaja Shivaji, articulately portrays Shivaji's prophetic foresight, the metaphysical base of his thinking and his tactfulness as a diplomat. Swami has a captivating chapter, 'Rama-Madhav' and Shriman Yogi has a fascinating chapter on the relationship between Saint Ramdas and Maharaja Shivaji as the Guru and the disciple. The fact that eight editions of Shriman Yogi had to be brought out proves the popularity of this novel.

Other historical novels like Lakshyavedh (1980) and Pawankhind (1980) are also to Desai's credit. Many situations from these novels and the bibliographies given at the end of each of these novels show how Desai carefully studied his subject before writing a novel on it. Still, in the preface of the novel Lakshyavedh, he writes, 'Mere study and research do not help in the understanding of history and historical truth. The writer has to resort to his imagination'. In the preface of Radheya, a novel on the life of Karna, he writes, 'This is not the biography of Karna. This is a story of the Karna hidden in my mind; there is no need to leaf through the Mahabharata for this'.

Though Desai's play Tansen failed, he has attained fame as a playwright. His plays include He Bandh Reshamache, Ramshastri, Pangulgada, Kanchanmrig, Garudzep, Dhan Apure, Warsa, etc. Some of these plays enjoyed the honour of winning awards, but the play that made Desai most popular was the one based on his novel of the same name, Swami.

L.G.

DESAI, SHANTINATH K. (Kannada; b. 1929-) was born at Havagi in Haliyal Taluk, North Kanara District. He had his education in Haliyal, Dharwar, Bombay and Leeds (U.K.). He did his M.A. (1953) & Ph.D. (1963) from Bombay University and P.G. Diploma (1959) from Leeds. He is now Professor and Head of the Department of English at Shivaji University, Kolhapur (Maharashtra). His first publication was a collection of short stories entitled Manjugadde (Iceberg, 1959). In 1961 his first novel Mukti (Redemption) was published. It was acclaimed as a remarkable novel depicting modern sensibility. The modern movement in Kannada immediately recognised Desai as a writer of great promise. This novel depicts the restless spirit of a youngman. It has been one of the National Book Trust selections for translation into various Indian Languages. Kshitija (Horizon, 1966) and Dande (The Shore, 1971) are collections of short stories. Then came his second novel Vikshepa (1977). Since then he has published Kelavu Ayda Kathegalu (Some Selected Stories, 1978), Srishti (Creation, a novel, 1979) and Sahitya Mattu Bhashe (Literature and Language, criticism, 1980).

He has edited in English the following works: Critical Essays on Indian writing, 1969, The Image of India in western Creative writing, 1970, Indian Essays on American Fiction, 1972, Experimentation with Language in Indian Writing in English (fiction) 1974., Indian Poetry Today (ICCR), 1976.

His Santa Rama Rau is a study in English which was published by Arnold Heinemann in 1975.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.D. Kurtakoti, Yugadharma Mattu Sahitya. Giraddi Govinderaj, Sannakatheys Hosa Olavugala., L.S. Seshagi Rao, Samanyanige Sahitya Charitra, Vol. X., U.R. Ananta Murty, Prajne Mattu Parisara.

Su.N.

DESAI, VALJI GOVINDJI (Gujarati; b. 1882) was a creative writer, translator and propagandist of Gandhian ideology. Born in Rajkot District, Saurashtra, he had his primary and secondary education at Jetpur, Rajkot and Wankaner; and his college education at Gujarat College, Ahmedabad, and at Elphinstone College, Bombay. He passed his B.A. Examination in 1913.

Once a close companion of Gandhiji, he adopted the Gandhian ideology in his life and tried to propagate it in an ideal manner. His literary output echoes his deep sense of patriotism and his passion for culture. In his books, titled Goraksha Kalpatarukatha, Tantrakatha, Kusumanjali and Vishwasamhita, he has described the elements of religion. Draupadina Cheer, Khadi, Rajkatha, Isu-Charit, Shri Ramkatha, Bharati, etc. are his narrative volumes. Moreover, his work titled Prem-Panth had won great popularity. Buddha Charitamrit is a book running on similar lines. Each volume ideally displays his tendency to explain the topic in a lucid style by giving many examples. His skill as a translator is reflected in his Gujarati version of a volume named Tribute.

His contribution to Gandhian Gujarati literature is not without a literary merit. The Gandhian ideology is clearly manifest in his writings. It was for this reason that his books were widely read and discussed in his own time.

B.J.

DESANI, GOVINDAS VISHNUDAS (English, b. 1909) an Indo-English novelist and dramatist, was born in Nairobi of Sindhi parents, and after spending his first 18 years in Kenya, proceeded to England and remained there till 1952, earning his livelihood variously as newspaper correspondent, popular lecturer and BBC broadcaster during the second World War. During his long stay in London, Desani came into contact with some of the leading English writers notably T.S, Eliot, and his own singular antecedents (Sindhi ancestry, African childhood and boyhood growing up to maturity in Britain) helped him to explore the tensions, tremors and teasing frustrations of the colonial experience, and also, under the stress of war-time conditions, to transcend that experience and hopefully look forward to new times. Colonialism, like casteism and feudalism, thrived on hierarchy: everyone was a snob towards his inferiors and a slave to those above. Much of Desani's imaginative understanding of this colonial experience went into his novel, All About H.Hatterr 1948, which at once attracted amused interest, as much because of its idiosyncratic and garrulous protagonist, the son of a European seaman and a non-

Christian Malaysian mother, as of the rather audaciously unconventional and experimental prose style. It was, however, only after the publication of the revised edition in 1970, with Anthony Burgess's Introduction, that the novel received more extensive and responsible critical attention. Desani's only other creative work, Hali, described as a 'poem-play' had been first planned and written as an epic of 300 pages, but later condensed into a short play in rhythmic and evocative prose. This was produced at the Watergate Theatre, London in 1950, and the next year in India. Subsequently, it was published in The Illustrated Weekly of India as Hali: A Play, and in book form by Writers Workshop, Calcutta. Returning to India in 1952, Desani experimented with Truth, as it were, studying Buddhism, practising Yoga, and living in seclusion for considerable periods. For a time, he contributed causeries to the columns of The Illustrated Weekly, and seemed to dabble in astrology and esoterism, till at last like Raja Rao, the novelist of The Serpent and the Rope, Desani also left India to teach philosophy in an American university.

While All About H.Hatterr is something akin to Joyce's Ulysses in Indian English fiction, a strange compost of prose, poetry, parody, symbolism and satire, and the protagonist is half hero and half clown, Hali is a very different kind of writing, with an altogether different kind of hero, and projects the inner drama of a 'passion'. The characters—Hali, Mira, Maya, Rahu, Isha—are symbolic projections, almost apocalyptic figures. Hali's life—like everybody's—is a daily dialogure with Death; while Maya is an illusory comfort part of the way, Rooh or Love is the real answer to the Nay, but she is transient, and passes. In the 'passion' that follows, all the issues of life and death, love and hate, reality and illusion, are fought in the realm of Hali's soul. Rahu is the Nay, the Death, that is not to be evaded, except in terms of mystical transcendence. The play ends with Hali's summit of self-knowledge that can exhort Rahu himself to achieve self-change and transformation: "O, be of my form, Rahu!".

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, Indian Writing in English (93rd edition, 1983); M.K. Naik, A History of Indian English Literature (1982); Peter Russell and Khushwant Singh (eds), G.V. Sesani: A Consideration of his All about H. Hatterr and Hali (1952).

P.N.

DESHI (Kannada) The term is evidently derived from the Sanskrit word 'deshi' which indicates a region and thereby the specific characteristics of a particular region—whether of language, literature or race. Hence the word 'deshi' means the racy elements found in the language and literature of a region. It is of interest to know that the word, in addition to the lexical meanings of intonation and the specific characteristics of a particular region, has got itself mixed up with the word 'deshi' which has the connotation of 'charm' or 'beauty'. In a way, it could be stated that the original connotation of the idosyncrasies of a certain region has slowly been thrust into the background, and the later connotation of 'charm' or 'beauty' has come to stay rather predominantly.

The statement of the author of Kavirajamarga, the earliest extant work on rhetorics in Kannada, runs thus: "Even Vasuki (the lord of serpents) feels exhausted in view of the diversities of the 'deshi'. This indicates that the earliest references to the 'deshi' are suggestive of the racy elements. In the works of Pampa, the first and foremost poet of Kannada,we find the word used in the other contexts as well. However, D.L. Narsimhachar has unequivocally stated that the word 'deshi' means purely Kannada style. Muliya Thimmappayya has further subdivided this raciness (particularly of Pampa) into the raciness of Words, Phrases, Proverbs, Prosody and Descriptions. While the author of the Kavirajamarga speaks of the venerable predecessors who have established in Kannada the 'deshi' by virtue of their love towards the racy characteristics of the language, Mallikarjuna, the author of Suktisudharnava, an anthology of descriptions, humourously indicates the high-handedness of the 'Great Poets' who have devoted their energy to deshi. The stanza runs as follows:

"When queried about the metre, they would stab;
When asked to justify the usage of a word in the phraseology, they would hurl abuses". This naturally indicated that a digression from the established practices in relation to the matter, manner and style of the compositions was considered 'deshi'. As such, the justification for 'deshi' lies in the fact that it must invest the expression with a newness, a charm peculiar to itself, and the new dimensions it actually gave to the language and literature. This was the criterion by which the propriety and meaningfulness of the usage and the overall success of the poet in handling the racy elements stand justified or questioned.

The finest examples of 'deshi' are those in the writings of Pampa. Apart from those, the beauty of the racy elements could very well be witnessed in the compositions of the Vaohanakaras (the Shaiva saints of the 12th century and onwards), the Haridasas (the Vaishnava saints of the 15th century and onwards) and Kumaravyasa, another great poet of the 15th century. In fact, it is this characteristic feature which lends their works a unique charm.

P.G.

DESHI (Sanskrit). Deshi and Margi are terms indicating trends in drama, music and dance.

From an examination of Sanskrit literature in its different branches and the history of the development of certain fields it is seen that Indian culture absorbed different local practices and made a systematic pattern out of the diverse forms functioning at different levels. This is well illustrated in the field of music, dance and drama, where the Deshi or regional styles have been incorporated in their classical or the Margi forms. The main difference between the two lies in the mode of rendering, sophisticated in Margi and somewhat plain and simple in the Deshi. The well known definition of Deshi in the text books draws the line demarcating the classical and the popular in the rules to which the former is subject and the freedom which the latter enjoys.

Music in which the popular qualities predominate have flourished side by side with the classical. The Brihaddeshi of Matanga is the earliest text dealing with the Deshi music. Deshi strands in dance are also very prominent. Many treatises on music and dance like those of Sharngadeva, Someshvara, Parshvadeva and Jaya Senapati iniclude descriptions of local and folk dances.

The history of the arts of music and dance shows a dual stream, a frequent invigoration and enrichment of the main tradition by local forms which were fitted into the basic technique and higher tradition of the classical tradition. The Deshi supplied additional material, the margi refined it and assigned it a place and wove it into the larger and richer scheme.

S.S.J.

DESHI (Telugu). Literature is classified into two types: one is known as Marga, and the other, as Deshi. The former shows the influence of Sanskrit literature in the conduct of the plot, language and prosody; while the latter is free from it.

Any literature has its beginning in the formation of words. The form of words is the 'prakriti' of poetry; the form of the poem is its 'vikriti'. The Marga-type of poetry is called 'padyakavita', while the Deshi type is known as 'pada-kavita'. The Marga-Kavita appeals to the learned, both for reading and learning, and distinguished by certain intellectual qualities. But the Deshi-Kavita appeals to the common people, distinguished by the character of a song, a purpose and is emotional. One is like the placid Ganga, while the latter is a nimble brook. Most of the classics in Telugu—Andhra Mahabharathamu, Harivamsamu, Andhra Maha Bhagavathamu, Shringara Naishadhamu, Haravilasamu, Bhimakhandamu, Kashi-Khamdamu, Manucharitramu, Vasucharitramu, Parijathapaharanamu, Amukta Malyada belong to the Marga type. To the other type belong writings like folksongs, Ela songs, Harikathas, Burrakathas, Dwipadas (couplets), Yaksha ganas, Satakams, Ragadas, Dandakams, and songs and even prose pieces.

Some characteristic qualities of the Deshi-type are the beat, the measure of the matra, discipline, beauty and the principle of song, freedom from the verbal difficulties, the universality, subjectivity of thought, the stamp of the writer's personality, the philosophical or the devotional element, anonymity or composite authorship or unknown authorship, lack of a fixed form, iteration,adaptability to singing or dancing, and the extempore quality.

Sarnga Deva made the following observation comparing the musical characters of the Marga and Deshi-types of writings. Deshi ragas are wild and unrefined, and vary from place to place. The Marga-style is bound by rules and uniformity. Its appeal to the Deshi people depends on their particular tastes or aptitudes.

The Sanskrit prosodists have made efforts to impose a distinctive form or pattern on the amorphous body of Deshi poetry. Thus Kandamu, Dwipada, Tripada, Chatushpadi, Shatpadi, Ela, Padamu, Pata, Gadyamu, Kalika, Uthkalika, Ekathali, Dhavalamu, Mangalamu, Sobhanamu, Manjari etc. were all subjected to reformative efforts. Most of them were traditional and in use since a long time. Certain forms of verses like Sisamulu; Gitamulu, Taruvojalu, Akkaras, Dwipadas were in use even before Nannaya. These constitute the poetry of the pre-Nannaya period. Nannaya developed from them the 'sista' kavita and earned himself the title of Vaganusasanudu.

It was Nannechoda who distinguished the two in his work. He makes a reference in his Kumara Sambhava to the Chalukya King's contribution to the growth of Marga Kavita on the basis of Deshi Kavita. He pays a tribute to the great poets of both the Marga and Deshi schools. According to Nannechoda, kings like Satyasraya, and Raja Raja encouraged Deshi poetry in Deshi language and about Deshi legends for the benefit of common people. They had even their inscriptions written in Deshi language.

When one compares Telugu with Tamil, Kannada and Malayalam, one finds that Telugu shares with them the same Deshi features.

There are some more references to the Deshi literature in the Panditaradhya Charitra, written in Dwipadas. He mentions different kinds of padams that were sung in those days. As examples he cites Tummeda-padams, Prabhata padams, Nivali padams, Valesw-padams, Gobbr padams Shankara padams, Vennala padams, padams descriptive of the twilight, Ganavarnana padams, etc. He also adds that on the day of Shivaratri, the devotees who gathered at Sri Sailam to worship the Lord Mallikarjuna Swami used to sing Shivatattwa Saramu, Dipakalika, Maha Natakamu, such as Rudra Mathtyamu, Muktavali, Githa Sukthamu, Bhrungi Sthavamu, and Astakamu, all of which are written in the style of the Deshi school.

J.J.K.B.

DESHINAMAMALA (Apabhramsha). Deshinamamala or Rayanavali (Sanskrit-Ratnavali) of the great Jaina Acharya Hemachandra also known as Kalikalasarvajna, is a lexicon of colloquial (deshi) words in Apabhramsha and contains references to Dhanapala, Devaraja, Gopala, Drona, Abhimanachihna, Padalipta, and Shilamka, who are supposed to have compiled dictionaries. Of these seveal other authors, only Dhanapala's (10th Century. A.D.) Paiyalacchinamamala is known to have survived.

This work contains a list of the synonyms of many of the colloquial words and their usage in Apabhramsha literature.

K.S.

DESHMUKH, MADHAO GOPAL (Marathi; b. 1913, d. 1971) was born at Vidul in Vidarbha and educated at Morris College, Nagpur. He stood First at B.A. (1934) and topped both M.A. and LL.B. examinations of Nagpur University (1936). He was the first to be awarded Ph.D. in Marathi (1941). He won various prizes and medals during his school and college career.

Deshmukh had the honour of being a member of All India Language Experts Conference Committee (1951) and of translating the Constitution of India in Marathi. He was President of Vidarbha Sahitya Sammelan (1950), Chandrapur. He was member of Executive Board and General Council of the Sahitya Akademi, and Convener of Marathi Advisory Board (1968-71). He was Chairman, Maharashtra Granthalaya Parishad and Member, Marathi Sahitya Mahamandal. He was the guet speaker at the 28th International Congress of Orientalists at Canberra, Australia, 1971.

Deshmukh worked as Professor and Principal of Govt. Arts & Science College, Aurangabad and Nagpur Mahavidyalaya, Nagpur. He was Dean, Faculty of Arts and Member of Executive Council of Marathwada and Nagpur Universities. He was specially invited to establish the Department of Marathi Language and Literature at University of Bombay of which he was the first Professor and Head from 1969-71. A good perceptive writer and a fine speaker, Deshmukh was connected with various literary and educational bodies all over India and was considered one of the best literary critics and educationists.

Deshmukh has written and edited many a literary work. His book Marathiche Sahitya Shastra: Jnaneshwar to Ramdas (1972 4th Ed.) won Gold Medal, various literary prizes and is a landmark in Marathi literature. It is an investigation into the principles of poetics adopted by the Saint—Poets in Maharashtra.

His book Bhav Gandha (1956, 1967) deals with important problems in modern literary criticism. It was translated into Hindi in 1971 by Ghanshyam Vyas. His Vangmayeen Vyakti (1967) deals with literary personalities of ancient and modern Marathi literature. He wrote a monograph, Namdev (1970), for the Sahitya Akademi. His Nave Pan deals with Kavi Datta's poetry.

His edited works are Sita Swayamvar of Nagesh and Jnaneshvari (4th canto).

U.D.

DESHMUKHYA, RAMENDRA (Bengali, b. 1917) was born at Silchar,Assam and had his education in Calcutta. He took his M.A. degree from Calcutta University in 1942. In his early career he worked in different capacities–first as a Staff Officer, A.R.P. in the Second World War; then as a Staff Reporter in the Jugantar, a daily newspaper; and then as a medical representative in two companies. At present he is well settled in the study and practice of Astrology as a profession.

Deshmukhya jointly edited a Bengali journal, Ashabari, and was the Associate Editor of Ocarina, an international journal of poetry, for some time. He also edited the Astrological Section of the Adhunik Bishwakosh (Modern encyclopaedia). He has a number of publications to his credit—Dhankhet, Bahni Bangla, Shata Pushpa (all books of poems), Evacuee, Moushumi Phul (both novels), Janapader Chhanda, Shankha Dwiper Nartaki (both belles-lettres), Bagher Atmahatya (book for children) and Rupamay Bharat (travelogue, in collaboration). His latest book of verse is Amriter Swad.

Deshmukhya is an Executive Member of Bangiya Sahitya Parishad.

Nirm.B.

DESHPANDE, ACHYUT NARAYAN (Marathi; b. 1915) was a Professor of Marathi language and literature at Hislop College, and Nagpur University, Nagpur. He was awarded Ph.D. Degree by the Nagpur University for his critical works.

Deshpande is well-known for his history of Marathi literature. Adhunik Marathi Wangmayacha Itihas in two parts (1954 and 58) established his reputation as an erudite scholar. So far five volumes of his voluminous history of old Marathi literature - Prachin Marathi Wangmayacha Itihas (1968-84) have been published. It is a greater achievement. He has inclination towards spiritualism and this explains the exuberant inclusion of passages of Buddha, Christ, J.Krishnamurthy and the like in his books.

His Keshavsut: Nave Darshan (1971) tries to analyse the poetry of Keshavsut in a different perspective. His studies in the literature of Saint-poet Ramdas, have been published in the books Karunastaka (1978) and Samrathancha Ganpati (1982).

Dharmaparatishta, Buddhapranit Jatak Katha (2 volumes) reveal his spiritual bent of mind. He has edited a number of college textbooks. He is the chief editor of Vangmaya Kosha (Prachin Khand).

Bh.K.

DESHPANDE, GANESH TRIAMBAK (Marathi; b. 1910) is B.A., LL.B. (1934), M.A.(1940), D.Litt (1960) of Nagpur University.

Deshpande began his career as an advocate. He later took to teaching in Shivaji Arts College, Amravati (1946-58). He then joined the Department of Sanskrit, Nagpur University (1959-72) and became Reader and Head of the Department of Humanities (1968-72).

An erudite Sanskrit scholar and critic of great repute, Deshpande has about 12 publications to his credit. His book Bharatiya Sahitya Shastra (1958) which brought him wide acclaim contains complete history of Sanskrit poetics. In the book, he has discussed Art theories by Sanskrit critics from Bharata, Waman, Dandi to Abhinavgupta-Anandawardhana. It is a masterly exposition of various theories, especially the theory of 'Rasa' and concept of beauty which he later discussed at length in his book Sanskrit Sahityatil Saundarya Kalpana (1962). While both the books are regarded as fine critical works, the former received the Sahitya Akademi Award (1959), and has been translated into Hindi and Gujarati.

His edited works include Spandkarika and Sankhyakarika, both philosophic dissertatios. His Marathi publication Rashtriya Utthanat Sahityache Sthan is a compilation of lectures delivered as 'Lad Memorial Lectures' of AIR Nagpur which discuss the literature that inspires a nation.

His works in English include 'Indological Papers' which go to indicate his study in Indology. His multi-dimensional scholarship embraces literature-Sanskrit and Marathi, philosophy—Indian and Western, poetics-Sanskrit and Western, Vedas and Upanishads and Indology.

I.S.

DESHPANDE, GAURI (English/Marathi): Deshpande is also an Indo-Anglian writer, mainly a poet. She has so far published three collections of her poems. In her poetry we do not find compulsive concerns with gender and self. She treats herself with a sporting spirit that discourages self adulation, overt or covert. A democratic sharing of responsibility for the aftermaths marks her dissections of emotional involvements. For the most part in her poetry we hear no wails, complaints or grievances against a male antagonist. She seems to suffer from no latent envy of the male as one whom nature and society have equipped with any built-in immunity.

An emotional relationship, in her system of understanding, sustains and renews itself on its own momentum, on the working of a logic beyond incividual control, but nonetheless apprehendable. Love is not seen as mortal, and mutable, requiring more complex and adult responses than the usual joy-despair variations.

And there will be time/You do anticipate/When we will not meet/And days abide by meangingless/And nights remain enclosed/Dreamless in strangers' arms/And our solace/Will be: we knew/Of you and me. ('There was a time'. From 'Lost Love')

The fear expressed in those lines is not of love vanishing, though it might seem so when read out of context. The fear is of love changing its quality and tone, as will become clear from the following lines which form the opening of the poem:

There was a time/(You do remember)/When we had not met/When days did not commence/Solely to bring us near/And night did not cool/To cling and part/When I did not seem to mind/That you did not know/Of my existence/ And wasted all your delights.

Between the languorous physical addictions described in the lines above and the foreboding expressed in the section quoted earlier, there lies, not the fear of the death of love, but an unease at the rise of memory, more potent and powerful than either death or love. This memory is not a divisive force, even though it divides physically and has a strong, almost physical presence of its own.

The ethics of independece upheld by the poet rules out one of the classic fears of the modern mind, the fear of the unknown. This fear is usually a fall-out of neurosis neurotic hope, neurotic dream and neurotic slidings over the boundaries of everyday reality. Since neurosis is not allowed a berth in her perceptions, the manic fear of the unknown also does not take root. What, however, does intrude into her consciousness and causes a rational disturbance is the prospect of the unknown. And this she takes care of by a stubborn probing and reconnoitering to bring it to the level of the known and the familiar. About death, the greatest unknown, she says:

"I want to see him coming/scan his face joyously.... 'Walk the seven steps with him that'll make him/my ally'.

So far, her poetry has been the poetry of the gifted woman. It is the poetry of a woman not yet become, of one still at the stage of piecing together the reapings of her encounter with her man and the cycles of being generated by this experience. The next stage, in which poetic expressions will be less immediate in its recall of this experience, is yet to make its appearance. To go by her ethics of independence, we certainly cannot say that it will not. The titles of her three published collections are: Between Birth, Lost Love and Beyond the Staugher house.

Raj.N.

DESHPANDE, GAURI (Marathi, b. 1942) is one of the important women writers in contemporary Marathi literature. She has made significant contribution to Marathi short story. Her book Ekeka Pan Galavaya (As the leaves fall one by one, 1982) consists of three long stories.

The first story 'Turungatil Patre' (Letters from Prison) is about a young well educated and sensitive woman and her relationships with several men. These are unfolded in the letters that the narrator writes to her lover who is married and has gone to the United States. The letters show her attempts to re-examine and re-evaluate, in retrospeet, her relationships with those men and to make sense out of them. The prison referred to in the title, we realize, is the prison of the narrator's own self and each of the men in her life so far has tended to make the fetters that bind her stronger.

The second story 'Madhya Latpatit' (Unsteady Middle) deals with the emotional turmoil that suddently disrupts the placid and uneventful but happy married life. The narrator of this story is a married woman approaching forty-that dangerous, transitional middle-age which brings about many physical as well as emotional changes in the life a woman - suddently apprehensive of having missed something vital in her calm and uneventful married life. Unhappy with her surroundings in a foreign country, the narrator decides to leave her husband and came back to India. Back in Bombay she has an opportunity of observing her relatives, their friends and thus she gets perspectives on different marriages and families which make her realize the truth of the famous Tolstoyan dictum that each unhappy family is unhappy in its own way.

The last story 'Ekeka can Galavaya' is the best of the three. Once again the setting is upper class, cosmopolitan 'international' as is the case with most of Mrs. Deshpande's stories. For a change the story is narrated by an omniscient narrator and, again for a change, this story is about a happy marriage. (It cannot be fortuitous that each of the stories contains a reference to Tolstoy's classic study of marriage and family Anna Karenina). At the centre of this story is a woman well past her middle age. When the story begins Radha's husband Madhav has just died. The rest of the story is Radha's confrontation with life without Madhav, her confrontation with her children who have totally failed to understand the values of their parents, her confrontation with Farhad who has been her and her family's best friend for years. Radha frees herself of her children and also of her faithful friend Farhad. She finds herself strong enough to face the autumn of her life as 'tne leaves fall, one by one'.

Gauri Deshpande's stories are always marked by her distinctive style. A student of English literature, her writings show the influence of modernist writers of the west. Particularly noteworthy is her ability to reproduce the texture of the lives of her characters through dialogue. Gauri Deshpande has also to her credit a translation of English Arabian Nights.

Si.R.

DESHPANDE, KUSUMAWATI (Marathi; b.1904, d. 1961) took a B.A. in English from Nagpur, and later from London. She taught the subject at Morris College, Nagpur, before joining All India Radio. Her sudden death in 1961 was a grievous blow to the Marathi literary world which had only a few weeks earlier conferred on her the highest honour it could: the presidentship of the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan.

Her early work comprised short stories, personal essays and character sketches. These are collected in Deepadan, Deepakali and Moli. They are so flexible in form that they often overlap one another; and this at a time when the fashion was to reduce form to mechanical technique. This, as well as her sensitive response to life's complexities and her muted lyricism, made her a precursor of the new short story of the forties. She revived the personal essay which had been enfeebled by mediocrities, whose era it was, as she maintained. But experimentation for its own sake, and the false modernity to which it leads, were not for her.

The creative in Kusumavati fused well with the critical together in Pasang and her history of the novel: Marathi Kadambari, Pahile Shatak. These writings underline the conviction that a writer should have social awareness and a concern for moral values, and also her freedom from the constraint of any creed.

V.R.

DESHPANDE, N.G. (Marathi; b. 1909) was educated in Nagpur. Later he settled down as a lawyer in Mehekar, a small town in Vidarbha. Rooted in the place and its environs, his poetry has an authentic rural flavour. It has not used the devices once popular with the poets who occasionally affected the rural as an escape from humdrum middle-class life. It has no use either for any of the tricks of modernity that have come into vogue since the middle forties. Except for the slight influence of the Ravikiran Mandal, which flourished during Deshpande's formative years, his poetry has preserved its identity through these fifty years.

Lovers of poetry who had been charmed by Deshpande's poems appearing in literary periodicals infrequently, and by the gramophone recordings of some of them, had to wait for over twenty years before his first collection was published (Sheel, 1954). The second, Abhisar, appeared in 1963.

The central theme in Deshpande's poetry is love, with its agony and ecstasy. There is abandon in the experience, but the expression is controlled. These poems sometimes remind one of the lavani, the erotic folk song-in their spirit and diction; but the erotic in Deshpande is very subdued. His imagery is sensuous, but not sensual. It springs from the theme and the setting effortlessly. Darkness is a typical and recurrent image. Directness and economy of expression impart vividness to the images.

With all their genuine song-quality, Deshpande's lyrics have never been tailored to music; and with all his recreation of the loveliness of rural life, he has never romanticised it.

V.R.

DESHPANDE, PURUSHOTTAM LAXMAN (Marathi; b. 1919) is a well known Marathi playwright and humourist. After doing his M.A. in 1950 he served for a while as a school teacher, then as a lecturer and finally as the Principal of a mofussil College. Later on he joined All India Radio and this service led him to England for training in broadcasting. In the meantime he had taken his acting lessons from Chintamanrao Kolhatkar, and he was for a time on the payroll of Natya Niketan as an actor. Thenceforth he had written many scripts for the screen, some of which he had himself starred, directed and produced.

He started his writing career with humourous pieces, which were later on collected in Khogir Bharati (1949), Nasti Uthathev (1952) and Gola Berij (1960). In his humourous skits the emphasis was mainly on irony, sarcasm, parody and satire. These traits he carried over to his plays.

His first biographical play Tuka Mhane (1948) was a total failure productionwise. Then came Amaldar (1952) an extremely effective adaptation of Gogol's Inspector General and the production of the play established his reputation as a dramatist. After Bhagyawan (1953) appeared his most popular original play Tujhe Ahe Tujpashi (1957). Even if this play deals with two delicate love-stories, it revolves round two contrasting characters, Kakaji who accepts life at all levels and Acharya who negates it. This play attracted the Marathi audience for a long time and held it spell-bound. Sundar Mi Honar (1958) again a free adaptation of the Barrets of Wimpole Street proved to be popular for some time. This was the play in which both Deshpande and his wife acted out the stellar roles. Then for about a decade or so he kept himself away from the stage. Recently appeared his most popular play Ti Phularani, once again an adaptation of Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion. In 1981 he brought out Tin Paishancha Tamasa an adaptation of Brecht's The Three Penny Opera. He has also prepared a stage version of Sophocles's Oedipus Rex. Along with such full-length plays, he has also written several one-act plays which are collected together in three volumes.

Being a mimic and a good actor himself, he was put on some one-man shows, Batatyachi chawl (1958), Asa Mi, Asa Mi (1964) and Hasavanyacha Majha Dhanda later on. Batatyachi chowl proved to be an instanteneous box-office hit and its popularity never waned. All the three shows have dramatized his own humorous sketches, skits and stories written from time to time. He has translated Hemingway's Old Man and The sea - Eka Koliyane (1965). He has also written travelogues like Apurvai (1960) and pen-portraits written by him are collected in Gantot (1966) and Gun Gaien Avadi (1975).

All such achievements go to show that P.L. Deshpande, a versatile writer, has become almost a legend in his life time. His Vyakti Ani Valli (1966), penetrating character-sketches of persons and personalities, was honoured with the Sahitya Akademi Award (1965) while he had been honoured with Padmasri even before that. He was also elected to preside over the Marathi Sahitya Sammelana held at Ichalkaranji in 1974.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Balshankara Deshpande, Ase He Pu. La. (1968)., Jayavant Dalavi, (ed.) Pu. La.: Ek Sathvana (1979).

M.M.

DESHPANDE, PURUSHOTTAM YASHVANT (Marathi, b. 1899) a novelist and thinker was born at Amaravati. He did his M.A. from Bombay University in 1925 and LL.B. from Nagpur University in 1931. He actively participated in Mahatma Gandhiji's Non-cooperation Movement, and was imprisoned for participating in the Quit-India Movement of 1942. He has had special interests in studying Vedic and Buddhist literatures. During his formative period, he was very much influenced by thoughts of Ramakrishna Paramahansa, Vivekananda, and Swami Ramatirtha. During 1933 to 1942, he was also impressed by Marxism, though, Gandhism was the main source of inspiration throughout his life. In his book, Gandhijicha Ka? (Why only Gandhiji?) he has analysed the greatness of Gandhiji. His famous novels are Bandhanachya Palikade (1927), Sukalele Phul (1931), Sadaphuli (1933), Vishal Jivana (1939), Kali Rani (1941), Nave Jaga (1941), Ahuti (1959), Bherighosha ki Dharmaghosha (1972). Navi Mulye (1946) is a collection of critical essays while Nirmalya Mala, (1933) a book of poetry. He was honoured with the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1962, for his book Anamikachi Chintanika (Contemplations of an Unnamed Man), a book in which his point of view is that, in the modern world the existence of the human race may be doomed if our quest for material progress is not supported by the search for the inner self. He has discussed his instincts, inspirations and way of writing in Mi Ka Lihito? (Why I Write?). Because of his wide experiences of life and capacity for self-analysis his writings throb with a note of sincerity.

At a time when Phadake and Khandekar were very popular writers amongst the Marathi readers, Deshpande's writing stood out distinctively, because of his contemplative attitude and serious concern with an individual's philosophical, intellectual and emotional life against the background of modern life. In addition to the books mentioned above, he has also written Bharatiya Sanskriti-la Avhana (A challange to Indian Culture), Soviet Russia Va Hindusthan (Soviet Russia and India, 1944) and a biography of Sant Jnaneshvara and a commentry on Jnaneshvara's mystical writing Amritanubhava in English.

Av.S.

DESHPANDE, WAMAN NARAYAN (Marathi; b. 1903) critic and poet, hails from Yeotmal in Vidarbha region of Maharashtra. Apart from writing under his own name he wrote columns in various journals under the nicknames like Ramshastri, Dronacharya and Tatastha. He has four collections of poems to his credit, Aaradhana (1938), Anamika (1952), Picasoche Kabutar (1962) and Uttar-ayana (1966). His poetry is blended with imagery and thoughtfulness. He has written a longer narrative about the Korku, a hill-tribe of Satpuda. He believes that this ignorant and poverty-striken tribe will soon break the shackles of inequality and ignorance.

Though he preferred to keep aloof from the prevalent literary groups, Deshpande kept himself in constant touch with the new trends in literature and had radical ideas. He is described as a poet of experimentation after Keshavsut. The credit of initiating blank verse (Muktachhanda) in Marathi poetry goes to him as much as to Anil. In his dramatic monologues, short narrative poems and lyrics he has established his own identity as the conscientious poet of his generation.

Deshpande was acclaimed as a critic of considerable importance. The collections of critical articles, Ramshastri (1939), Vichar Sameeksha (1940) and Vimarshini (1961) reveal his scholarship.

Deshpande is one of the major exponents and authorities of Mahanubhav literature. His edited works Adya Marathi Kavayitri: Mahadamba (1935) and Smri-tisthala (1939) are landmarks in the firld of critical writing.

Bh.K.

DESHPANDE, YESHWANT KHUSHAL (Marathi; b. 1884, d. 1970) was a research scholar of repute in Marathi. He was born at Papal, in the Amaravati District of the Vidarbha. His father Khushalrao worked as a sub-registrar at Dhanaj in the Akola District where Yeshwan-trao had his primary education. He completed his higher studies at Amaravati and Bombay, obtaining the M.A. and LL.B. Degrees in 1906 and 1908 respectively. He started legal practice at Yeotmal and continued it upto 1940.

While he studied at the Wilson College, Bombay between 1902 to 1905, he was deeply impressed by the works of Ramkrishna Gopal Bhandarkar and the Vishvanath Kashinath Rajwade. As a result, he decided to devote himself to historical research. In 1926, he set up an institution called Sharadashram at Yeotmal, which aimed at providing facilities for collection of historical material and research. He travelled through the length and breadth of India to collect from temples and monastaries ancient works in Sanskrit and Marathi, documents, coins, inscriptions, copper-plates, idols, pictures and photographs. Nearly 2,500 documents were collected at this institute the use of which was allowed to all interested in the field. He wrote many research articles throwing new light on the history of the middle ages. He edited the annual publication of the Sharadashram of the same name. He took interest in the work of Theosophical and the Oriental Research Societies. He had the honour of representing India in the World Historical Conference held at Zurich in 1939. He also attended the Oriental Conference held at Brussels. He was made Honorary Fellow of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain.

His special research interest was in the literature of the Mahanubhav sect. In 1925, he produced the work, Mahanubhaviya Marathi Vangmaya in order to introduce the whole corpus of this literature to lay readers. In search of information for this book he travelled extensively into Punjab, visited Maths and held discussions with the priests and consulted several Mahanubhav works. He edited such works as, Shri Ridhipurvarnan (1929), Shri Chakrapani Charitra (1936) and Niruktesh compiled by Pandit Bhishmacharya. He has edited a collection of articles Historical Essays from Vidharbha (1959) and wrote a novel Mazi Shanti, (1907).

His research covered many aspects and was presented in a lucid and simple style. His papers were published in the annual proceedings of Indian Historical Records Commission, All India History Congress, and All India Oriental Conference.

M.D.H.

DETECTIVE FICTION (Telugu) had its beginning in Telugu as early as 1920s. Though started with translations from Bengali, Kannada, Marathi and English, the detective novel occupied a prominent place in the development of the Telugu novel. Andhra Pracharini Granthamala, Saraswati Granthamala Vignana Chandrika Mandali, Veguchukka Granthamala took up the task of publication of these novels. Ventaka Parvatishwara Kavulu, the popular twin poets, were the first and foremost among those who translated from other Indian Languages. Almost all the novels of Panchakadi De, the king of detective novel in Bengali, were translated into Telugu, although it is said that they were adapted from Kannada versions but not from Bengali originals.

Detective novel later developed into a story of wonder and horror and largely concerned itself with spectres, ruined castles, subterreeanean passages and the like. Novels like Mayavi, Mayavini, Manorama, belong to this category. Two other novels, Vade Veedu, Nene of Devaraju Venkata Krishna Rao were very popular. The names of Lanapurapu Someswara Rao and Tata Krishna Murthy should also be mentioned in this connection.

Among the original novels Chitra Rekha of Chinta Dikshitulu and Vakra Rekaha of Munimankyam Narasimha Rao were noteworthy. Mogalayi Darbar, though popular as a historical novel, includes the element of detective fiction.

The detective story dominated modern Telugu literary scene during 1950-55. The educated youth studying in schools and colleges influenced by English literature showed keen interest in detective fiction. Most of the modern detective novels are nothing but mere adaptations from English. In the process local colour is given to the fiction, the names of the places and the characters are altered. However, it remains far removed from the Indian scene.

The detective novel in recent times has developed into a tale of suspense, or a tale of diplomatic intrigue or an affair of secret societies or a crime story. Kommuri Sambasiva Rao, G.V.G. Krishna, Vishwa Prasad and Temporao produced a number of detective novels which are very popular, indeed. Madhu Babu, Panuganti, Viswa Bharat, Bhayankar, Grijasri Bhagawan are among those who enriched detective fiction for the last ten years.

Detective Yugandhar, Bullet and Shado, the Spy are the popular characters created by the modern writers.

J.M.S.

DETHA VIJAYADANA (Rajasthani; b. 1926) was born at Borunda-Jodhpur and has devoted over two decades to rewriting the folk-tales and collecting popular idioms and maxims. The bulk of his creation consists of over a dozen volumes of folk-tales known as Batan ri Phulawadi, several of which have seen more than one edition. Some selected tales from these volumes were translated by the author himself and published under the title Anokha Peda (Unusual tree, 1968). Some of the tales are very short while others are of medium size. The first volume contains 76 of such shorter tales in about 290 pages of royal octave size, while volume ten has only 21 tales covering 333 pages, and volume eignt only 12 in tales in 352 pages. This fact, disclosing the trend of gradual lengthening of the tales, is enough evidence to show that the author wanted to infuse more and more of his own thoughts and expressions in the folk tales, thus depriving them of their original colour and appeal. Some of his bigger tales, forming part of these volumes, have also been separately published. Tido Rava (1965), mentioned as a folk-novel and printed in the pocket book size, is one of them. The book however, is inspired by malice, as stated by the author himself in the preface, and leaves a bad taste unworthy of litterateurs. Some others are Istukhan, Minakha Jamaro, etc. (seven such books have been published.) Almost all of these folk tales were first published in magazines, Vani (Vol. I), and Loka Sanskriti published one after the other by Rupayuana Sansthana, a literary institute run by the author. As there have been more than one edition of most of these volumes, it is difficult to know of their exact years of publication, though they may roughly be placed in between 1960 and 1975. The folk tales attempted to be re-written in these volumes have lost their original flavour due to the intermingling of Marxist theories and non-related descriptions of alien origin. Detha is certainly a powerful prose writer, particularly of fiction. His latest book Alekhun Hitler (1984) contains his original stories, which reveal his real literary merit. He had edited a dictionary of proverbs in collaboration with Bhagiratha Kanodiya, published under the name Rajasthani Kahawata Kosha. He got the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Batan ri Phulawadi (Vol. 10) in 1974.

Raw.S.

DEUSKAR, SAKHARAM GANESH (Bengali; b. 1869, d. 1912) belonged to a Maharashtrian Brahmin family long settled in Bengal. As such he learnt Bengali as his mother tongue in his childhood. He passed the Entrance Examination of the Calcutta University in 1890 from Deoghar, but could not continue his studies further due to poverty. In his boyhood, Sakharam came in contact with Rajnarain Bose, the doyen of Indian nationalism (1826-1899) and through him came to know many illustrious persons including Tilak. Sakharam was appointed a teacher of the local high school at Deoghar in 1893 but lost his job because of his alleged association with Hitavadi, a nationalist Bengali weekly published from Calcutta. Thereafter, Sakharam came to Calcutta and engaged himself in journalistic and political activities. In 1902, he organised the 'Shivaji Utsav' in Calcutta which was attended by eminent patriots including Rabindranath Tagore. In 1905, he joined Hitavadi and rose to the rank of editor in 1907. But he refused to write against Tilak after the congress split in Surat and resigned his post. Thereafter, he got appointed as a teacher of Bengali and History in Bengal National College. As a journalist, Sakharam wrote a number of books and articles attributing the economic and moral ruin of the country to the British rule. His writing also revealed his agonies for the misery of the people. During Swadeshi movement (1905-08) in Bengal Sakharam contributed a lot towards arousing the national consciouness. His main works are: Mahamati Ranade, Calcutta 1901; Jhansir Rajkumari Calcutta, 1901; Baji Rao, Calcutta, 1902; Anandi Bai, Calcutta 1903; Shivajir Mahattva, Calcutta 1903; Desher Katha (in 2 parts) Calcutta, 1904-1907; Shivajir Diksha Calcutta, 1904; Bangiya Hindu Jati ki-Dhansonmukh?, Calcutta, 1910; Tilaker Mokaddama O Samkshipta Charit, Calcutta.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.N. Banerjee, Sahitya Sadhak Charit Mala, No. VIII, Calcutta 1952.

G.S.

DEV (Hindi; b. 1673) If half a dozen poets of the 'Riti' School were to be named, Dev would certainly find a place among them. The number of his patrons is considerable but he stayed with none of them for long. Perhaps his independence of will stood in the way of stable adjustment. The authorship of a very large number of poetic works is ascribed to him. Some place the figure at seventy two, others at fifty two but his actual available works are only about twelve. Though he tried to make his mark in the sphere of poetry as well as poetics, he achieved success only in poetry. In fact, no poet of the 'Riti' School could give even a tolerably good account of himself as a poetician. They were all poets writing for the pleasure and satisfaction of their patrons.

Dev had a gift of originality and poetic sensibility of high order. His poetry, therefore, is of a higher order than that of the majority of the poets of the age. While the fashion of the times was to depict love as nothing more than carnal desire, Dev should be given credit for depicting love as a noble, spiritual emotion based on reciprocity and self-sacrifice. In many of his love poems, there is an element of divine touch as is found among the Sufis. It must not, however, be assumed that his treatment of love is only at the supra-physical level; his treatment is as physical and sensuous as any body else's. The only thing to be borne in mind is that he occasionally rises above the physical level. A scrutiny of his poems demonstrates that he starts very well but his over-fondness for alliteration and other embellihments hampers the smooth finish of the poem. His communication is effective and artistic where he is free from this fault.

Some of the important works of Dev are: Bhav Vilas, Asvayam, Bhavani Vilas, Premtarang, Kushal Vilas, Jati Vilas, Sujan Vinod, Shabdarasayan, Ratnakar etc. The works of Dev can be divided into two groups- (1) Those dealing with poetics, and (2) other dealing with philosophy, ethics, music etc.

De.S.

DEVACANDRA (Kannada; b. 1770 d. 1841.) was born in a Jain family, belonging to Kanakagiri or Maleyur. His father's name was Devayya and mother's Kusumajamma. He was in the court of Krisna Raja Wodeyar III of the Mysore royal family and patronised by Davirammanni, queen of Camaraja Wodeyar. He composed three works in Kannada: Pujyapada charitre, Ramakathavatara and Rajavalikathe (1838).

Pujyapada Charitre is composed in sangatya, four-lines deshi (native) metre. It narrates the storv of the saint Pujya-pada of Jaina order. It is said that this work has a joint authorship shared between himself and his brother Padmaraja.

Ramakathavatara in champu style narrates the story of Ramayana in the Jaina tradition; it is based on Ramacharita purana of poet Nagachandra of 12th century and is an elaboration of the earlier work. Probably it is the only work written in champu style during this century.

Rajavali Kathe is a significant prose work of considerable historical importance, even though the historical events given in this work were based on some anecdotes and imaginary legends. He portrays in this work, the genealogy of Mysore royal family, biographies of some kings and poets who were living in an earlier period and stories of religious importance relating to Jain religion. He dedicated this work to Krisna Raja Wodeyar III under whom he served as a court poet. It is mainly written in prose representing the prose style of the 18th century.

P.S.S.

DEVADAS, M.S. (Malayalam; b. 1912) is a political theoretician and literary critic in Malayalam. He took his M.A. degree in English from Annamalai University in 1933 and worked as a lecturer for two years in Singapore, after which he returned to Kerala and entered active politics, including the editorship of the leading Communist newspaper, Deshabhimani, which he did from 1942 to 1948. Returning to teaching, he served the N.S.S. College, Pantalam (1951-1954) and a few Tutorial Colleges. For about eight months (1950) he also worked as Secretary for Keralakalamandalam at Cheruturuthi. Since 1971 he has been on the Editorial Board of the Marxist Party's publication, Chinta, a weekly.

Devadas was in the forefront of the progressive movement in literature in Kerala. He has written several articles on progressive literature, many of which remain scattered in various Malayalam journals. His main works are Premavum Purogamanasahityavum (1949), Marxist Darshanam (1977), Purogamanasahityattinte Pariprekshyam (1978), Lokakamyunistprasthanathinte charitrain (1980).

K.M.P.V.

DEVADHAR JYOTSNA KESHAVA (Marathi; b. 1926) is one of the popular novelists and short story writers in Marathi. She did her M.A. in Hindi from Pune University and then joined the A.I.R., Pune as incharge of women's section. She presided over the first Marathi women short story writers' conference held in 1975. Her very first novel Gharagangechya Kathi (The Family in Retrospect, 1967) proved a great success and brought her wide popularity. It received the Maharashtra State Award as the Best Novel of the year. It was also screened in Marathi. In her writings she endeavours to portray the life of women with all its joys and sorrows. The peculiar fascination of her writings lies in the sharp, vivid intensity of her style. She selects some romantic or dramatic incident and weaves around it a mosaic of pictorial words and colourful phrases conveying the intensity and complexity of the various emotions or sentiments which puzzle the mind of her characters and drive them into either despair or rebellion.

FURTHER WORKS: Novels: Kalyani (1969), Chukamuk (1970), Kumvarni (1971), Uttarayogi (based on the life of Yogi Arabinda, 1978), Ailatira-Pailatira, Padazada (Collapse, 1979), Ek Adhyaya (A Chapter, 1980), Ek Svasa Anakhi (one more breath, 1981). Stories: Garya Garya Bhingorya (Whirl, 1969), Bocha (The Heart-ache, 1973), Uddhvasta (The Wreck, 1975), Sata Gharanchya Simaresha (The limiting lines, 1978), Zaroka (Window, 1979). Hindi Story Collections: Antara (1964, received Central Government Award for non-Hindi writers). Cactus (1981). Play: Kalyani (1977, based on her novel).

A.A.S.

DEVAGUPTA (Prakrit-Apabhramsha), the author of the Navatattvaprakarana (Prakrit) and the Navapadaprakarana (Prakrit), belongs to Upakesagaccha. Devagupta had been kumar Jinachandra before he was conferred the title acharya'. The Navatattvaprakarana was composed by him before he became an acharya. He himself has written a Sanskrit commentary called Shravakanandi or Laghuvritti on the Navapadaprakarana. From the Pattavali of Upakeshagaccha it is deduced that he flourished round about 1016. He was a pupil of Kakka Acharya. He has written a commentary on the Tattvarthasutrabhashaya. The only portion available of this commentary is that which explains the introductory verses of the Tattvarthabhashya.

N.J.S.

DEVAL GOVIND BALLAL (Marathi; b. 1854, d. 1916) was a distinguished Marathi dramatist. He called himself an humble disciple of dramatist Balavant Pandurang Kirloskar, who was his teacher at Belgaum. After his martriculation in 1879 he served as a teacher for some time and then in 1884 he graduated from the Agricultural School at Pune. For some three years he was the editor of Kadambari Kalap, a magazine devoted to the genre of novel. But all this was of no avail to his literary career. In 1886 he had written Durga, an adaptation of Isabella. In the same year he had prepared a Marathi stage version of Sanskrit play Mrichhakatika (1886). This play proved to be a hit and remained quite popular for a long time to come. In 1889 he adapted Vikramorvashiya which had a mild success; and then Zunjharrao (1890), the popular stage version of Othello. Then came Shapsambhrama (1893), an adaptation of Banbhatta's Sanskrit Kadambari and Phalgunrao, an adaptation of a lesser known English play-All Is in the Wrong by Murphy. Phalgunrao was a light farcical comedy written in prose but it was not much of a success. But in the very last year of his life he composed some twenty-five songs to be incorporated in the same play and renamed it as Samshaya Kallol (1916). It proved to be an instantaneous hit and destined to be popular for all time. Mrichhakatika, Zunjharrao, Shapsambhrama and Samshaya Kalloll were all popular plays, but each one of them was an adaptation. His only original contribution to the Marathi theatre was Sharada (1899), which again was a hit, Except for Zunjharrao, all the other plays including Sharada are graced with lilting songs, beautifully set to music. He was a pastmaster in the composition of songs which were simple, melodious and at the same time suitable to the situation, character and emotion. Deval's contribution to the Marathi musical theatre is quite significant.

Deval, the self-proclaimed disciple of Kirloskar did not merely imitate his master, he also paved the way for Marathi musical drama. It is true that he too like his illustrious preceptor Kirloskar translated a Kalidasa play Vikramorvashiya, but he did not stop at that. While preparing the stage version of Marichhakatika, a Sanskrit play, he cast it in a different mould altogether. He introduced the Shakespearean tragedy on the Marathi stage. Zunjharrao again was a departure from the Kirloskar tradition. Samshaya Kallol was also a brilliant departure, introducing the farce to the Marathi audience. But above all Deval will be remembered for his original play Sharada. Kirloskar was naturally bound by the tradition of mythological drama, but Sharada was the first significant play to offer social comments. Its presentation of a realistic theme and the portrayal of real people talking in their authentic styles helped the Marathi drama to widen its horizon.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.N. Banhatti, Natyacharya Deval (1967); S.N. Desai, Kirloskar Ani Deval (1975).

M.M.

DEVANAND, SWAMI (Gujarati; b. 1803, d. 1854) was a leading poet and saint of Swaminarayan sect, and a preceptor to Kavishri Dalpatram, the renowned Gujarati poet. He was a native of Balol, a village near Limbdi, in Surendranagar District. At the age of six, he went to Gadhada (District: Bhavnagar), and spent one year in the proximity of Sahajanand Swami of Swaminarayan sect, and the saint-poet Brahmanand Swami. After one year, at the age of seven, he took initiation from Sahajanand Swami, and changed his name from Devidan to Devanand. He stayed with Sahajanand Swami, at various places, such as Vadtal, Ahmedabad, etc. He made a deep study of prosody and poetics from Kavishri Brahmanand Swami, and then turned to writing poetry. In 1829, he was honoured by Sahjanand Swami at Gadhada who conferred upon him the title of 'Kavi' (the poet). After this, Devanand Swami, engaged himself in multifarious activities such as writing of poems, progagation of religion, and management of temple construction work at Muli (District: Surendranagar). He had also imparted the teaching of poetics to Kavishri Dalpatram, the pioneering poet of the modern Gujarati poetry. After the death of Brahmanand Swami in 1832, he was appointed 'Mahant' (Chief of monastery) of Swaminarayan Temple at Muli. He occupied the position for 22 years, during which he made every possible effort to enrich the Swaminarayan sect by his various activities, such as erection of a splendid temple, extensive propagation of religion and abundant creation of poetic compositions.

The number of religious verses, composed by him, both in Hindi as well as in Gujarati, comes to 1,244. Of these 427 are in Gujarati while 817 are in Hindi (Braj). All these verses are well-preserved in the form of original manuscripts and are available at Swaminarayan Temple at Muli.

Dayanand Swami's creations clearly manifest a deep impact of the traditional medieval literature as also the Swaminarayan literature. He has made use of various poetic forms which were widely prevalent in medieval literature, such as Bhajans, Prabhatiya (morning prayers), Garbi, Garba, Month, Day and Thal (usually sung while offering food to a deity). His poems are replete generally with sectarian panegyric of Sahajanand Swami. He had written about the life of Lord Krishna, devotional love, pangs of separation, knowledge of emncipation and renunciation, etc. He tends to preach the society to be virtuous and to worship God.

Devanand Swami was well-versed in the art of music, and therefore, his compositions are mostly full of harmony and sweetness. They are cast in some popular rustic style and music and they follow a particular rhythm. His poems are infused with spontaneous music of onomatopoeic expressions, beautiful rhyme schemes and a happy combination of sweet sentiments. His poems contain a good number of words and expressions of Gujarati as well as Braj, Charani and Rajasthani languages. His keen sense of observation is reflected in his protrayal of nature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Shastri Svayamprakashdasji, Swaminarayan Sampradayno Sachitra Itihas, Ahmedabad.

B.J.

DEVARAM (Tamil) The hymns sung by the three saints Tirunansambandar, Tirunavukkarasar and Sundarar are called Devaram.

Rajaraja Cholan Abayakulasekaran who lived in the 11th Century happened to hear the songs of Devaram and he longed to have a collection of them. He came to know from Nambiyantar Nambi of Tirunaraiyur that the Devaram hymns could be had at the place Tillai. He went to Tillai, and collected the available scripts of Devaram hymns. He arranged them in order, and got 795 padikams. Afterwards one more padikam was found in inscriptions. Among the twelve Shaivattirumurais, 796 Devaram padikams form the first seven Tirumurais. The hymns of Devaram are sung in 'Pans' or ragas. 23 pans find place in Devaram.

Initially Tirumurai was published by Madurai Ramaswamy Pillai alias Tirunanasambandam Pillai after carefully scrutinizing several palm leaf scripts. Subsequently Sentilvel Mudaliar brought out a perfect collection. Thereafter Swaminatha Panditar of Jaffna collected the scripts from various places, and published an edition showing different texts. Saiva Siddhanta Works Publishing Company brought out another edition with the texts corrected by Kayappakkam Sadasiva Chettiyar. There are several editions of Devaram. Of them the editions brought out by Saiva Siddhanta Maha Samajam and by Dharmapura Adhinam are worth mentioning.

The hymns of Tirunanasambandar form the First, Second and Third Tirumurais. According to the inscriptional evidences, his age is fixed to be the first half of the 7th century. He had sung about 219 Shiva Sthalams (sacred places) in Tamilagam. The total number of padikams produced by him is 384 and the total number of his hymns is 4146. Tirunanasambandar's spirit of Bhakti to Lord Shiva is as the love of a son to a father. This is called Satputtira margam.

The incident of Lord Shiva foiling Ravana's attempt to lift the mountain Kayilayam and thereby making him realise the Lord's supreme might is referred to in the eighth stanza of every padikam of Tirunanasambandar. The surrounding beauty of nature and fertility of every sthalam is vividly described in his hymns. In the last stanza of each of his padikams, he mentions his name and also the divine benefits that can be derived from reciting his hymns. These are found to be the distinct features of Tirunanasambandar's padikams.

Tirunavukkarasar's hymns numbering 3065 form the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Tirumurais. They were sung at 191 sthalams. He was born in the later period of 6th century and lived upto A.D. 655. He was also called Appar. Tirunavukkarasar's spirit of Bhakti is Dasamargam, which means service to God and Shaiva Saints.

Tandakam kind of verse is the unique feature of the Appar Devaram. Tandakam is a kind of verse with four lines in perfection, each line having six metres or eight metres sung in praise of men and god. All the hymns in the sixth Tirumurai of Appar are in Tandakam form of verse in praise of Lord Shiva.

The love theme finds place in 18 padikams of Appar, wherein he transforms human love into divine love.

Sundarar's Devaram is classified as Seventh Tirumurai. His age is fixed to be the 8th century. He was called Sundarar because of his great beauty. The total number of hymns sung by Sundarar in 80 sthalams is 1025 His hymns reveal that his spirit of Bhakti to Shiva is like an affection of a friend to a comrade. This is called Sakhamargam.

Like Tirunanasambandar, Sundarar also mentions his name in the last stanza of his padikams, and emphasises the benefits that one can get by repeatedly singing hymns.

Devaram is considered to be the Tamil Veda. Like Veda, Devaram hymns are recited during the festival days in the prominent Shiva temples. The divine value of Namashivaya Mantiram is stressed in the Devaram of the three saints. They find the glorification of God in the beauty of nature. Devaram forms the basis of the Saiva religion. The nature and qualities of 'pati', 'pasu' and 'pasam' are the essence of Saiva Siddhanta. 'Pati' is the Almighty; 'pasu' is the soul; 'pasam' is the worldly attachment. The soul is ingrained in the worldly attachment. To reach pati and attain the eternal bliss the soul should liberate itself from the worldly attachment, which can be achieved by obtaining the divine grace through constant prayer to the Almighty, and meditation on him. Devaram explains this philosophy here and there. A person who realises the presence of God and prays to him with sincere Bhakti can attain this eternal bliss. This is stressed generally in Devaram of the three saints. The hymns having the love theme also emphasise this truth. The conviction that those who have firm faith in God would be rid of fear of any kind is impressively expressed. Devaram as a whole is held to be one of the outstanding pieces of Bhakti literature in Tamil.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sundararmurthy Swamigal Devarappatikankal, Saiva Siddhanta Maha Samajam, (1929)., Tirunana Sambandamurthy Swamigal Devarappatikankal, Saiva Siddhanta Maha Samajam, (1931)

T.E.G.

DEVARDHI GANI (Prakrit), also called Devardhi Kshamashramana (5th-6th century A.D.) belonged to Valabhi (western Gujarat). He is accredited with the redaction of the canonical Jaina literature and is said to have presided over a council of traditional acharyas partly on the basis of manuscripts and partly on the basis of oral tradition. Devardhi's redaction is the accepted canon of the shvetambara schism. According to the tradition four such endeavours were made to codify the canon with the help of Jaina preceptors called Ganis: the first one in the fourth century B.C. at the time of Chandragupta Maurya of Pataliputra; the second one in the 4th century A.D. in Mathura, the third one under the leadership of Nagarjuna Suri at Valabhi around the same time; and the fourth and last one under the leadership of Devardhi Gani at Valabhi again. Actually the real process of going through the entire canonical text (this process is called Vachana) was followed at the two later endeavours at Valabhi.

To Devardhi Gani is also ascribed the composition of the Nandi and the Anuyogadvarasutras. Both these Sutras are more or less independent texts and stand outside the main group of the Jaina canonical literature. The Nandisutra (literally auspicious introduction) is an eulogy of the twentyfour Tirthankaras and eleven Ganadharas (heads of schools) and also contains a chronological list of teachers ending with his own teacher. The Anuyogadvarasutra is an encyclopaedia of Jaina tenets in question-answer form. The most important contribution of these two works is the information which they provide relating not only to the monastic order and to the Jaina theology but also to so-called worldly sciences and other disciplines.

V.M.

DEVENDER SATYARTHI (Punjabi/Hindi; b. 1908) is a writer of many gifts. He is perhaps best known as a collector of folk songs in search of which he travelled for years to different parts of India. In 1936, he published a collection of Punjabi folk songs under the title of Gidda (Clapping) which attracted wide attention. Later he published his own poems in a collection entitled Dharti Dian Vajan (Echoes of the Earth) and Murhaka te Kanak (Sweat and Wheat-1950) Buddhi Nahin Dharati (The Earth is not Old) Lak Tunu Tunu (The Dove's Songs, 1958). The influence of folk songs is evident in these poems from which he takes many of his allusions and references. Satyarthi's concern for the people makes him a progressive poet, though he has no political leaning or affiliations. He just sings of the people in the way they sing of themselves. He partakes of the joy and misery of the common people in words which are evocative.

There is a surprising combination of the old and the new, of tradtion and experiment, progressive and nationalist elements interprovincial community, and humanist thinking and this combination gives his poetry a modern feeling. There is a surprising variety of matter and manner, contributed by his wide travels in India. The sandalwood perfume of the south wind, the hills of the Vindhiachal, the romance of Utkal and the snows of the Himalayas and many other distant yet near phenomena find apt description in his poems. There is also a consciousness of an Asian awakening and a longing for world peace. He refers to his worshipful meetings with great Indian poets and writers like Rabindranath Tagore and Bibhutibhushan. In the midst of all this creative abundance, he expresses a yearning for his wife and daughter whom he left behind almost shiftless, and refers to the cult of Mammon and the growing crises in the world around him. There is in his poetry, a respectful feeling for the past and a loving expectation of the future.

The background of his poems in Lak Tunu Tunu (The Dove's Songs) is the romantic valley of Kangra. He uses the bank of the Nurpur lake associated with Nur-Jahan and with the story of the dancer named Gular as a stage for his poetry.

Satyarthi has written much in Hindi also in which field he occupies an equal place of honour.

He knows Bengali, Hindi, English and Urdu besides Punjabi, his mother tongue. He is emotional by nature and his style of writing reflects it. His style is direct, simple and without artificiality. His stories and novels are full of allusions from folk lore and folk literature depicting the culture of a particular region. His deep knowledge and experience about the region are clearly descermible in the writings. 'Lok-Tatva' is his forte. While he is writing about folk songs, he becomes more emotional and involved. For some time he worked as the editor of the Aaj Kal.

His famous publications in Hindi are: Novels —Brahmaputra, Dudhgach, Rath Ke Pahiye; Poetry collection—Vandanvar (1959); Books connected with folk songs—Bela Phule Aadhi Raat, (1948); Dhire Baho Ganga, (1948); and Dharti Gati Hai, (1948); Short Story —Chatlan Se Pahle (1950); Essay collections—Ek yug Ek Pratik and Rekhayen Bol Uthi (1949).

He has written on various subjects in most of the esteemed journals in India.

S.S.S. & Sur.G.

DEVI ANURUPA (Bengali; b. 1882, d. 1958) was the daughter of Mukundadev Mukhopadhyay and grand daughter of the Bengali writer Bhudev Mukhopadhyay. Brought up in a conservative Brahmin family she was married at the age of ten only, to Sikharnath Bandyopadhyay, who finally chose Muzaffarpur in Bihar as the venue of his legal practice.

Anurupa Devi was, to a great extent, self-educated. As an inhabitant of Muzaffarpur she, at a time, became a close friend of Madhurilata, the eldest daughter of Rabindranath, whose husband was also a legal practitioner there. She took active interest in propagating women's education and founding destitute home at Muzaffarpur. Her elder sister Indira Devi also was a short story writer of standing.

Anurupa followed the foot prints of her grand father, who was renowned for his enlightened conservatism, and vigorously adopted a conservative attitude towards life and its ethical values. Her novels, and she rarely felt confortable in short stories, are full of these moral ovetones. Mostly sentimental tragedies, her novels, rather voluminous, for a time achieved the height of popularity mainly for what was thought to be a feminine grace.

Her first publication, a short story, bore a pseudonym for the author — 'Rani Devi'. Her first published novel was Til Kuthi (1904). Pushyaputra, published in the Bharati (1912) established her as a novelist of standing. A few of her famous novels– Mantrashakti, Ma, Mahanisha, Pather Sathi, and Bagdatta were acclaimed while staged in dramatic forms, imparted to them by the author herself. Some of her works were screened as well.

She wielded a facile pen, and apart from fictional prose, wrote serious dissertations, travelogues, memoirs and the like, and left some 34 volumes of work behind her. Apart from those mentioned above, Jyotihara (1915), Gariber Meye, Harano Khata are some of her important novels, while Ranga Shankha, Madhumath, Chitradip, Ulka and Kraunchamithuner Milan Katha (posthumous) are a few anthologies of short stories; Natyachatushtay is a collection of four dramas (mentioned above); Sahitya O Samaj and Banga Sahitye Nari Shrishti O Shrashtri are literary dissertations, the later being the theme of Lila lectures delivered at the Calcutta University. Uttarakhander Patra and Jivaner Smritilekha are travelogue and memoir respectively.

The University of Calcutta honoured her with the award of Jagattarini and Bhuvanmohini Devi gold medals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bhudev Chaudhuri, Bangla Sahityer Chotagalpa Ebang Galpakar; Srikumar Bandyopadhyaya, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara.

B.C

DEVI ASAPURNA (Bengali; b. 1909) is an eminent Bengali novelist and short story writer. Hailing from Begampur in the district of Hoogly, Asapurna began to write from a tender age and pursued the vocation even after marriage. Steadfast has been her devotion to fictional literature and an idea of the prolific nature of her creativity can be had from the fact that she has presented the readers so far with more than 150 novels and short story collections during a period of more than five decades. Children's books form a part of this number but even then the output is staggering and judged by their quality they may claim a certain standard of excellence in all of them.

In her novels and short stories the domestic world of the middle class people with their little joys and sorrows dominates the scene. Whatever situation she describes, mirthful or pathetic, she does not fail to invest her descriptions with a sense of irony. Her endings in most cases contain an element of surprise which shows her inventive imagination. Her characterisations are convincing while her dialogues crisp and smart. Intellectual sharpness and awareness of social realities or political problems are not among her plus points. She compensates for this deficiency by masterly depiction of the world of the urban middle class family. True to the tradition of a female writer she explores this environ with certain set values and conventions to guide her.

Her most successful novel is Pratham Pratishruti (The First Promise, 1964) written in three parts. It fetched for her the Rabindra Prize of the West Bengal Government in 1965, and the Jnanpith Award in 1978. It is the story of a courageous young village bride in conflict with her surroundings; she comes to the town with her husband and establishes herself firmly in the society after surmounting many obstacles and impediments on the way. The ultimate triumph of a brave heart undaunted by odds is what she depicts in the novel most conclusively.

Among her scores of novels and short story collections some notables are: Sagar Sukhaya Jay (The Sea dries up, 1946), Mittirbari (The House of the Mittirs, 1947), Kalyani (1954), Nirjan Prithibi (The Lonely Earth, 1956), Sashidevir Sansar (The Household of Sashidevi, 1956), Unmochan (The Unveiling, 1957), Nepathya Nayika (The Back-Stage Heroine, 1958), Chhayasurya (The Shadow-Sun, (1962), Dolna (The Cradle, 1963), Nabajanma (The New Birth, 1969), etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Srikumar Bandyopadhyaya, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara.

N.C.

DEVI BIDYUTPRABHA (Oriya; b. 1926, d. 1977) stated writing poems in the middle of the forties under the inspiration of her father Nimaicharan Das. She got herself acquainted with talented writers of Oriya literature when she was just a girl. Though educated in an urban area she reflects the intimate memory of rural life of her childhood days. The poetic influence of Nandakishore Bal and Kunjabihari Das, two major poets of rural scenes, wo..ed as a spell on her mind. The following publications speak of her deep involvement in rural life: Sabita, 1947, Utkal Saraswata Prativa, 1947, Kanakanjali, 1948, Marichika, 1948, Bihayasi, 1949, Bandenika, 1950, Swapnadeep, 1951, Jhara Siuli, 1957, Jahaku Jie, 1957. Collection of her entire work known as Bidyutaprabha Sanchayan was published in 1957.

Within these ten years of creativity Bidyutprabha emerged as a powerful lyricist with traditional attitude towards nature and God. She had never tried to get out of the boundaries of village life and as such she closed her eyes towards the complex situation of post-war period. Her poems clearly deal with the problems of women that exist in an age-old conservative society. In this sense, most of her poems are full of pathos. After 1957, she wrote some children's literature occasionally. Mati, Pani, Pabana, Jyotishikha and Suryamukhi, all published in 1973 are three collections which indicate her drift towards spirituality. In this period she chose to lead a spiritual life and stayed at the Aurobindo Asram of Pondicherry. She was so restless that she shook off all attachment with her loving husband and hardly came to see him at Bhubaneswar. With this restlessness and search for a celestial light she finally committed suicide in a cold winter morning of January under the wheels of a moving train near Bhubaneswar.

N.Sa.

DEVICHAUDHURANI (Bengali) is a novel of Bankimchandra Chatterjee, published in 1884. It has been translated into English and different Indian languages. This book belongs to the author's classic group of novels, in which his moral and theological principles have been represented in a historical setting of Bengal during the last quarter of the 18th century. The story of the novel seems to portray the author's attempt at illustrating the concept of 'Niskama Karma' (disinterested work) of the sacred Gita through a romantic episode of the heroine, Prafulla. Prafulla, a poor innocent housewife was driven out of her husband's family by her cruel father-in-law for no fault of hers. Since then, Prafulla had to undergo a series of misfortunes after which almost miraculously a hidden treasure came into her possession. Later, she came across Bhabani Pathak and was trained by him to become Debichaudhurani, the queen of the robbers. But the trappings of queenly grandeur could not make her happy. She felt that her true place was in her husband's family and ultimately the story culminates in absolute poetic justice and Debi finally enters a happy domestic life.

The author has excelled in building up all the scenes of real life in the earlier chapters, but his attempt at combining realism, romance and theology in the framework of a single novel, has not been sufficiently impressive.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jayantakumar Das Gupta, A Critical Study of the Life and Novels of Bankimchandra ,Calcutta, 1937, Pramathanath Bisi, Bankim Sarani ,Calcutta, 1977, Subodhchandra Sen Gupta, Bankimchandra ,Calcutta, 1972.

Gop.R.

DEVI JYOTIRMOYI (Bengali; b. 1894) wrote almost all her novels and short stories in Jaipur, Rajasthan.

Her grandfather Sansarchandra Sen was the Chief Minister and father Abinashchandra Sen was a minister of the Princely state of Jaipur. She was married at the age of 10 to Kiranchandra Sen and came down to the village of Guptipara, Hooghly in West Bengal. She became widow at the age of 25 with four daughters and two sons and went back to Jaipur. She had no formal education but acquired proficiency in Bengali. Her first writing was published in 1912. From that time she has been writing novels and short stories. She has three good novels-Chhayapath (The Milky Way, 1934), Baishakhe Niruddesh Megh (Lost Clouds in the April Horizon, 1948) and Maner Agochara (Beyond the Mind, 1962). She has five collections of short stories published in course of thirty years, 1940-1970, viz., Rajjotak (The best Match, 1941), Araballir Arale (Behind the Araballi range, 1955), Bandmasterer Ma (Mother of the Bandmaster, 1961), Araballir Kahini (The stories of Araballi, 1965) and Sona Nay Ropa Nay (Neither Gold nor Silver, 1969). More than hundred short stories and seven novels written by her have been published in the last sixty years. A story named 'Sati' was published in 1972 (during the bicentenary celebrations of Rammohan Roy's birth). In it she had protested against the custom of Sati (burning the widow with her dead husband).

She is more successful in short stories than in novels. The backdrop of her stories and novels is the domestic life of the women folk of Rajasthan. Her stories are based on first-hand knowledge. She picks up characters and incidents from the day to day life. In her stories we come across deep sympathy for the oppressed women of Rajasthan. 'Sumeru Roy' 'Shethaniji' 'Araballir Aarale' —these stories bring out the tragedy of the women of royal family while 'Salaji Sahelo' and Khusanz Arji' bring out the tragedy of men with royal kinship. The downtrodden people of Rajasthan are depicted in 'Sepai Pisima' 'Dauni', 'Punya-Parikrama', 'Betika Bap'. She has also portrayed the lives of ordinary Bengali families in many a story, eg. 'Chirakalini,' 'Amrita Bhashini', 'Yachna', 'Damayanti', 'Thikana', etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Arunkumar Mukherjee, Kaler Puttalika (Calcutta, 1982).

A.M.

DEVI MAHASVETA (Bengali; b. 1926) was the daughter of Manish Ghatak and Dharitri Devi and sister of Ritwik Ghatak, the celebrated film-director. Manish Ghatak was a member of a new band of writers, who are popularly known as Kallol-group. Mahasveta had her education in Santiniketan and Calcutta. She is an M.A. in English literature from the University of Calcutta. She was married to Bijan Bhattacharya, famous actor-dramatist and has only one issue — a son. Mahasveta knows Hindi, Oriya and Santali apart from Bengali and English. Mahasveta has worked successively as upper division clerk (Central Govt.), school teacher, lecturer in a college (1964-84) and a roving reporter of a Bengali daily (1982-84). She is presently engaged in editing a Bengali quarterly journal Vartika concerned with the unprivileged of the society and very closely connected with numerous grassroot level organisations. For the last thirty years she has been working with more than a dozen of organisations devoted to the upliftment of bonded labourers and tribals of West Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. She has earned following literary prizes and awards: Leela award and Saratchandra Medal, Bhuban Mohini Dasi Medal (Calcutta University), Amrita award (1968), Tarasankar award, Sahitya Akademi award (1979).

At present she works for the downtrodden and writes about them in Economic and Political Weekly, Yojana (Planning Commission's organ), and other journals.

She has published forty titles which include novels and stories in Bengali, one biography (Jhansir Rani in Bengali), three books for children, a collection of plays (in Bengali) and one socio-economic survey on bonded labour (Bharat men Bondhua Majdoor in Hindi, in collaboration). Moreover she has published thirty Bengali text-books for school students, edited Jim Corbett Omnibus in Bengali and has presented a number of papers on bonded labour and tribals in seminars organised by the Planning Commission and Central Ministry of Labour.

Her first published book is a biography, Jhansir Rani (1956); first novel Nati (1957); first writing is a short essay on Tagore's Chheley Bela in the juvenile journal Rang Mahal (1939). Her books are translated into Hindi, Oriya, Telugu, Malayalam, Kannada, Gujarati, Marathi and Punjabi.

Mahasveta Devi has left the beaten track and made adventures brave and new. Her first published book, a biography, Jhansir Rani is the result of an on-the-spot painstaking survey of the rebel queen of Jhansi. She has published one hundred short stories which are collected in five books. Her stories go straight to the grassroot level and unearth the humanity in its naked form. Only one such story can be cited here–Sanj Sakaler Ma (Mother of the dawn and dusk) in which the juvenile hero, son of a wretched female beggar, yearns for hot rice. To him her mother and a plate of hot steaming rice become identical. Even in his mother's death the boy gets his consolation in his plate of hot steaming rice.

Among thrity novels written by Mahasveta Devi, the following must be mentioned: Kavi Bandyo Ghati Ganyir Jiban O Mrityu (1967), Andhar Manik (1967), Hajar Churashir Ma (1974), Aranyer Adhikar (1977), Agnigarbha (1978), Chotti Munda Ebong-Bharatiya (1980), Viveka Bidav Pala, Ganesh Mahima (1981), Eiter Pare Eit (1982) and Salgirar Dake (1982).

In Kavi Bandyo Ghati Ganyir Jiban O Mrityu (Life and death of the poet Bandyo Ghati) the writer has portrayed the life of a young man hailing from the 'Chuad' tribe in the 16th century Bengal. The totem and taboos, inhibitions and mental reservations of the Chuad community along with archetype myth form the backdrop of the novel. In Aandhar Manik (Name of a village meaning the jewel that shines in dark) the backdrop is the plunder and loot of the Marathi Vargis in Bengal in the 18th century. The novel depicts the social upheaval and total destruction in the wake of plunder and loot of Vargi horsemen. In Hajar Churashir Ma (Mother of the convict number 1084) the writer has portrayed the life of a convict who has been jailed in the wake of Naxalite movement. In Aranyer Adhikar (The right to live in and use the forest) we get a picture of the rebellion of the Mundas in Bihar in the last decade of the last century in which the leader Birsha Munda was caught and tortured by the British authority till his death in jail in 1990. In Agnigarbha (The situation ready for explosion) and Chotti Munda Ebong Bharatiya (Chotti Munda and his contemporary Indians) we come across the striking picture of tribals and aboriginals who rose in revolt. In Vivek Viday Pala (Farewell to the conscience) we get a hunchman, contemporary to Sri Chaitanya Dev (in the 16th century Bengal), who tries to come up but has to accept an inglorious defeat. In all these novels Mahasveta Devi wields her pen for the downtrodden who try to come up in rebellion but meet either a violent death or an inglorious defeat; yet they are never vanquished.

A.M.

DEVI NALINIBALA (Assamese; b. 1899, d. 1979) came of a highly cultured family. Her father Nabinchandra Bardoloi was an unrivalled leader of Assam Congress and was well versed in classical Bargeet and Bhajan. He had a deep faith in Indian philosophy and religion. Such environment of her family had a special effect on Nalinibala, and it helped very much in building her character and personality. Without having her formal education she had been educated under the guidance of Gopalkrishna Dev. She had been married at the age of twelve but after only nine years of married life she lost her husband.

She composed one elegy on the death of Putuli, her daughter. After getting encouragement from her father she continuously wrote verses. In 1928 Sandhiyar Sur was published and thus she established herself in the field of Assamese literature. She promoted her personal sorrows and separation from husband to a spiritual separation. As a result, a good number of mystic poems flew out of her pen. Those are Saponar Sur (1948), Yugadevata (1950), Parashmani (1957), Jagriti (1962) and Alakananda (1964). Besides these six poetry books—Smrititirtha (1948), a biography related to various acts of Karmabir Nabinchandra, Sardar Patel and Biswadipa (1970) are also to be noted Among other notable works Santipath (1971) written in prose, Eri Aha Dinbot (1976), an autobiography and Antimar Sur (1977) were published in the last part of her life. Besides these, several of her writings like drama and poetry are still waiting for publication.

Nalinibala Devi became the president of Asam Sahitya Sabha held at Jorhat in 1954. In 1948 the Govt. of Assam offered her literary pension and in 1954, she had been awarded the honour of Padmashree. She received the Sahitya Akademy award in 1968 for her poetry collection Alakananda. Asam Sahitya Sabha published a book on Nalinibala Devi in 1979. The book is entitled Nalinibala Devi.

Li.S.

DEVI NIRMALA (Oriya; b. 1907) is a well-known Oriya poet. Though not formally educated, she read a lot from ancient and mediaeval literature. After marriage in 1920, she began writing poems, stories etc., some of which appeared mostly in two Oriya periodicals, the Baruni (1934) and the Jhankar (1948). She contributed to Oriya literature some of the finest love-lyrics through her poetry collections,Dinante (At the End of the Day, 1953) and Simante (At the End of the Life, 1962). A communion of nature and human soul can also be traced in her poems. Most of her writings are still unpublished. She was honoured and felicitated by Prajatantra Prachar Samiti, Cuttack in 1958, by Orissa Sahitya Akademy in 1970 and by a host of other educational and cultural organisations.

K.C.B.

DEVI NIRUPAMA (Bengali; b. 1883, d. 1951) was a novelist. Her father was a sub-judge in Calcutta. Married at the age of ten and widowed at fourteen, she lived a pious life and took formal initiation into the Vaishnava faith towards the end of her life. She wrote about a dozen of novels and a few short stories. The dominant theme of her novels is the inner conflict of women under various circumstances and its resolution within the frame work of the traditional Hindu society. Her second novel Annapurnar Mandir (The Temple of Annapurna, 1913) demonstrated for the first time her skill of characterization and vivid depiction. Set against a social system where women bear more injustice, a Brahman family has been shown as the victim of economic pressures. As a result, the life of the eldest widowed daughter of the family has to be sacrificed in order to protect her honour against a lustful zamindar. The writer seems to suggest a remedy for social injustice by the removal of the economic inequality. In her later and more mature works, the tension in her female characters comes mainly from within. Nirupama's women are the epitome of self-respect and endurance and these virtues are most effectively brought out in her third and best written novel Didi (1915). It is the story of a long drawn struggle in the title character, between her self-pride and marital love which finally ends in the triumph of the latter over the former. Didi as she is affectionately called by the younger co-wife and with whom a deep understanding gradually grows finds a new dimension added to her marital relationship. This work is the best example of the novelist's subtle characterization and her restrained approach towards character revelation. Though there is a tinge of social criticism in her novels, the author never breaks away from the established social norms. Most of her other novels are also based on a similar pattern, the fulfilment of womanhood in married life. Bidhilipi (Providence, 1919) shows how blind faith in astrological prediction leads to disaster, and Shyamali (1919) tells us about the transformation that is brought about in a girl born half-wit and mute through the magic touch of love. Nirupama Devi's last two novels Jugantarer Katha (The story of a bygone age, 1940) and Anukarsha (Attraction, 1941) centre round characters who are detached from worldliness. She brings her novel to a different plane where the path of life leads to renunciation. She was honoured by the Calcutta University twice for her contribution to Bengali literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay (ed.) Sahitya-Sadhak-Charitmala, Vol. IX (Calcutta, 1952); Srikumar Bandyopadhyay, Bangasahitye Upanyaser Dhara (Calcutta, 1939).

T.W.

DEVI PRIYAMBADA (Bengali; b. 1871, d. 1935) was a poet. Her mother Prasannamoyi Devi, herself a well-known poet of her time, belonged to the Choudhuri family of Bengal, which was famous for its intellectual and cultural refinement. Two of Prasannamoyi's brothers Ashutosh and Pramatha were married to nieces of Rabindranath Tagore. Both the families were closely connected to each other. Because of strained relations with her husband, Prasannamoyi used to stay mainly with her brothers. Priyambada was thus exposed to a literary atmosphere from the early years of her life. At a time when higher education was limited to a handful of Bengali women, Priyambada passed her B.A. examination with honours in Sanskrit and secured a silver medal. Her own married life was not happy. She lost her husband just three years after her marriage, and her only child when he was only twelve years old. To lighten the burden of these two great personal tragedies, Priyambada associated herself with various welfare organisations engaged in the uplift of women. She also took to writing. Because of her family background, Priyambada was fortunate enough to come into close contact with many great personalities of her time, two of whom are specially worth mentioning; one, Rabindranath Tagore and the other the Japanese artist Okakura Kakiyo. Tagore's affection and inspiration always acted as a great solace to Priyambada. She had such devotion for the poet that once four of her poems were mistakenly taken to be written by Tagore. Overcoming her inhibitions Priyambada has frankly admitted her friendship with Okakura. This can be described as one of the romantic relationships which have occurred in the literary history of every language. In his letters to Priyambada, Okakura has described his innermost feelings, his dreams and disillusionments, his illness and his daily routine. He had also painted a picture of Priyambada (White lotus). Priyambada in return translated some of his poems into Bengali. Her short-story 'Renuka', shows her knowledge of literature and culture of Japan. Priyambada was mainly a poet. She wrote only subjective lyrics. The pangs of separation from her loved ones and deep devotion to God are the main themes of her poems. The poet is preoccupied with herself only. However, these poems do not possess any high literary value, though use of tatsama words and end-rhyming have given a musical quality to them. Priyambada has a large number of juvenile literature to her credit, translations as well as original writings. She has also written many literary essays which still remain scattered in the pages of contemporary periodicals.

FURTHER WORKS: Renu (1900), Tara (1907), Patralekha (1911), Jhile Jangale Shikar (1924), Anshu (1927), Champa O Parul (1939), Anath (1935), Katha O Upakatha (1923), Panchulal (1923).

Ja.C.

DEVI RADHARANI (Bengali; b. 1904) was a poet, and wife of well-known Bengali poet Narendra Deb. She emerged in the thirties of this century and began her career with a nom-de-plume, Aparajita Devi. Notable among her poetic effusions are the following: Banabihangi, Lilakamal, Sinthimour, Buker Bina, Anginar Phool, Purabasini and Bichitrarupini. She completed an unfinished novel written by Saratchandra Chattopadhyaya, Shesher Parichaya. Though basically a poet belonging to Rabindranath Tagore's imaginative and creative tradition, she had certain uniqueness too. She was the first poet, perhaps, who dealt with the elements of social consciousness. Radharani's poetic diction was lucidly smart and somewhat dialogue-oriented. Humour was an essential ingredient of her poems inspite of the compact and serious infra-structure.

P.S.

DEVI SARASWATI PRABHABATI (Bengali; b. 1905, d. 1972) was a well known novelist and short story-writer. Her father Gopalchandra Banerjee was a lawyer in Dinajpur. She had no formal education in schools in her childhood, but she acquired proficiency in both English and Bengali by dint of her own efforts. She was married when she was only 9 years old. The home of her in-laws was in the Gaipur village, nerar Gobardanga in West Bengal. In her youth she secured a Teachers' Training Certificate and taught for sometime at the Savitri Sikshalaya in north Calcutta. Later at the insistence of Deshbandhu Chittaranjan Das she joined the Calcutta Corporation School and retired after a long teaching career. She was bestowed the title of 'Saraswati' by the Navadwip Vidvajjanasabha for her contribution to Bengali literature. In 1946, she was awarded the 'Leela Prize' by the Calcutta University for her creative writings.

Prabhabati was primarily a novelist. In her novels she depicted with great sympathy the sorrows of neglected and exploited womanhood of her time. The leitmotif of her writing was the women's sacrifice, patience, magnanimity and devotion to their husbands. Her attitude to life was somewhat conservative. Her short stories also portray the utter neglect to which the women and children of our society are exposed. Her first novel was Amba (1922). One of her best-known novels Bijita (1923) has been rendered into film in three languages — Bengali, Hindi and Malayalam. Her novel Pather Sheshe (1964) was rendered into drama and was greatly appreciated on the public stage. Her well-known novels include Ayushmati, Sonar Samsar, Bratacharini, Daner Maryada, Jagriti, Shubha, Jagaran, Path O Pantha, Shesher Dabi, Bodhan, Muktir Alo, Chalar Pathe, Sahadharmini, Dhular Dharani, Panthapadap, Phuler Sourabh, Ashirvad and Shubha Din. Bidhavar Katha is a collection of her best short stories. She also wrote a number of detective and adventure stories for children. Of these mention may be made of the following: Karagare Krishna, Krishnar Parichay, Krishnar Abhiyan, Mayabi O Krishna, Krishnar Jayyatra, Rahasyamoyee Shikha, Shikhar Sadhan, Sikha O Rajkanya and Shikhar Swapna.
In all she authored about three hundred titles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sourindrakumar Ghosh, Sahityasevak Manjusha Vol. 1, Calcutta, 1983. Srikumar Banerjee-Bangasahitye Upanyaser Dhara (5th edn.), Calcutta, 1965., Subodhchandra Sengupta and Anjali Basu (ed.), Sangsad Bangali Charitabhidhan, Calcutta, 1976,

K.G.

DEVI SITA (Bengali; b. 1895, d. 1974) the daughter of Ramananda Chatterjee, the famous editor of Prabasi and The Modern Review. Sita Devi spent her first thirteen years at Allahabad at her paternal house. Many eminent persons and litterateurs used to come to Ramananda's house. Sita Devi learnt and benefited much from her association with those personalities. She graduated from the Calcutta University with English honours in 1916.

Before her graduation Sita Devi, in collaboration with her sister Shanta Devi, translated into Bengali a book, Tales of Hindustan written by Srichandra Basu.

Sita Devi spent two years from 1917 to 1919 at Shantiniketan with her father. At this time she came in close contact with Rabindranath Tagore. These two years were memorable in many respects in Sita Devi's life. In 1923 Sita Devi married Sudhirkumar Choudhury, a renowned writer at that time of Kallol and Prabasi periodicals. After her marriage she spent six years with her husband at Rangoon (in Burma).

Sita Devi's literary career started from her student life. Jointly with her sister Shanta Devi, she wrote a novel Udyanlata under the pseudonym Samyukta Devi, and stories for Prabasi. Besides her novels and short stories she also wrote school books for children. Of the books written by her the following are worth mentioning: Matir Basa, Bajramani, Alor Adal (1921), Parabhritika (1930), Mahamaya, Kshaniker Atithi, Janmasattva, Banya and Matririn. She wrote a memoir Punyasmriti where Rabindranath Tagore was the centre of interest. Sita Devi translated into English her own stories as well as those of Shanta Devi. The collection of these translated stories Tales of Bengal was published by Oxford University Press.

Sita Devi was made Chair-person at the Golden Jubilee celebration of International Women's Conference at Calcutta in 1960.

In Sita Devi's novels and short stories we find the impressions of a woman writer about the man and the world around. One of the notable features in her novels is the technique of travelogue. In Parabhritika we find the scenes of Burma. In Pathikbandhu we are enthralled by the colourful scenes of Santal Pargana and of Puri. Her best novel is Rajanigandha. Kshanika, a poor, crest-fallen lady becomes a private nurse of Professor Anadinath and gradually falls in love with him. But Anadinath does not respond. Inspite of Kshanika's eloquent expressions of love Anadinath marries Manorama. Kshanika becomes envious and suffers the pangs of frustration. She tries to console her aggrieved soul by nursing the dying Manorama. At last she meets Chinmay whom she marries. The love element is predominant in Sita Devi's novels. There is frustration in love; dissatisfaction, too, is there. But her novels generally end in happiness. The female characters in Sita Devi's novels are poor. They are not beautiful ladies as in romances. But they are educated. They live in the world of intellect. They can establish their individuality and personality. Here we find the modern trend in Sita Devi's novels. Sita Devi occupies a distinct place among the women writers of Bengal.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sukumar Sen, Bangla Sahityer Itihas, 4th part; Charitabhidhan, Sahitya Samsad.

Bij.D.

DEVI SWARNAKUMARI (Bengali; b. 1856, d. 1932) was the fourth daughter of Debendranath Tagore, and elder sister of Rabindranath. Swarnakumari enjoyed all the advantages of a cultivated home. In one of her essays, entitled 'Amader grihe anttopure shiksha o tahar sanskar' (The zenana education in our house and its reformation 1899), she asserts that almost every female member of her family could read and write and some of them were voracious readers of Sanskrit and Bengali literature. Swarnakumari was never given any formal education, she was taught at home by Christian missionary ladies and also by a male tutor. However, she was exposed to English literature at a very early stage, as her brothers used to translate to the female members of the family different pieces of English literature, which inspired her to write short stories. Swarnakumari was married, at an early age of twelve, to Janakinath Ghosal, one of the founders of National Congress and a close associate of A.O. Hume. According to her own record, Janakinath had fostered in her a deep love of literature and a sense of patriotism. Swarnakumari had travelled widely. She was sent to Bombay just after her marriage to live with one of her elder brothers, Satyendranath Tagore and his wife, for better education and refinement of taste. Here she used to move in the local society and came in contact with Ramabai Ranade and her welfare activities. After coming back to Calcutta, Swarnakumari also started a welfare association 'Sakhi Samiti', whose object was to spread female education and arrange for giving industrial training to widows. Till the last day of her life she was engaged in these activities of uplifting women and left the royalty of all her books to such an association established by her daughter. Swarnakumari Devi attended the Congress-session along with some other prominent ladies of her time.

Swarnakumari Devi was a prolific writer. Perhaps the most salient feature of her writings is their astonishing variety. Others may have surpassed her at certain points but few could rival her in range and versatility. She wrote novels, short stories, dramas, poems, essays, songs. Her first published work was a historical romance Dipnirvan (Extinction of the lamp). This book based on Todd's story of the fall of Prithviraj was published in 1876 and became an immediate success and was highly praised by all the contemporary newspapers and journals. Its authorship had caused a great sensation as it was unusual for ladies to attempt such a feat. Swarnakumari wrote a number of novels and short stories based on both historical and social themes. Whether the glorification of past splendour and valour of Rajputs or the establishment of a woman's point of view in a male dominated society be her object, Swarnakumari's pen always showed a mingling of feminine grace and fine aristocratic refinement. Swarnakumari was the first to use the term 'chhoto golpo' (short story) in its present technical sense in Bengali. A large portion of her essays deal with scientific subjects, mainly geology and astronomy. She also tried to coin certain Bengali equivalents for different scientific terms. Swarnakumari also edited one of the premier monthly magazines Bharati in two phases (1884-1894 and 1908-1914), her main endeavour was to promote and encourage new talents. Thus many well-known Bengali writers started their literary career here. She was awarded many prizes for her contribution to Bengali literature. Some of her writings have been translated into a few European languages.

FURTHER WORKS: Basanta Utsav (1879), Chhinna Mukul (1879), Malati (1880), Gatha (1880), Prithibi (1882), Hugleer Imambari (1888), Snehalata ba Palita Vol. I (1890), Vol II (1893), Nabakahini, Phuler Mala (1895), Kahake (1898), Konebadal (1906), Pakchakra (1911).

Ja.C.

DEVIBHAGAVATA (Sanskrit) is a Purana dealing with the exploits of Devi and her greatness, in 12 skandhas divided into two halves. According to the Shakti worshippers this is the Bhagavata belonging to the 18 Mahapuranas; the Shivapurana definitely says so, though generally Shrimadbhagavata, praising Vishnu and describing his Avataras, is taken as the Mahapurana. The stories of the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, of Devimahatmya are given with a slant to Devi worship.

K.K.R.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Assamese) Though the neo-Vaishnavite movement initiated by Shankaradeva in the closing decade of the 15th century added a vigorous momentum to the Bhakti cult in Assam, it will not be correct to say that Bhakti or the devotional path of approaching God was altogether alien to the learned section before the advent of the great reformer. The works of the pre-Shankaradeva period of Assamese literature like those of Madhava Kandali (14th century), Harihara Vipra, Hema Sarasvati and others bear ample testimony to the existence of a thin flow of the Vaishnavite devotional cult in Assam. It, however, being confined to a limited section, did not overflow into the broad life of the common men. There is a verse in Namaghosha of Madhavadeva where the poet says "Rasa of Harinama in the shape of devotional nectar was flowing in the celestial region, Shrimanta Shankara brought it down by breaching its embankment, which now flows in all directions of the world".

Predecessors of Shankaradeva, though they sang of their devotion to God as the easiest and the most convenient way of realising God, did not lay any especial emphasis on the propagation of the Bhakti cult. They directed their poetic energy towards entertaining the audience and readers by narrative skill. In this connection all anecdotes narrated in the biographies of Shankaradeva will clearly bring out the difference of approach between the pre-Shankarite poets and the Shankarite poets. When Shankara asked Bhavanada, a neophyte, to name any religious poet of his region, the latter quoted a verse composed by one Pitambara kavi, where Rukmini was depicted lamenting for some defect in her physical charm for which Krishna did not turn up to rescue her from the impending marriage with Shishupala. On hearing this Shankaradeva is said to have remarked "Do'nt speak of him, he is a sensual poet and does not deserve to be a religious writer". Shankaradeva, being a devout Vaishnava, could not tolerate that Rukmini, the spouse of the adorable Lord, should be treated as an ordinary love-smitten girl who capitalises on her physical beauty. This desire high-lighting the higher instincts by sublimating the lower insticts is one of the principal characteristics of devotional literature in Assamese.

It has already been stated that the Bhakti literature though it started two centuries earlier than Shankaradeva, gained breadth and depth as a result of the Vaishnava movement which adopted the language of the people as the sole medium of expressing Vaishnavite ideals and tenets through translation of epics and puranas, adaptations of some mythological episodes into Kavyas and dramatisation of Vaishnavite myths and legends. Besides these, devotional anthologies classifying and illustrating the various elements of Bhakti were prepared, gleaning relevant verses from puranas and other devotional works in Sanskrit.Devotional lyrics composed by the Vaishnavite saints constitute another branch of the devotional literature in Assamese. Passionate outpourings of devoted hearts have been expressed in lyrics in vivid colour and detail. The biographies dealing with the lives and activities of the religious saints, besides throwing ample light on biographical data demonstrate the ideal life of the saints, their mode of preaching and the quality of their religious sermons delivered by them on different occasions. These hagiographies, though they do not strictly form a part of the devotional literature, nevertheless, played a conspicuous part in the spread of the devotional cult in medieval Assam.

Translations of the two epics and the Bhagavatapurana constitute the main subdivision of the Bhakti literature of the Vaishnavite period. Vaishnavite poets and writers did not invent stories to illustrate and establish their devotional view-points because they were apprehensive that people would not accept anything as sacrosanct unless it was related to or derived from the sacred literature embodied in Sanskrit. Moreover, as the appeal of the two epics and also of the Bhagavatapurana, the fountain-head of Assam Vaishnavism, was widespread, the religious saints-cum-poets appear to have given the first priority to the translation of the above works. As a result, two complete translations of the Ramayana, one by Madhava Kandali of the 14th century and the other by Ananta Kandali of the 16th century were produced. Rama, in these versions has been elevated to Godhood and completely identified with Vishnu and Krishna. Rama Sarasvati, a Vaishnava poet of the court of Naranarayana (1540-1584) translated the major part of the Mahabharata, giving a devotional bias to the epic narratives. Parts left out or not completed by him were completed by his son and collaborators within the next century. The Bhagavata-purana, held in the highest esteem by the Vaishnavite devotees for its intensely devotional and emotional appeal, was translated mainly by Shankaradeva in the early part of the 16th century. The remaining cantos were completed by his followers. Besides these three works, parts of other Vaishnavite puranas, like Harivamsa, Vishnupurna and Padmapurana were also rendered into Assamese. The Bhagavata-Purana and the Gita were rendered into prose as early as the 16th century. While translating these works, the poets have conspicuously avoided highly philosophical discourses giving emphasis only on devotional narratives. As a result, many episodes of the two epics have been left out and some narratives of the Bhagavatapurana have either been deleted in their renderings or briefly summarised. But the translators have taken adequate care to make their renderings popular by introducing local colour, homely pictures and idiomatic expressions.

The most important category of the Vaishnavite devotional literature is adaptations from the epics and puranas. Abridged and adapted versions of the Ramayana include Giti-Ramayana of Durgavara, Srirama-Kirtana by Ananta Thakur and Ramayana-Katha of Raghunath Mahanta. The three poets noted above flourished in the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries respectively. Giti-Ramayana is not strictly an orthodox devotional work, yet the devotional urge flows underneath the apparent secular treatment of the Rama theme. The other two are deeply devotional, as such the main principles and characteristics of the Vaishnavite devotional cult are given prominence while narrating the story. So far as the other epic is concerned, Rama Sarasvati producd more than a dozen poems to illustate the victory, at the ultimate end, of the devotees of Krishna over the oppressive non-believers who have been depicted as Asuras or Danavas. The Pandavas, being staunch devotees of Krishna, while roaming in the forests encountered many such Asuras and Daityas and through their unflinching devotion to God, ultimatley became triumphant. These poems are generally called Vadha-Kavyas because they usually end with the killing of oppressive demons. Another set of adapted Kavyas based on stories or episodes of the epics and puranas deal mainly with the glorification of Krishna or Vishnu. Rukmini-harana, Balichhalana, Harischandropakhyana, Amrita-manthana of Shankaradeva and Rajasuya of Madhavadeva paved the way for composing such Kavyas, glorifying Krishna and his devotees. These are not really translated works and therefore the poets' imagination has played a conspicuous part in elaborating the stories.

Devotional lyrics including the Bargitas or songs sublime are invaluable treasures of early Assamese devotional literature. Lyrics on religious themes were composed by a few contemporary poets of Shankaradeva like Durgavara and Manakar who were not strictly Vaishnavites in faith. Their lyrics formed integral parts of their Kavyas. It was Shankaradeva who composed intensely devotional lyrics where his God-intoxicated passions and emotions, his sense of absolute self-surrender to the Lord whose rendering power and grace can rescue worldly afflicted beings from miseries of the world, are expressed in a dignified and elevated style. Madhavadeva and other Vaishnavite preachers have also left a rich legacy of more than a thousand devotional lyrics. The boyhood sports, and boyish pranks of Krishna are vividly and charmingly portrayed in many of these lyrics.

The Assamese devotional literature contains a number of works which exclusively deal with the nature, types and elements of Bhakti. The four fundamental concepts of Assam Vaishnavism, viz. nama, (sacred names), deva (adorable Lord), sat-sanga (holy association) and guru (spiritual guide) as well as other necessary elements for cultivating the devotional faith have been defined and illustrated with exhortation to devotees to follow the path shown in these works. These works are mostly compilations of relevant verses from the puranas mostly from Bhagavatapurana. Important works of this category are Bhaktiratnakara by Shankaradeva, Bhaktiratnavali, a translation of Vishnupuri's work, and Bhaktiviveka by Vaikunthanath Bhagavata-bhattacharya.

Devotional plays glorifying the deeds, exploits and sports (lila) of Krishna and other incarnations were produced in abundance from the early part of the 16th century to the beginning of the modern period. This form of the devotional literature was first initiated by Shankaradeva and continued unabated during the following three centuries. The victory of virtue over vice, efficacy of devotional approach to God, abounding grace of the Lord and success of devotees being protected by God, are dramatically illustrated in these plays. Lyrics, prose dialogues, Sanskrit verses and sutradhara's narratives are the four essential elements of the plays.

The biographical literature, dealing with lives of Vaishnavite saints though it directly does not deal with devotional materials, is mainly devotional. So far as the devotional literature of the modern period is concerned, no original devotional work of eminent merit has been produced. Interpretations, critical assessments and translation of Sanskrit works are being produced in abundance, but these do not merit any special attention.

Other devotional literatures in comparison to those of the Vaishnava order, are not profuse in extent and variety. Although Assam has been a centre of Shakta-Shaiva tantric cult from early times, the Vaishnava movement of the 15th and 16th centuries changed the entire religious complexion in favour of Vaishnavism. According to the District Gazetteers of Assam (1904) eighty percent of the people of Assam valley profess Vaishnavism in spite of the existence of the famous shrine of Kamakhya and other Shakta temples. Naturally, therefore, production of Shakta and Shaiva literature in Assam are very much limited. Another factor that contributed to the meagre production of Shaiva, Shakta and other literatures was the limited number of popular devotional works in Sanskrit which scholars and poets could translate or adapt into Assamese. The two epics and many of the important puranas are of the Vaishnavite leaning. Therefore, the Vaishnavite devotional works in Assamese are more numerous than any other devotional literatures. The medieval period of India witnessed mainly the resurgence of the Vaishnava cult in a new garb. Such a resurgence of Shaivism or Shaktism is not noticed as an all India phenomenon during the medieval period, though localised upsurge of these cults took place in some regions.

Admitting the scantiness of Shaiva and Shakta devotional literatures in Assam, it must be said that they are not totally negligible. Christianity which came to Assam in the fourth decade of the 19th century could not make such headway in the plains inhabitated by the Assamese people and therefore the missionaries diverted their evangelical activities to the hills. Islam first entered Assam in the 13th century. Successive waves of Muslim invasions till the end of the 17th century left some stragglers who ultimately merged in the local population by adopting Assamese language and ways of life. Christianity and Islam have not produced much devotional literature except translations of the Bible and the Koran. The Bible was first rendered into Assamese in 1813 under the supervision of William Carey, and subsequently it was translated again by Nathan Brown in 1849 and by A.K. Gurney in 1880. The Psalms were translated by Miles Bronson (1823-1883) probably in the fifties of the last century. Some parts of the Bible like Matthew, Luke and episodes of the Bible like those of Ruth and Joseph were also translated and published in the form of booklets. The Christian missionaries also published an anthology of devotional hymns composed by thirtynine Christian writers in the last quarter of the 19th century. The anthology is captioned Dharmar Gita, the seventh edition of which came out in 1920.

So far as the Islamic devotional literature is concerned, the earliest specimens are the lyrical compositions of Azan Pir who lived and preached Islam towards the second half of the 17th century. He composed several scores of Zikrs in the model of the Vaishnavite devotional songs eulogising the merit of chanting and remembering the glory and greatness of Allah. These songs are sung to the rhythmic clapping of hands, accompanied by dancing movements. Each song has a refrain which is repeated by the singers. The Jhari Gitas, though not strictly devotional in content, are also considered sacred and religious. The tragedy of Karabala is the principal theme of this type of composition. During the modern period the Koran has been rendered to Assamese by Maulavi Sader Ali and Mahamumed Taibulla and both the translations have come out in print after India attained independence.

The history of devotional Shakta literature in Assamese could be traced back to the 14th century when Hem Sarasvati composed Haragaurisamvada on the theme of Kumarasambhava, i.e. the marriage of Hara and Parvati and the birth of Kartikeya. It is true that the devotional elements here are not as intense and predominating as in the works of the Vaishnavite literature, yet the poet's deep devotion to the divine pair is glaringly noticed in the concluding verses and colophones.

Devotion to the snake-goddess Manasa prompted at least three poets to compose long poems glorifying the exploits of the goddess and the efficacy of worshipping her with ardent faith and devotion. Of the three poets, two of them namely, Manakar and Durgavara lived in the early part of the 16th century and the third, Narayanadeva who was known as Śukavi composed his voluminous work Padmapurana in the 17th century. It may be mentioned here that Manasa is also considered a manifestation of Shakti, the divine mother, as such the worship of or devotion to Manasa amounts to the propitiation of Shakti. It may further be noted that the devotion propagated or depicted in the three Manasa kavyas is mainly 'sakama' as opposed to the 'niskama'-bhakti emphasised by the Vaishnave writers. It has been stated in many places of these Kavyas that devotees of Manasa are favoured by the goddess with wealth, power, sons and other material goods of wordly happiness.

The worship of Sakti, the divine mother, as the consort of Mahadeva has been prevalent in Assam from the remote past. The worship of mother goddess Kamakhya has been in practice at least from the early centuries of the Christian era. It is narrated in the Kalikapurana, an Lupapurana of the tenth-eleventh centuries that Narakasura, a prince of the Janaka dynasty of Mithila introduced the worship of Kamakhya by erecting a temple dedicated to her name. This legend may or may not be true, but the fact remains that Kamakhya as the presiding deity of Kamrupa is being worshipped at least from the 10th century as testified by the Kalikapurana. Besides Kamakhya there are a few more temples dedicated to different manifestations of Shakti.

The first devotional Shakta literature of the Vaishnavite period of Assamese literature is the Markandeya Chandi of Pitambara Kavi who was a contemporary of Shankardeva. Three more translations of the above work were done in the 18th century, the first one by Ruchinath Kandali who received patronage of Rajeswara Simha (1751-1760), the second by Ranganath Chakravarti and the third one by Madhusudana Misra. Ranganath was a resident of Nilachala Hill on which the temple of Kamakhya is situated. The first one by Ruchinath has come out in print (1931) but the other two are yet to be published. Ruchinatha's work, though based mainly on Markandeya Chandi, however, incorporates some narratives and descriptions from Kalikapurana, Vamanapurana and Brahmavaivartapurana.

Ananta Acharya composed Anandalahari, a work primarily based on the Saundaryalahari of Shankaracharya, but not an exact translation of the latter. The extant manuscript is profusely illustrated in colour. The work is an expression of deep devotion to the goddess whose divine beauty, grace, supreme power and love for devotees are eulogised in a few hundred verses. Some devotional plays depicting Devi's supreme power and exploits were also written during the 18th and early 19th century. King Rudra Simha (1696-1714) and his son Shiva Simha (1714-1744) composed a few lyrics in praise of Devi and they are full of poetical charm and beauty. The song sung by womenfolk to propitiate Devi, especially Sitala, the deity of pox, reveal sincere devotional and imaginative capacity of the female composers. These lyrics or songs are known as Ai-Nama i.e. songs in praise of the great Mother.

There is no pure Shaiva literature in Assamese. Mahadeva, being considered as a great devotee of Vishnu-Krishna has been introduced in some of the kavyas and plays of the medieval period, like Bhimacharita, Rukminiharana and Kumaraharana, but no major work exclusively devoted to Shiva-worship and devotion has been discovered.

Modern writers mostly being rationalists have not produced any original literature eulogising or inculcating devotion to Shiva or Shakti. Some mythological plays like Daksha-Yajna and Sati have introduced Shiva and Devi as main characters, but these works are devoid of any devotional urge and intensity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.K. Barua, Shankaradeva: The Vaisnava Saint of Assam 1964., Hem Barua, Assamese Literature, 1965., M. Neog, Shankaradeva & His Age, 1965, M. Neog, Asamiya Sahityar Ruparekha, 1962., S.N. Sarma, The Neo-Vaisnavite Movement & The Satra Institution of Assam, 1966., S.N. Sarma, Epics & Puranas in Early Assamese Literature, 1970.

S.S.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Bengali). The origin of the Bhakti-cult in Bengal is traced from the Gitagovinda of Jayadeva who appeared in the 12th century A.D. It is a fact that Jayadeva wrote his lyrics in Sanskrit, but his style did not conform to the classical Kavyas, but to a form which ultimately developed into a Bengali metrical system know as 'matravritta'. Love-lyrics written by Vidyapati of Mithila were also introduced to Bengal during the 14th century, but Bhakti-cult or the idea of Bhakti in any form had not yet developed into them. As a matter of fact his lyrics were accepted in Bengal for two reasons; firstly, the Maithili language of Vidyapati had a lyrical appeal and the lover and the beloved he spoke of were easily explained as Krishna and Radha of Jayadeva's Gitagovinda tradition which had already entered into the life of a section of people in Bengal. It is evident from a work known as Srikrishnakirtan written in the 14th century, by the earliest known poet of Bengal Badu Chandidas. The work which cannot claim in any way to be a work on Bhakti is based on the legend of Radha and Krishna though not actually on the lines of Jayadeva's Gitagovinda. But we find some couplets of Gitagovinda rendered into Bengali lyrics in the work of Badu Chandidas and this undoubtedly shows that the tradition of Gitagovinda was alive after two hundred years of the passing away of Jayadeva. This tradition had never died during the entire medieval period of Bengali literature.

Prior to the birth of Chaitanya in 1486, the ascetics of the order of Sri Sankaracharya, who preached the monotheistic doctrine of One God, used to maintain regular contact with Bengal. They used to visit Navadvip, a very important place from the cultural point of view during that time. In 1480 two cantos of the Bhagvata-purana, the very source of Bhakti cult were translated into Bengali by one Maladhar Vasu in his Srikrishna-Vijay. Against this background the apostle of Bhakti cult of Bengal, Chaitanya appeared. After his birth he found a small group of people around him who were deeply devoted to the emotional aspect of the Bhakti cult, but most of the other people were indifferent, even antagonistic to it.

Chaitanya soon joined this group and became its leader. In his youth Chaitanya took to asceticism and threw himself whole-heartedly to promulgate his cult of Bhakti. Disciples from all sections of the society were drawn towards him due to his magnetic personality the influence of which spread far and wide.

The lyrics of Jayadeva, Vidyapati and Chandidas were very favourite with Chaitanya. He used to listen to them often with his followers and used also to sing them himself. This inspired his disciples having poetic talents to compose similar devotional lyrics. The way had already been laid by the predecessors of Chaitanya and the Vaishnava poets contemporaneous with Chaitanya devoted themselves to writing devotional lyrics befitting Chaitanya's spiritual ideals.

Madhavendra Puri, an ascetic of Sankaracharya's Order and who had predeceased Chaitanya, himself wrote a few lyrics on the divine love of Radha and Krishna. They are amongst the earliest specimens of Vaishnava lyrics in Bengal. It is evident from his writings that Vidyapati of Mithila had already influenced the language of Vaishnava poetry in Bengal because Madhavendra Puri also wrote in Brajabuli, an artificial language being a mixture of Maithili, Bengali and Hindi.

Narahari Sarkar was a contemporary of Chaitanya. His devotion to Chaitanya was so deep that he considered Chaitanya to be none other than Krishna himself. And, therefore, all his writings were centred on Chaitanya instead of on Krishna unlike the writings of other orthodox Vaishnavas. This shows how Chaitanya was deified even during the short span of his life. In Chaitanya the poet realized the embodiment of divine love of Radha and Krishna united in one soul and body of Gauranga or Chaitanya. He drew the attention of the Vaishnava poets towards this fact. Murari Gupta was a contemporary and a classmate of Chaitanya. He was a scholar and a poet. He wrote a biography of Chaitanya in Sanskrit and also wrote some excellent devotional lyrics in Brajabuli. Ramananda Vasu was also a contemporary of Chaitanya. He personally met Chaitanya while he was on a pilgrimage at Dwaraka in the western coast of India from where Ramananda accompanied Chaitanya upto Puri, the sacred place where Chaitanya spent the last days of his life. Ramananda was a grandson of Maladhar Vasu, the first translator of the Bhagavata-purana in Bengali of the 15th century A.D.

Another contemporary Vaishnava lyric poet was Balaram Das. In a simple language he expressed the deepest feeling of devotion in his poetry. Vasudev Ghose another contemporary of Chaitanya whom he had identified with Krishna based his entire writings on Chaitanya alone. According to him Chaitanya represents the Supreme Soul and he has, therefore, no vision of Radha and Krishna. His lyrics written on the theme of renunciation of worldly life of Chaitanya at the time of his initiation to asceticism is full of the deep sentiment of pathos.

Among the post-Chaitanya Vaishnava poets Dvija Chandidas and Govinda Das Kaviraj and also Jnanadas are well-known for the literary flavour of their writing. Dvija Chandidas, according to some, the greatest poet of the Vaishnava Padavalis is a different poet from Badu Chandidas referred to before. But some are of the opinion that Badu Chandidas wrote himself Srikrishnakirtan in his early immature age and his lyrics in his more mature age. As a matter of fact they are widely different in ideas and also to some extent in facts. Therefore, some believe that they, that is Badu Chandidas and Dvija Chandidas, are different persons. However, without entering into the controversy which had not been solved still this much can be said that Dvija Chandidas by his lyrics stirs the very heart and soul of the listeners whereas Badu Chandidasa's writings cannot reach beyond the ears. They are fundamentally different and, therefore, they seem to be two completely different persons. Jnanadas is the follower of the poetic ideals of Dvija Chandidas. But he has also his own distinct characteristics as a lyricist; Dvija Chandidas is out and out an idealist; Jnanadas combines in himself the realism of Vidyapati on the one hand and idealism of Dvija Chandidas on the other. Thus his lyrics give a special flavour which is not to be found elsewhere.

Govindadas Kaviraj who belonged to the 17th century like Jnanadas was more a scholar than a poet. But he has little originality as far as his lyrics are corcerned. He is a true and faithful follower of Vidyapati of Mithila. With him sound is the thing which counts much in poetry and therefore, he is very fond of using sonorous words in his lyrics. He has written everything in Brajabuli. For this reason he is known as the second Vidyapati. He imitates Vidyapati so successfully that the people of Mithila consider him to have been born in Mithila and not in Bengal. As far as the sentiment of Bhakti is concerned there is very little of it in his poetry; it is scholarship alone which looms large in his poetic compositions. But there is no doubt about the fact that he was a Vaishnava.

There were several Vaishnava lyric poets in the name of Ananta Das one of whom was also contemporary to Chaitanya. Probably he was the author of the largest number of lyrics. But nothing is known definitely about them. All these poets go by the same name of Ananta Das and preach the same ideology in the same standard artificial Brajabuli language. It is hardly possible to distinguish one poet from the other.

In the course of time writings of Vaishnava lyrics were stereotyped and codified under one rigid system approved by the orthodox school of Vaishnavas. The lyrics which did not conform to the established code were not accepted in the Vaishnava society which followed the tradition very strictly. There were some poets who violated the system approved by the orthodox school known as the Mahajana and their lyrics could not find place in the standard Vaishnava anthologies.

The Gaudiya Vaishnavas realize Krishna as the Supreme Being through the sentiments (rasas) which are latent in human beings. According to them there are six sentiments (rasas). Yasoda the foster mother of Krishna realized God through her filial sentiment entertained for the child Krishna whom she had nursed during his boyhood. The best sentiment is the sentiment of love (Kanta) which was entertained by Radha for Krishna. Therefore, the Supreme soul represented by Krishna responded to her worship to the fullest extent. There is a school of Vaishnavas who worship Krishna imagining themselves as women associates of Radha herself and even dress themselves as women. But the orthodox Vaishnavas do not approve of this practice. They believe that Radha is not a separate entity. She is born out of Krishna for the explicit purpose of performing divine sports with Krishna himself for his own joy and enjoyment. It is with only Radha, who is Krishna's own creation out of himself, that Krishna is concerned. She originates in Krishna and merges in Him like the waves of the ocean which rise from the ocean and disappear in the same ocean. Some Vaishnavas feel that Radha represents the individual soul and Krishna the Supreme soul. But the orthodox school does not accept the assumption. It believes that Radha is an integral part of Krishna.

These are the ideas in general which are preached through the Vaishnava lyric poetry. The poets are all initiated and devoted Vaishnavas known as Mahajanas; all have places and position in the Vaishnava social order. The Vaishnavas do not attach any importance to worldly life. They have not left any account of their own; names of their parents are unknown; the places where they were born are also not known. Sometimes they have mentioned only their own names as servants of Krishna and occasionally also the names of the spiritual guides or gurus by whom they were initiated.

The other type of devotional literature, broadly speaking, represents the Shakta school of religious devotees. Shaktism is the fountain head of many religious currents in Bengal. The primordial energy is represented as a female force and is called Shakti. She is conceived of as the Great Mother, the main root of creation, preservation and destruction. Though in reality she is formless, yet for the benefit of the world she assumes different forms as Kali, Tara of the Tantras, or Durga, Lakshmi, Saraswati of the Puranas or as Mangal Chandi or Manasa of the native lore. The vast literature centering round these mother deities is called the Shakta Literature. Shakta Literature of various types enjoys a lion's share in the whole range of Bengali Literature. The reason is that the Bengali society of the popular order is mainly based, at least in spirit, on matriarchal pattern. Mother-right (not legal) is predominant here in every sphere of life. It is so deep-rooted that in social functions, religious beliefs and forms of worship the mother or the female occupies the chief position. This lifted mother as the supreme goddess. Mother worship is the earliest form of worship in Bengal. Scholars are of opinion that the Tantras, which include the treatises mainly of the mother-cult originated in Bengal. The theory may not be beyond criticism, but it is partly true, for Shakta ideas are very strong and a particular form of Shakti-Worship known as 'Vamachar' originated and developed in this part of the country. The Sadhakas like Sarbavidya Sarbananda, Raghabram, the husband of Ardhakali, Ramprasad, the devotee poet and Vamakshepa gave impetus to the Shakti cult in different ages.

Shakta Sahitya of Bengal may be divided into two main sections-Sanskrit and Vernacular. Sanskrit works are not really literature, but liturgical treatises. Some original Tantras like Kali Tantra and Kularnava Tantra and some important books with trantric rites and worships belong to Sanskrit section. Of these works Tantrasara of Krishnananda Agamvagis, Saktananda Tarangini of Brahamandagero Skitattwa Chintamani, Syama-Rahasya and Sakta Kram of Purnananda Paramahamsa deserve special mention. The rites and rituals given in Tantrasara practically regulate the practice of the Shakta cult of Bengal. The book is held in esteem in other parts of India.

As to Shakta rites and worships, Mangal-kavyas generally give a sketch of the ordinary form of Shakti-worship known as Pashwachara. Image worship with valuable presents and offerings dominate this achar (practice). Every Mangal Kavya includes a 'Chautisa staba', glorifying the goddess with each letter of the consonantal alphabet as the first syllable. The goddess is easily propitiated with such an incantation. The Chautisa Stabas of the vernacular literature represent in a popular unrefined way the Nada dharana of the Tantras.

The lyric poets of the 19th century Bengal wrote many poems on Shakta ideas. It also dominated over other forms of literature. Hemchandra wrote Dasa-Mahavidya describing the ten Mahavidyas and presented a new Divine Comedy. Kabi Biharilal wrote Sarda-Mangal and Sadher Asan. Even the picture of Motherland was personified in the image of the great mother, which gave a new impetus to the patriotic feelings of Bengal. Bankimchandra's 'Vande Matram' was accepted as a national song of the country. Dramas of Girishchandra, D.L. Ray and Kshirodprasad and the Yatras were replete with Shakta songs.

Shaktism touched almost all the esoteric cults of Bengal. The songs of the Sahajiya Bauddhas and the Vaishnavas bear in many respects indelible print of Shakta practices. The Baul songs of Bengal also may be classified under Shakta Sahitya.

The development of the devotional literature, however, can also be traced not only to the thoughts of the Shaktas, the Buddhist masters, Jaina gurus but also to the esoteric yogic-cults of Nathas and Siddhas, which aimed at an austere negation of selfhood and controlled surrender to the Supreme One not by devotion alone, but by acquisition of the supreme knowledge (Mahajnana).

What presumably happened is that with the evolution of Bengali language and literature and its syncronized styles and forms, four different ethnic sources and linguistic groups, indigenous as well as foreign centred round dieties Dharma, Chandi, Manasa, etc., But ultimately all literatures of this nature tend towards devotion though they may not be of the type of Vaishnava devotional literature. Mangala-Kavyas came later, then the stories depicted in honour of Minanath or Gorakhanath Jana Dakinis or Siddhas. The beginning of devotional literature of this kind may be traced there.

There is another point to be noticed. Mangala-Kavyas, (Whether pre-Chaitanya or post-Chaitanya) carried the banner of devotion, along with love, hate, war and supernatural performances.

It is said that one Mayur Bhatta was the first original poet of Dharma-Mangal. Even the poet Ghaurav begins with obeisiance to Mayur Bhatta. Shakta-Padabalis are another type. Mukundaram's Chandimangal set the ball rolling in the 17th century as Bharat Chandra's Ananda-Mangal did in the 18th century. In addition to this typical Mangala-Kavyas there were remarkable padabalis (poems) by Ramakrishna, Ramprasad, Kamalakanta and others. Durga Sridhar, Balaram Kavisekhar are some of the poets who may be named as sponsors of devotional literature of this type.

Another type of devotional literature not exactly of the pure Bhakti variety was the Sahajiya-Kavya whose motto was 'take it easy, be easy, grow easily'. The instruments through which this ideal was propagated were not merely literary writings but performance like 'Kavi Jatra', 'Tarza', 'Panchali'. The Bauls talked about the one beyond and within this universe but the actual one who dwells in one's own heart is the Man of the Heart. Rabindranath Tagore in his Hibert lectures referred to their contribution. Durga Sridhar and the Muslim Subhand Khan should also be named as poets of devotional literature of this type. In the 18th century devotional poems, songs and hymns in the shape of singing the praise of the great mother or of adoration to the Magnum Mater, changed the course of literature from its Vaishnava overflow. Not that the difference was anything intrinsically real but it introduced certain new elements in the lyric poems e.g. in Agamani Songs etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bhudeb Choudhary, Bangla Sahityer-Sankshipta Itihas, Biman Bihari Majumdar, Sri Chaitasnyachariter Upadan, Calcutta, 1939., Dines Chandra Sen, Chaitanya and His Companions, Calcutta, 1937., Melville Kennedy, The Chaitanya Movement: A Study of Vaishnavism, Calcutta, 1925., Sashibhushan Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults., Sukumar Sen, A History of Brajabuli Literature, Calcutta, 1935; Sushil Kumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, Calcutta, 1942.

As.B.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Dogri) Devotion is ingrained in Dogra psyche and Dogri folk songs, ballads and even folk-tales, have plenty of devotional element in them. There are devotional songs in praise of Devi Bhagawati whose shrines dot Duggarland from Kangra (Himachal) to Vaishno Devi in Jammu, songs of Rama-bhakti and Krishna-bhakti and songs and tales describing the lila of Shiv and Parvati. In written Dogri literature, this element has found expression in a large number of translations and poems and bhajans. Among the earliest books of Dogri prose and verse are translations of the Shrimad Bhagvadgita - the first one by Gauri Shankar in 1934, followed by another in Bhadravati by another Gauri Shankar, followed by at least half a dozen other translations by Parshuram Nagar, Raghunath Singh Sanyal, Shreshtha Pathania, Chandradhar Shastri and so on. Then there were translations of Satyanarayan Vrata-Katha and Durga Saptashati way back in early 1950's. Then there is the Dogri Ramayana of Shambunath Sharma. Hardutt

Shastri continued the folk tradition of Dogri devotional verse by writing a number of bhajans in 1920's and 1930's and published them in two volumes as Dogra Bhajan mala. Santram Shastri (1850-1943) also wrote a number of devotional songs. Later, Brahmanand burst on the Dogri literary scene with five volumes of Vedantic verse. Karan Singh's contribution to Dogri in the 1960's was a few bhajans. Devotional pieces of verse have been composed by a number of Dogri poets like Krishan Samalpuri, Parmanand 'Almast', Barkat Pahari, Ramlal Sharma, Gogaram 'Saathi' and 'lok 'kavi Chhajjuram Jogi' and Durgadas Gupta. Many gods and goddesses of the Hindu mythology are celebrated in these songs. A form of ballad called 'Karak' and a form of praise song called 'Bheta' and a type of bhajans called 'Bisanpate' are special verse forms meant for devotional expression and Ḍogri folk literature is full of them.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Collections of Dogri folk-songs, published by J&K Academy of Art, Culture & Languages. Collection of Dogri folk-tales, publishedby J&K Academy of Art, Culture & Languages; Srimad Bhagvad Gita, by Gauri Shankar, first published in 1934, revised 2nd edition (1982); Satyanarayan Vrata-Katha, translation published by Dogra Mandal, Jammu. Durga Saptasati—translation by Kirpa Ram. Dogri Ramayana, by Shambhunath Sharma. Dogri Bhajanmala, by Har dutt. Sri Brahma Samkirtan, by Swami Brahmanand; Goonge da Gur; Man Sarovar; Gupta-Ganga; Amritio-Varsha.

Sh.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Gujarati) can be said to have started in fifteen-century in the devotional poems of Narsinha Mehta (1414-1480). Prior to that Jaina literature is found but as Jainism did not accept personal God, we did not find an element of devotion in it. Narsinha Mehta was a great devotee of Krishna. He has composed several devotional poems on his personal relationship with Krishna, Krishna's childhood pranks, his association and love sports with Gopis (cowmaids), an episode about Krishna's friendship with his school mate Sudama and Krishna's leaving Gokul, and Gopis pining for him. Narsinha imagined himself as Gopi and has described his love with Krishna. Narsinha did not restrict himself to devotion to Krishna but has composed devotional poems on the formless God also in his philosophical poems. Narsinha's devotional poems are those of a master of poetic art.

Mirabai (1499-1547), a lyricist of a high order, has composed songs replete with a loving passion for Krishna. For her Krishna was a living entity, lord of the heart, only object of love. The master of everything she calls her own. Her love for him is not of this life alone, it has run through the course of many births and Mirabai has nourished that creeper of love by her overflowing tears of love. She sometimes experiences a feeling of He having met her, and then in sheer ecstasy she burst forth into songs. Mira's devotional poems touch only one subject, love and its two facets, union and separation. But there is enough variety of moods and expressions. Dayaram (1776-1852) was the last well known devotee of Krishna in the mediaeval period. The poetic form he used in his devotional poems is known as 'Garbis'. His Garbis portray all the nine types of devotion (Bhakti) and all the eight types of heroines. It is in the portrayal of human heart that Dayaram excels. The poet has described more vividly and more artistically the emotion of Radha's heart and brought in a variety of emotions: yearnings, jealousy, anger, pride, forgiveness, repentance, remonstration, etc.

Several translations of the Shrimad Bhagavata were done from early times to modern period. Those worth mentioning are by Shridhar, Bhalan, Keshavdas, Tulasaram, Premanand and Raghunathdas in the mediaeval period, and by Ichharam Desai, Dongre Maharaj, Krishnashankar Shastri, Murari Bapu in the modern period.

Next to Krishna devotion is the literature on Shakti (mother godess) devotion. After Bengal and Assam, Gujarat has a long tradition of Shakti devotion. Bhalan was the first poet to write the Chandiakhyan (life history of Goddess Chandi) which is a long narrative poem, in the praise of the Goddess. In the 16th century Shridhar wrote Gaurichārita (The account of Parvati) describing the greatness of the goddess. But the poet who has richly contributed to Shakti literature is Vallabh Mevado (17th century) who has extolled the glory of Amba, Bahuchara and Kali, the three leading goddesses of Gujarat. He has mainly written Garbis, the dance songs which are sung in the temples of Goddess during the nine day festival known as Navratri. The Garbis are of various types. Like Anandno Garbo describing the power and grandeur of the Goddess. Mahakalino Garbo describes how king of Pavagadh ruined himself by forcing the goddess to curse him because of his misbehaviour. In Ambajino Garbo the poet describes in details, grandeur and beauty of the goddess and her ornaments; his Garbis became very popular, and formed an integral part of Shakti devotional poetry. His Garbis are so phenomenal that barring a few garbis of other writers his are the only garbis that have survived and are sung even today. Ranchhodji Diwan (18th century) has written Durga Saptasati eulogising Goddess Durga. He has also contributed to Shakti devotional literatures by writing Garbis, which are popular even today. Another poet who has earned a name in Shakti devotional literature in Bhandas (17th century).

Shiva devotion is also found in Gujarati literature, as Somnath, a famous historical temple of Lord Shiva, is situated in Gujarat. Sivananda (17th century) has composed lyrics in praise of lord Shiva, which are to be sung at the time of Shiva worship. His most popular Aarti chorus songs are sung at the time of worship. His poems have not left unused a single incident in the daily routine of the life of the Lord, such as his bath, dress, his dinner, his amours. Murari is yet another poet who has written devotional poetry (17th century).

Ram devotional literature is also found from 15th century in the poems of Bhalan, who describes the childhood pranks of Rama. Uddhav and Girdhar (17th century) have translated the Ramayana. Vajiyo has written about the Rama-Ravana war, and the message that Sita sent from her confinement. Rama devotion is not as popular as Krishna devotion in Gujarat and hence Rama devotional literature is little as campared to literature regarding Krishna devotion.

Some Jain writers like Anandghan, have written devotional poems about non personal and formless God.

C.M.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Hindi). The Hindi scene of devotional literature (Bhakti Sahitya) which is more or less associated with the Bhaktikal may be synchronized with the period from 14th to 17th century. Ramchandra Shukla, in his Hindi Sahitya Ka Itihas, has very rightly counted this phase of Bhaktikal from 1318 to 1623 A.D.

'Bhakti-andolan' recreated and reorganized a new ethos of life, built a new society and re-defined the classical and conventional terminology in a new socio-religious set-up, which attracted almost all the existing faith, including Islam to join a rejuvenating force, for the benefit of the whole society.

Its arrival in the North (from the South) has been questioned occasionally. Grierson seems almost surprised when he finds overnight the arrival of Bhakti movement. In his words, 'it was just like lightning in the clouded sky'. The sudden emergence of Bhakti, which first of all appeared in Dravid land, flourished in Karnataka, occasionally appeared in Maharashtra, then through Gujarat finally reached Vrindavan and once again acquired dignity and superiority. This has been stated in this couplet:

Bhakti Dravid upaje, Laye Ramanand
Paragata Kiya Kabir ne, Sapta deep nava Khand'.

Under the stewardship of Acharya Ramanand (14th century) and later of Kabir, this Bhakti, born in Dravidland (South), was brought in or introduced to North India.

Rigveda (Varun Sukta and its other Richas), Brahma sutra, and Srimadbhagwat are considered the basic canon to provide the concept of Bhakti through the ages. In the South, the Alwar Bhaktas of Vaishnava faith (from 4th to 10th century), were the moving spirit behind the propagation of the bhakti movement through their numerous padas, charged with emotions, dedication and humble devotion. The Vaishnava Acharya Ramanuja, Vishnuswami, Nimbarkacharya and Madhvacharya collectively, somehow managed to assemble a few form and formations (Swarupa evam Paddhati) of Vaishnava cult. Exploring and expanding their respective views and approaches these were again defused with the Bhagwat dharma and thus the Upasana bhakti emerged. The emphasis laid under this religious practice was on offering oneself towards 'Ekeshwar Satta'. But again, with the prevailing influence of Brahman dharma along with its polytheism, Bhagawat dharma more or less lost its originality and priorities. Hence, the attitude towards the 'Eka' (Singular) was divided and spread over to 'Bahu' (many).

Yet again after centuries, the wheel of the timeless time moved on towards the monotheism from the polytheism and Islam and Sufism played a significant role in this. Some scholars have mentioned that with the arrival of Islam only, the emergence of Bhakti-cult became possible. But actually, Islam was redefining itself and it was very much inclined towards the human approach and all the impacts of Turk, Arabic and Irani cultures were Indianised in the Mughal period, as M.L. Roychoudhuri especially has observed in his book, The State and Religion in Mughal India.

Among the poets, who represented Krishna Bhaktishakha, Brajmandal was the centre of the movement. Various cults with the halmark of Vallabha, Nimbark, Radhavallabha, Haridasi and Chaitanya were equally and successfully spreading the message of Srimadbhagvat through Lila-gana and Nama-samkirtan. Sri Vallabhacharya was the great precursor of Pustimargiya Bhakti-cult and his follower poets were regarded as 'Astachhapi' (or Asta-sakha). Surdas, Kumbhandas, Parmananddas and Krishnadas were the direct disciples of Sri Vallabhacharaya and other four Govindswami, Nanddas, Chhitswami and Chaturbhujdas were the disciples of Sri Goswami Bitthaldas. The concept of 'Pustimarga' was solely dependent upon the grace ('Anugarh') of the Lord, Sri Krishna. But simultaneously along with Radha Krishna, the other damsels in various lilas, which were immenseiy popular among the masses. Through this Lilas obviously and occasionally the poets have depicted the contemporary social and political scene, which evoked the concerned people to assemble and raise their voice against supression, injustice and exploitation. Vallabacharya, Guru Nanak, Tulsidas, and other poets have mentioned the anarchic situation prevailing in the society as well as state.

The Bhakta or Sant poets gladly chose Hindi media to express their inner experience by and large for centuries, upto later mediaeval period (1700). Stars who had added lustre to this literary movement were: Swami Ramanand, Namdev, Kabir, Raidas, Nanak, Dadudayal, Sundardas, Rajjab of Nirguna School; Tulsidas and other poets of Rambhakti Shakha of Sagun School.

All these poets were dedicated and enlightened souls who advocated the same enternity, according to their experiences and of course, their tradition (panth or Guru-Parampara). Swami Ramanand (13th century) founder of Ramanandi Sampradaya was formely associated with Ramanuja's Sri Sampradaya. His followers established their first gadi at Galta in the 15th century and advocated navdha bhakti and wanted the inclusion of Premlaksana bhakti as dashdha. Swami Ramanand advocated both Saguna and Nirguna in his bhakti-paddhati, but soon it was bifurcated into two important branches—Nirguna (Nirakar) and Saguna (Sakar). Kabir became the preceptor of Nirguna whereas Surdas and Tulsidas were the precursors of Krishna bhakti shakha and Rambhakti shakha respectively.

Vidyapati (15th century), Mirabai (16th century) and Raskhan (16th century) are the three important composers who created the numerous padas and chhappay (eight lined padas), even two-line pithy couplets (doha or soratha) for this purpose.

Vidyapati, a devotee of Shiva, who has also sung the song of the adorable couple Radha-Krishna and their eternal beauty and their 'aparup sringar' in his various padas added a new dimension to Bhakti literature.

Ran.S.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Kannada). Devotional literature in Kannada is found mainly in the Vachanas of the various saints of the different stages of its literary history. Though different strands of devotion centring round Krishna, Rama and ancient Jaina saints are available in literature, the most significant literary movement started with Virashaivas and their Vachanas. The word Vachana has since been used as a technical term referring to the utterances of Shiva sharanas who propagated Virashaivism in the 12th century. They are, as it were, a by-product of a religio-social movement that took place in the northern part of Karnataka. To understand the speciality of Vachana literature, a background knowledge of that movement is absolutely necessary.

By the turn of the 12th century the religious and social life of Karnataka was stinking as a result of stagnation, as was the case elsewhere in India. Society had fragmented itself due to watertight compartments of castes. By this time varnas had given way to caste system and castes had created many islands in society without allowing interaction among themselves. The religious scene abounded with ghastly practices; and there grew several cults which indulged in esoteric practices. Among those who claimed to follow the Vedas were sects worshipping Shiva, Shakti, Vishnu, Ganapati, Surya and so on. Cults such as Kapalikas, Kalamukhas, Shaktas, Kaulas, Natha-panthis practised tantrism for the realization of God. Buddhism had also degenerated into esotericism. Jainism had prescribed very rigid practices as means towards a realisation of the divine. In the neighbouring areas (now belonging to Tamil Nadu) Vaishnavism propagating the supremacy of Lord Vishnu was spreading, challenging the pre-eminence of Shiva. On the social front were divisive forces of casteism, untouchability and so on. This state of affairs had sent some people into a rage and they decided to propagate a religion with Shiva as the supreme godhead. This developed into a movement and spread itself to a vast area of the northern part of the present day Karnataka, having Kalyana in Bijapur District as its nucleus. The smouldering discontent and urge for a new religion had its origin in the eleventh century itself, but came out in a big way as a popular upsurge in the middle of the 12th century.

The broad features of the new religion could be enumerated thus: (1) wearing of the symbol (linga) on the body; (ii) not worshipping the idol at the temple and not building temples; (iii) looking with esteem the eight-fold sacred things namely Guru, Linga, Jangama, Padodaka, Prasada, Vibhuti, rudrakshi and a Mantra; (iv) subjecting oneself to five-fold codes of conduct: Lingachara (worshipping only Linga worn on the body); Sadachara (earning one's own livelihood doing a kayaka or profession); Shivachara or samayachara (looking upon other members of the faith as equal to oneself) Ganachara (protecting the interests of one's religion from the onslaught of others), and Bhrityachara (serving devotees with humility); (v) the belief that a devotee attains realisation through six stages of evolution: Bhaktasthala, Maheswarastala, Prasadisthala, Pranalingisthala, Sharanasthala and Aikyasthala.

The shivasharanas or propagators of Virashavia, the new religion, had evolved a social philosophy also to be adopted by them. They wanted that they should get themselves organised in a well-knit manner and they said that all who wore linga duly initiated by guru were equal irrespective of the caste or creed they originally belonged to before conversion to virashaivism. The sharanas never looked upon kingship as great even though the leader of the movement, Basavanna, was himself a high officer in the exchequer of Bijjala, a king of Kalachuri dynasty who ruled from Kalyana. Women were also eligible for the ultimate liberation; for example, Mahadevi Akka, wife of a feudal king left the palace in dissension, renouncing everything. Sharanas never considered worldly pleasures to be hinderances to higher attainments.

They preferred the ordinary folk to pursue sober pleasures and strive alongside to get spiritually better rather than practise a half-baked renunciation. The leaders were always opposed to idle-living. People were amassing wealth or increasing the income by advancing money on interest. All these new ideas were successful in popularising virashaivism and people got themselves converted to the new religion in great numbers.

Even though the movement was highly organised, it was wrecked before the very eyes of the pioneers of the movement. This happened when Basavanna supported the solemnization of a marriage between the son of an outcaste (the father's name being Haraliah) and the daughter of a Brahmin (the father was Madhuviah). This was in consonance with the ideals of the movement which proposed that there should be no distinction observed between two bhaktas. But people outside the veerashaiva fold, who were hitherto watching its growing popularity with awe and stupefaction, did not tolerate this 'outrage'. When the puritans complained against this to King Bijjala. he ordered that the father involved in such marriage should be blinded. Enraged by this, some followers of Basavanna assassinated the king, which further triggered off violence. There was actual fighting and bloodshed between the puritans and the followers of the new faith but as non-virashaivas out-numbered sharanas, the leaders had to flee to save their lives. Thus, a movement, though originally a religious one, which imbibed in it some modern ideals, faded very soon. It was essentially a fight against the parochial forces.

As a part of this movement Vachanas were composed Whether these were written down by the authors or they were handed down generations through oral form is still an enigma. The movement popularised composing of Vachanas and more than two hundred vachanakaras were engaged in this; of them many people belonged to different strata of society; there were women and there were people from the oppressed classes. The bulk of Vachanas available now is astounding, even though a considerable portion of the originally composed Vachanas might have been destroyed by the puritans. Important Vachanakars are Basavanna, Allama Prabhu, Maha Devi Akka, Channabasavanna, Urilinga Peddi, Moliga Marayya, Siddharama, Ambigara Chowdiah and others.

Till very recently Vachanas were considered to be merely religious writing. But when the outlook changed because of English education, the new scholars were able to discover great poetry hidden in it. Of course, a major portion of this writing deals with religious thought; many of them explaining the metaphysics of veerashaiva religion, some dealing with the ritualistic part, some giving expression to the author's mystic experience and so on. But when the writers express their inner conflicts or make an incisive study of the social habits or give vent to their reformative mind, we find excellent poetry.

Vachana is a short composition running into a few lines, each embodying an idea which is in itself complete. It is almost like the modern lyric in form and content. But no single Vachana confroms to any definite metrical verse; thus, it could be called 'verse libre'. Nevertheless, mention is made at several places in old literary works, of Vachanas being sung, and at times set to classical ragas. Thus modern critics classify Vachanas under prose poems. Each vachanakara uses 'Ankita' or 'Mudrika', the dedication to the deity at the end of each composition. For example, at the end of each of his composition, Basavanna uses the name 'Kudalasangamadeva',; Mahadevi Akka's ankita is 'Chennamallikarjuna'; Allama Prabhu has 'Goggeswara' or 'Guheswara' as his ankita; the ankita of Ambigara Chowdiah is his own name and so on. For Ankita, vachanakaras used the name of one's deity, the name of one's guru, one's own name, one's husband's deity and so on. With the help of this ankita, it is easy to identify the authorship of a particular Vachana.

Vachana is 'a moment's monument' in its content, giving expression to a single thought or emotion of the author; in this case, Jedara Dasimayya's:

Hunger the great serpent has seized the vitals and the venom is mounting from foot to brow.
Only he is the true Snake-man in all the world who can feed this hunger food and bring the poison down
Ramanatha (Tr. by A.K. Ramanujan)

In this vachana 'hunger' is used in the sense of worldliness and the author speaks of the intensity of worldliness and the difficulty in overcoming it.

In one of the Vachanas, Basavanna picturesquely brings home the urgency of turning towards Lord Shiva as time flees and one gets old rendering it too late to do good things.

The careless mood towards the world and its contents, of the one who has had communion with god is the theme of a Vachana by Mahadevi Akka.

And the way one who is nearer god is overpowered by godliness is exquisitely brought home in one of the Vachanas of Allama Prabhu:

A running river is all legs.
A burning fire is mouths all over.
A blowing breeze
is all hands.
So, lord of the caves (Guheshwara) for your men
every limb is a symbol.

The hundred moods and the hundred stances of man's quest for oneness with divinity is expressed in Vachanas. Not only do the vachanakaras give expression to their exclusive feelings and emotions, but they are aware of the shortcomings of the stagnant world. Their Vachanas deal with themes ranging from the devotee's plea to god foı salvation to the lull of surrender; from ambivalence of the mind to the quiet oneness with god; from pitying the sinner to the scathing criticism of the worldly person; from the wonder at god's kindess to bitterness towards a hard-hearted lord; from propagating one's faith to expressing one's mystical experience; from exhorting an ordinary man to following righteous path in a simple language to giving expression to one's inner experience in the profoundest terms; from explaining the ritual to exaggerating the errors of other religions.

To transform their emotions and thoughts into language the vachanakaras use the language of Kannada in all its grandeur, in hundred forms. Even to express the most abstract mystic experiences, the vachanakaras never find the Kannada language inadeqnate for anything. Thus Vachanas are considered to be exquisite examples of great lyric poetry.

Vachanas are comparable in content to the best literary and religious writings of the world. Till recently Vachanas were considered as sacred literature and recited by those following Lingayet religion; but new literary vistas prompted by a western outlook have brought in Vachanas for a fresh critical reappraisal of late, and for a better understanding of their deeper meaning and significance. The late S.S. Basawanal published his edition of Vachanas of Basavanna entirely with a new outlook. His insight discovered the parellelism in the structure of Vachanas and divided lines to relate to meaning. He admits that he was treading the path of Richard G Moulton who says in his book, The Literary Study of the Bible , that the Bible was the worst printed book in the world and that the eye was not allowed to help the mind in recognising its literary structure.

The form of Vachana has been having its intense influence on all sensitive writers of the Kannada language. Due to the advent of Islam the life and the literary scene even in the south was a broken mirror during the century succeeding the 12th century. From the 14th century the compilation work of the Vachanas went on with fervour. Many expositions were written on Vachanas. Sunya Sampadane was compiled by Shivaganaprasadi Mahadeviah, in which the author strings together hundreds of Vachanas of different authors in order to dramatise various views on mystic experience. Writings of old masters were preserved in hundreds of volumes and many new authors tried their hands at writing Vachanas, especially from the 15th century onwards. One Tontada Siddhalinga Yati who lived between 1500-1584, assisted by his seven hundred devotees, took up the work of rejuvenation of Lingayet religion. Not only did he propagate the religion, but he wrote hundreds of Vachanas and caused several others to try their hand at it. But vachanas composed during this tide, which continued incessantly even after, is not comparable with the ones of the 12th century either in lyrical quality or use of language.

It is curious that even Haridasas of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, who sang 'kirtanas' to propagate Dwaita cult, came under the influence of vachanakaras, especially in the composition of 'Ugabhogas' (free-verse to be sung), even though the Haridasas were followers of vaishnavism. This speaks volumes on the impact the vachanakaras left on the succeeding generations.

Even today, year after year, volumes of vachanas are being brought out by our contemporary writers. Of course, they vary widely in content. While many pontiffs of various virashaiva monasteries write vachanas on metaphysical and religious themes, several poets give vent to their experiences through Vachana form with modern diction. Thus even today the Vachana continues to be a vehicle of religious as well as secular thoughts. The modern poets drew heavily on the vachanakaras for imagery and expression. The students of language look with awe at the facility with which vachanakaras used Kannada. The religious pontiffs still continue to dig out new meanings of vachanas; anthropologists still try to bring out the circumstances in which this socio-religious movement took place. The literary historian continues to wonder whether a parellel to this literary form could be found in Kannada with as much vigour in it. But vachana literature is being looked upon by all as the greatest contribution that the Kannada language could make to the devotional literature of the world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.K. Ramanujam, Speaking of Siva, Penguin classics, (1973); H. Tipperudraswamy, The Virasaiva Saints (translated from Kannada into English by S.M. Angadi, 1968); K.R. Srinivasa Iyenger and S.S. Basavanai, Musings of Basava; L.M.A. Menezes and S.S. Bhoosnurmath, Sunya Sampadane, Vols. I & II (1969); M. Chindanda Murthy, Basavanna (NBT); S.C. Nandimath, A Handbook of Virasaivism, (1942).

P.V.N.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Kashmiri). Devotional poetry constitutes a sizable part of Kashmiri literature. Excepting a few all the poets of name and fame have contributed towards the treasure of devotional literature.

The devotional poetry of the Muslims deserves to be attended to in the first instance because of its bulk and currency among the masses. So far as the theme and content is concerned the devotional poetry of the Muslims can be classed as under:
(a) 'Naat: Poems in praise of Prophet of Islam. (b) 'Hamad': Poems in praise of benediction of God. (c) 'Durud': Salutation. (d) 'Manqabat': Glorification of prophet of Islam and his companions. (e) 'Marsia': ẹlegies lamenting the Martyrdom of Imam Zadas.

It is the theme alone that determines the class of a particular composition. Somtimes it is very difficult to differentiate between the Naat and 'Manqabat' because of the amalgam of the themes. Otherwise there are no hard and fast rules of metre and form for the composition of a devotional song of a particular class. In this connection one thing is noteworthy that 'Marsia' is restricted to 'Shia' sect only and is still composed in old Sanskrit 'Chhanda'. Persian has not influenced this class of poetry as far as its form is concerned but the impact on language is very much evident.

'Naats' and 'Marsia' are the two popular themes of the muslim devotional poetry.'Marsia' is particularly in vogue in 'Shia' sect but Naat is the legacy of all Muslims Naatia poetry forms almost more than half of the total devotional poetry of the Muslims in Kashmiri.

The earliest traces of Naat and 'Hamad' are very much present in the shruks and Pada of Nund Rishi (1377-1442).

Habib Ullah Hubi (17th century) is a poet of rank after Nund Rishi who has composed Naats of high order. Hubi was a great Saint and a believer in the philosophy of unity of being. His Naats are composed in folk form and are,therefore, very sweet and popular.

Mahmood Gami (d. 1885) is the first Kashmiri poet who composed his Naats on the Persian pattern. His Naats contain nothing particular. It is Maqbool Kralwari (d. 1870-71) who opened new vistas in the realm of devotional poetry and deserves attention and tribute. He is the propounder of real Naatia tradition in Kashmiri. His Naats and 'Manqbats' in praise of Nund Rishi and Sultan-ul-Arifeen are the masterpieces of devotional poetry and of lasting value. His love for the Prophet and his faith in the grace of God and his Prophet pours forth from each line of his 'Naatia Kalam'. It is not his craftsmanship but his love and reverence for God and His Prophet that gives flow to his eternal songs. His songs are the garlands of love and reverence.

The tradition of 'Naat' was continued by Fakir (18th century) Qutub-uDin (d. 1885) Nazim (18th century), Suna Ullah Kreri (d. 1876), Shams Faqir (1904), Samad Mir (d. 1959) and Ghulam Nabi Aziz (d. 1965).

But amongst them all it is Abdul Ahad Nadim (d. 1909) who is unsurpassed in his devotional poetry. His contemporaries continued the tradition but it sprouted, thrived, and flourished with full bloom through his poetic power and efforts.

Most of the devotional compositions of Nadim are in 'Vatsun' form and are, therefore, very popular because of their lyrical quality. His Naats and Manqabats are rich in thought content as well as in music. He has comparatively written less in number but qualitatively his compositions are superb and excellent. In the selection of words his only rival in the whole realm of Kashmiri poetry is Krish Razdan.

Pir Aziz Ullah Haqqani (d. 1926) is another notable poet of this school. His 'Naats', 'Manqabats' etc. are cherished by the devotees but he is no match to Nadim.

Abdul Ahad Zargar the great living Sufi poet has also composed Naats and 'Manqabats'. His spiritual grandeur has added to the quality of his devotional poetry. Like his other compositions his Naats also contain the quality of spiritual experiences and indicate the real way of devotion.

The Naatia Rubias of Ghulam Rasool Nazki are the gems of devotional poetry. Other poets who continue the tradition of Naat and 'Manqabat' in modern age include Rashid Nazki, Ghulam Nabi Nazir, Navaz Rattanpuri, Betab, Mashal Sultanpuri and Fazil Kashmiri. Fazil has a lyrical quality peculiar to him alone in the current period. His Naatia anthology, Anwari Mohamodi, has run into several editions and its fourth deluxe edition appeared in 1974. He is working at its new edition at present.

Gulshani Naat is an anthology of selected Naats and Manqabats of leading poets. Its 10th impression appeared in 1972 from Srinagar. Kulyati Nadim (collected works of Nadim) was published in 1972 from Srinagar. It has been edited by Rashid Nazki who has added a beautiful foreword depicting the history of Naat to it. Noorana (ed. Mohammad Ahsan 'Ahsan') is an anthology of 'Manqabats' in praise of the patron saint of Kashmir Nund Rishi. This anthology was published by Cultural Academy in 1981.

Some important poets of 'Marsia' include Hakim Habib Ullah, Hakim Muhammad Javad and Munshi Muhammad Yusuf. So far only two anthologies of traditional 'Mansavi' have appeared. Both the books have been edited by Anil Kazmi and published from Budgam. The first anthology, Kashmir Marsi (Kashmiri Marsia) appeared in 1974 and second Hiki ta Woush (Lamenlations) in 1978.

The devotional poetry of the Hindus in Kashmiri is a problem to reckon with. All the poets of various Bhakti Schools are devotional poets also. They have not confined themselves to any particular school. A poet is at the same time a mystic, Krishnabhakta and Shivabhakta.

Rup Bhawani (b. 1621, d. 1721) was a high ranking poet of devotional order. She is considered to be the incarnation of Sarda Devi. Her 'Vakhs' are the best specimens of 'Shakta' School. The compositions of Keshiv Nath, Anandji Thakurjoo, Haldarjoo and Sat Lal Bekas are also devotional in nature and content.

The illuminating compositions of Master Zinda Koul (b. 1884, d. 1966) are the perfect and the best pieces of devotional poetry. Masterji never confined himself to any particular school but was a singer of god's greatness. He is a poet of spiritual reality and the music of soul throbs in his poetry. His anthology Sumran appeared in 1955 from Srinagar and has run into several editions since then. He was given Sahitya Akademi Award for this book.

The other trends of devotional poetry were also predominent in Kashmir. In other regional languages Bhakti cult was a reaction against the foreign rule and influence, though this cult was as old as the Vedas and Upnishdas. But as a movement Bhakti School gathered momentum after 1000. both in southern and northern parts of our country. In Kashmir the situation was some what different. The struggle for existence between Buddhism and Shaivism had started much earlier probably in 6th and 7th century .In this struggle Buddhism had but to yield and Shaivism flourished with its full splendour for about five hundred years and dominated the scene.

Against this back ground we can say that Bhakti cult of Kashmir was not a reaction against foreign domination but the outcome of the struggle between Buddhism and Shaivism.

Kashmiri poetry opened its eyes in the lap of Shaiva yogis and attained the Youthful charm through the efforts of Bhakti poets of Rama and Krishna orders.

In the history of Kashmiri literature it was because of the predominant influence of Kashmir Shaivism that in the first instance we are face to face with Shaiva Bhakti poets.

We know but little about the state of Kashmiri literature before Lal Ded. The great poetry of Lal Ded is an ample proof of the fact that her poetry is not the beginning of a period but the zenith of a glorious epoch. It also indicates that Shaivabhakti was at its best when Lal Ded composed her celestial 'Vakhs'. Political uncertainity was then the order of the day, but the majority of the people professed Hinduism and Islam was just stepping into the field.

The Chum pads of 'Chum' Sampradayak saints are the earliest specimens of Kashmiri poetry and at the same time expression of Bhaktiyoga also.

Lal Ded (1320-1384) is a great poet of all times. It is the most powerful spirit of Shaivabhakti which flows spontaneously through her 'Vakhs'. She represents the Nirguna School. Her aphorism like 'Vakhs' are peerless jems of spiritual experience. She is great because she has expressed her inner mind with perfection and her 'Vakhs' contain the warmth of her feelings and impressions of her spiritual greatness. Lal Ded is the first among the Shivayogis who made Shiva philosophy public for the first time through her poetry.

The poetry of Lal Ded has been given the name of 'Vakh', but 'Vakh' is not confined to her alone. In fact all the poets representing the Shaivabhakti School of Kashmir Saivism call their compositions Vakh. The observation made by some scholars that 'Vakh' started and ended with Lal Ded carries no weight in the light of recent research.

The Vakhs of Lal Ded have attained the status of Maxims and proverbs, and are loved by Hindus and Muslims alike. She knows no caste, creed and colour. She has no faith in idol worship, pilgrimage and rituals. She definitely disapproved of all such things through her 'Vakhs' but she is first a poet and then a Shaiva Saint. She subordinated her philosophy to her poetic genius and here lies her greatness. But at the same time we feel an undercurrent of Nagarjuna, Madhymika and Nathpanthi philosophy in her poetry. This influence is evident in the poetry of all the poets of Kashmir Shaiva School and Sufi poets.

The tradition of 'Vakh' continues with full vigour even today. Other notable Shivabhakta poets of Nirguna Vada School who continued the tradition of Vakh include Mirza Kak (Pathan period) Lacchakak (d. 1871), Tika Kak, (d. 1888), Bonakak (d. 1818, d. 1913), Ramananda (d. 1853) and Thakurjoo Sapru (b. 1878, d. 1953).

Apart from this school of Shaiva poets there are the poets of Sugunavad Shaivabhakti School. The poets of sugunavad Shaiva School adopted Vatsun (Lyric) as the vehicle of their expression. There songs glow with the devotional fervour.

Besides Mahadeva, the poets of this school have composed songs in praise of Devi, Ganesha and other deities of Hindu Pantheon. Among the Sugunavad School of Saivabhakti School of poets Krishna Razdan (b. 1850, d. 1926) dominates the scene. His songs in praise of Shiva have no parallel in Kashmiri. Rich in thought content his melodies are eternal notes of Shaivabhakti. The musiscal quality of his compositions deserves particular mention and notice. Besides Krishna Razdan, other important poets of this school are Vasu Deva (d. 1872), Haldarjoo and Tarachand, Bismil (b. 1904, d. 1948). Paramananda (b. 1794, d. 1879) is basically a Krishnabhakta but he has composed Shiva Lagan (The wedding of Shiva) also. In this long poem some portions reveal the reverence and devotion of the poet towards Shiva.

Ramabhakti flourished some what late here, in the second half of 19th century. Prakash Ram (b. 1891, d. 1877) is the first representative poet of this school, who composed Ramavatarcharit, to provide impetous to Ramabhakti. After him five more versions of the Ramayana were written in Kashmiri by Shankarnath (1870), Anand Ram (1881-1889) Vishnu Koul (d. 1918), Amarnath (d. 1908), Tarachand 'Bismil' (b. 1904 d. 1948) and Nilkhanth Sharma (d. 1969). The guiding spirit behind these versions has been to stimulate the Ramabhakti among the masses. This puropse has been fulfilled to a large extent. Besides the various versions of the Ramayana Bhajans, Vatsuns and Padas have been composed in praise of Rama in a handsome number but Ramavatarcacharit has proved instrumental in the spread of Ramabhakti here. The cornerstone of Krishnabhakti in Kashmiri is Krishnaavatarcharit by Sahib Koul (b. 1629). The Krishnaavatar Lila of Prakash Ram is another mile stone in this direction but it is Paramananda who gives new dimensions to it. He is a great Krishnabhakta and a great poet. His Krishnabhakti has been poured out in the form of sweet and soothing songs. His melodies carry us to the land of Shri Krishna and make us enjoy 'Rasa-lila' and flute playing of the Lord. In this direction his dear disciple Bulbul Nagami (b. 1812, d. 1902) is his co-author in the composition of Radhasuyamvara a masterpiece of Krishnabhakti in Kashmiri. Manju Attar (d. 1964) is another notable poet of this school. His Masnavis Krishnaavatar and Rukminimangal are an invaluable contribution to the Krishnabhakti poetry of Kashmiri.

While Paramananda is the poet of 'Madhura Bhava' School of Krishnabhakti, it is Manju who represents the Kantabhava. Almost all the poets of various schools of Bhakti have composed songs in praise of the great mother, representing her various attributes. Other important poets who have contributed there bit to one or the other school of Bhakti are Thakurju Manvati (b. 1850,d. 1923). Aftab Joo Baskar (b. 1892, d. 1964) and Master Zinda Koul (b. 1884, d. 1966).

Bhakti trend has influenced some Muslim poets of Kashmir also. Those who show some influence of Vishnu and Shivabhakti include Shah Gafur (1800-1890) Ahmad Bat Wari (b. 1845,d. 1918), Shamas Faqir (d. 1901) Samad Mir (b. 1892, d. 1959) and Ahad Zargar.

Some poets of the present age have kept the tradition of Bhakti alive even today. Among the current day poets Sarvanand Koul 'Premi', Prem Nath Premi, Shambu Nath Bhat 'Haleem', P.N. Sail and Moti Lal Saqi compose poems in the bhakti strain.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.A. Azad, Kashmiri Zaban aur Shayiri (Srinagar, 1962-64); Autar Krishan Rahbar, Kashri Adbulk Tariekh, Vol I (Srinagar-1965): Balji Kalu Pandit, Kashmiri Kavimein Siva Shastar (Jammu-1976); 'Chaman' Lal Chaman Bashir Akhtar Awhalama (Srinagar-1979).

Mo.S.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE(Konkani) has a fairly long tradition with poetry going back to pre-Portuguese days. A song written by Namdev (14th century) and the writings of Krishnadas Shama furnish enough evidence. There is a mention of a poem on the Passion of Christ by Gaspar de Sam Miguel (16th century), Konkani had a considerable body of hymns by the 19th century, the best known of them being Riglo Jesu Molyantu (Jesus Entered the Field) by Joaquim de Miranada. Hindu devotional poetry flourished among the Konkani speakers of Kerala during the last decade of the 17th century with Sant Appayya, Jogavva and Avadi. The tradition is kept up to this day by Kamalammal, Narahari Prabhu, Suhas Dalal, Ramkrishan Zuwarkar, Vithaldas Prabhu, etc.

The Christian missionaries set up the first printing press in Goa in 1556, and with it began the era of Konkani literature in print, in Roman script. In the same year was printed the Christian Doctrine into Konkani and circulated among new converts. Among the missionaries Fr. Thomas Stephens is the most outstanding. His Doutrina Cristao and Christa Puranna are outstanding works. Imitating him, more than one hundred religious books of merit are believed to have been printed in Konkani during the span of the next two hundred years, both in prose and poetry, some being original and others translations. Among these, Sant Antonichim Ascharyam (Miracles of St. Anthony, 1655) and Jivitha Katha by Fr. Antonio Saldanha and Vanmalleancho Mallo (Garden of Shepherds, 1658) by Miguel de Almeida stand out prominently. Inspired by Fr. Maffei's efforts, Mgr. Miguel de Colaco and Mons. Raimundo Mascarenhas wrote the earlier books in Kannada script towards the last quarter of 19th century Mons. Mascarenhas is particularly remembered for his translation of the New Testament. Later, Luis de Mascarenhas produced his masterpiece Abravamlem Yadnadan (The sacrifice of Abraham) in Kannada script.

Konkani prose in its Christian garb began with a few catechisms. Many translations and adaptations of religious classics from Europe followed. Friar Amador de Santa Anna turned Ribadanneyra's Flos Sancoturm into Konkani prose (1612). Diogo Ribeiro wrote into well chiselled prose an Exposition of Christian Doctrine (1632) based on Bellarmine's and other author's dissertations on it as did Francisco Joao de Sam Matias who wrote on the life of Christ. Joago de Pedrosa authored a good translation of Bernadino 'Villegas' Soliloqios Divinos' as Devachim Yecangra Bollannim (1660). Ignazio Arcamone's Sagllea Vorusacho Vangel (Gospels for the whole year, 1667) is a the first prose version in any Indian language of any portion of the Bible. These and similar works aimed at disseminating knowledge of Christianity among the new converts in Goa. They centered around lives of saints, meditations and catechisms. The latter were more popular, other authors in that genre being Friars Manoel Baptista, and Manuel do Lado.

In Kerala, informs John Leyden (18th century), there existed a Konkani prose translation of Bhagvadgita and Linga Purana and epics as well as original works like Virabhadra Charitam, and Parashuramcharitam, Sthala Purana of temples. In Karnataka, among Hindus, besides devotional poetry, Narayan Tirtha's allegory Mana Indriyalem Charitra (19th century) is an important philosophical work. The Gita has been rendered into Konkani prose by several writers. The Swamis of Chitrapur, Pandurangashram (1847-1915) and Anandashram (1902-66) collected the Diwali addresses delivered to their congregations and are specimens of good metaphysical prose.

R.C. Sarma's Bhashaganamanjari (1930) is a collection of twenty six devotional songs set to different ragas and tales of Karnataka music. Sri Narasimhavilasom Press and Book Depot, Turavoor, published Gananjali (1931) containing twenty songs in Malayalam script by R.C. Sarma, A.D. Hari Sarma, K. Srinivas Kamath, R. Madhav Pai and C.N. Gopalkrishna Prabhu. G. Kamalammal's Patracharitam (1932) tells the story of the divine pot ('akshayapatra') given to Draupadi by Sun God. A song entitled 'Krishnalila' narrating the pranks of the child Krishna is also included in the book (Malayalam script). Vedavati Ammal's Bhajanamalika (1948) is a kirtan on Sri Tirupathi Venkatachalapati; A.R.V. Indrakant Sarma's (ed.) Saraswatha Kirtana Mala (1950) is a collection of devotional songs including Satyanarayan Vratakatha and Nama Ramayanam and also Tukaramarati and Jnanadevarati. N.N. Padnabh Shenoy's Sri Krishna Bhakti (1952) contains twenty three devotional songs (Malayalam script). G. Vimala Cochin's Bhaktiganangal (1969) is a small book of just seven songs. V. Ammal's Saubhagya Lakshmi Venkatesa Amantran Utsavam (1977) is a compilation of songs composed on the occasion of the 25th anniversary celebrtions of T.D. Temple at Ernakulam, Kerala (Malayalam script). V. Somalatha's Bhakti Ganamala (1978, Kannada script) contains 23 devotional songs. Dhormik Geetam (Hymns, 1978, Roman script) by Fr. Moren Souza is a collection of christian religious songs. Bhaja Govindam (1978, Kannada script) by B.V. Bale is an attempt at rendering into Konkani verse of the famous work by Shankaracharya. Vatsala Manjunath Rao's Konkani Padya Sangraha (1979) contains 21 verses: five of these are purely devotional while others are on a variety of subjects. Gurudev Publications, Kanhangad, published Kavitanjali (1980) containing 17 hymns by P.R. Nayak, K. Ananta Bhat, K. Narayan Nayak and Payyanur Ramesh Pai. Mhantari Ajji (1080) by V. Shet Balraj contains some devotional songs. Stotram (Hymns, 1980) by Prin. Pedro J.Lobo, is a collection of fifty hymns translated into Konkani from the Latin version of the New Testament (Roman script). Raghuramayan (1981) is a version of the Ramayana by G. Kamalammal from Kerala. Kalyan Saugandhika (1981) by R.Gopal Prabhu is a dance song composed on the pattern of Ottan prevalent in Kerela. It is a dialogue between Hanumant and Bhima, the epic characters. Kristachem Tatangeet (Passion of Christ, 1981) by Fr. Moren Souza (Roman script) is a successful attempt at versification. Nihyal Kiratana (1981) by Fr. C.C. Pai (Swamy Supriya) is a collection of a few hymns from the Bible; Mogan ya Hogryan (1982) by the same author are commentaries on psalms of the Bible.

Dhormik Gitam (Hymns, 1978) by Fr. Moren de Souza is a collection of Christian religious songs. Stotram (Hymns, 1980) by Prin. Pedro J.Lobo, is a collection of fifty hymns translated into Konkani from the Latin version of the new Testament, New Vulgata.

P.G.T.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE(Maithili) Many great poets of Maithili Literature were devotees of high order. It seems as if the aim of their life was not simply to create literature but to be nearer their deity through devotional literature. The people of Mithila have spiritual outlook on life from the very beginning and it culminated in the creation of devotional literature.

Mithila, the ancient land of Janak and Yajnavalkya, Suka and Sulabha became in course of time, a stronghold of the Sakti cult based on Tantras, but the Maithil people were catholic and responsive to any new idea, preached through religion, philosophy or literature. Before the Karnata dynasty there was some social disorder due to Buddhism which had to be set right and the need for reorganisation of social condition and religious values was felt strongly. The Maithil scholars had studied Pauranic literature like the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, Srimad-bhagavata, Durga-saptasati, Sivapuran, Vishnupuran and other works of religious importance. These inspired the Maithil scholars to compose devotional literature in their mother tongue. Devotional literature in Maithili begins from the great Maithil poet Vidyapati (1350-1438). His devotional songs consist of prayer of different forms of deities like Sakti, Siva, Rama, Radha Krishna etc. This was followed by his contemporaries and successors.

In the religious life of Mithila there is no difference of feeling among people of different religious sects inspite of different modes of workship practised by different sects. Generally the Maithili people worship different deities simultaneously. So there is a famous saying about the Maithils "Antah Shaktah, Bahih Saivh Sabhamadhyetu Vaishnavah" i.e. Maithils are internally Sakta, externally Saiva and in deliberations with scholars Vaishnava.Though this has been said by a non-Maithil to ridicule them it is a statement of fact. This is apparant in Maithili literature too. Beginning from Vidyapati and coming to the present day when we make a survey of Maithili literature we see that poems, dramas, epics, Khand-Kavyas,etc., have been written in adoration of different deities.

Mithila has been Saiva from the very beginning. The stories depicted in Puranas provide grounds to believe that Mithila has been Saiva from time immemorial. King Janak himself was a great devotee of Lord Siva. In the worship of Siva the songs composed by Vidyapati have contributed a lot. The Saiva literature by Vidyapati became an important part of Maithili literature. Siva means welfare and the worship of Siva is the essence of worship of all deities. The mutual relationship between Siva and Sakti as husband and wife is the reason behind the feeling that there is no difference between Saiva and Shakta. The worship of Sakti alongwith that Siva is the ideal of Maithil's cultural and religious life. In the Puranas the wise saying "Kalau Devi-Mahesvarau" i.e. in Kaliyug sakti and Siva are the only two divine powers meant for worship holds good even today.

Three forms of 'Siva Lila' have attracted the devotee poets of Maithili. The first form is the ferocious picture of Siva when he becomes insane due to pangs of separation after the death of Sati. The second form refers to the marriage of Siva with Parvati. Parvati's undergoing religious austerities to get Siva as her husband, Parvati's test by Siva in the disguise of a small boy (Batuk) telling the demerits and speaking ill of of himself, Parvati's reply, settlement of Parvati's marriage with Siva through Narada and finally their marriage ceremony are the themes which charmed Maithil life from time immemorial and these songs are sung as devotional songs at the time of marriage in every Maithil family. The third form is the domestic life of Siva and most of Vidyapati's and Chanda Jha's Mahesvani and Nachari belong to this category.

The songs of Siva are known as Mahesvani.Mahesvani is a form of diction of Maithili Deshi music. Vidyapati has named such songs as Nackari. Some scholars have named Nacahari as Lachari also. During the reign of Ibrahim Shah in Jaunpur (15th Cent) Lakhanseni used the word Lachari which has been referred to by Sivaprasad Singh in his book Kirtilata aur Avahatta Bhasa. Abdul in his book Ain-i-Akbari has used the word Lachari. According to Late Pt. Ramanath Jha "in Nachari the devotees sing dancing with a damaru (small drum) which is full of 'lasya' and 'adbhuta rasa'. The justification for calling it lachari lies in the fact that in these Nacharis the devotees express their helplessness. Lachar is a Persian word which means helpless and Persian words were being used in Maithili in the age of Vidyapati.

All the Nacharis are Mahesvani but in Nachari there is a speciality of musical rhythm which separates it from Mahesvani. The tune of Nachari is found in folk-music whereas Mahesvani is set to classical music. As regards its subject matter too Nachari has a special feature in it. The peculiar picture of Siva, an old, insane, naked, beggar, living in cremation ground and riding his ox (Basaha) is depicted in Nacharis. There are three types of songs in Nachari. Firstly, the effort of Parvati to get Siva as her husband and other episodes concerning this; Secondly the insanity of Siva in pangs of separation from Sati and thirdly, the picture of the domestic life of Siva in which the grief of Parvati is depicted. For example a glimpse of these are given below. The effort of Parvati etc. "Today per chance the beggar came and Gouri (Parvati) goes to give alms to him. The beggar (Siva) does not accept it and is smiling seeing her face with crescent moon. Gouri falls unconscious and her companious begin scolding the beggar etc." "The open uncared for long hair (Jata) of Siva presents a ferocious picture above which the crescent is situated. Many thousand 'Yugas' have passed but the insane Siva has not come to sanity as yet, etc."-Vidyapti.

The domestic life of Siva and grief of Parvati etc.-"The five mouths of Siva are white with ashes. He has three eyes and in one of them fire is burning. Parvati says with grief that she has got a beggar as her husand. His ornaments are snakes and he lives naked. He has no wealth but is known as master of wealth "Iswar etc". (Vidyapati.) The grief of Gouri is depicted in this Nachari. Gouri has been recognised as an ideal of married women in Indian tradition and she got Siva as her husband after great penance and effort. Hence the very idea of Gouri's grief appears to be untrue and unbelievable. But in the colophon of these songs it is very clearly mentioned that Siva is not poor but he is the Lord of the world -'Siva nahin nidhan jagat ke sami.' Offering prayer to Siva and at the same time ridiculing him is the special feature of Nachari.

Mahesvanis are mostly songs of the devotee's self-offering to Siva or the picture of Ardhanarisvara or of Nataraj or the description of Siva's marriage. The songs or devotee's self-offering are known as 'Atmanivedan' in which after spending most part of his life under the influence of sexual love, anger, allurement and delusion, ignoring the devotion to Siva, he repents for his fault. In these songs the helpessness and self-confession is expressed with a hope that Siva will bless him. In the depiction of 'Ardhanarisvara' (half male half female) the meditation has been depicted ridiculing him, which can be seen in this BIBLIOGRAPHY: Govinddas and Amaranath Jha (ed.) Sringar Bhajan Maithili Shaitya Parishad Darbhanga, 1941., J. Mishra, History of Maithili Sahitya (Vol. I & II, Tirbhukti Publications, Allahabad 1969, M.M. and Umesh Mishra. (ed.) Krishna Janma-Manbodh Tirbhukti Prakasan, Allahabad., Ramanath Jha (ed.) Maithili Prachin Geet, Anant Prakashan, Darbhanga, 1968. Shivprasad Singh, Kirtilata aur Avahatta, Bhasa Shaitya Bhawan, Allahabad 1955., Tejnath Jha, Bhakti Prakasa, Union Press, Laheriasarai, 1911.

N.C.M.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Malayalam). Ramacharitam (12th century) is the first conscious literary product. It retells the story of the Yuddhakandam of the Ramayana. Devotion is the dominant note of this poetry.

Early Malayalam literature contains some of the devotional poems like Sri Vasudevastava, Anantapuravarnanam, Avatarana Dasakam, Dasavataracharitam, Chelurnatha Stavam, Ramayana Kirtanam, Bhadrakali Stavam, Cottanikarastavam, Saraswatistavam, and others, which were written between the 10th and 15th centuries. There are brief devotional passages here and there in the Kavyas like Unninilisandesam, Kokasandesam. In a verse of Unninilisandesam (14th century) the occurance of Kaustubha on Krishna is explained as follows. Seeing the sandal paste on the chest of Krishna, Bhumi Devi thought that the paste came there from Lakshmi, whom Krishna had embraced. Bhumidevi got angry, her gaze fell on the chest of Vishnu and turned there into the blue Kaustubha. One can find many such devotional quatrains and fragments in the early Manipravala literature.

Cherusseri's Krishnagatha (15th century) the first Malayalam epic on Krishna conveys the devotion to him mainly through a depiction of Vatsalyarasa.

A number of poets belonged to the Pattu School of poetry which started with Ramacharitam. Among them the Kannassa poets (1350-1450) Madhava Panicker who wrote Bhasha Bhagavadgita, Shankara Panicker who wrote Bharatamala and Rama Panicker, the author of Bharatam, Bhagavatam and Shivaratrimahatymyam made notable contributions to Malayalam. The three poets handled a purely Dravidian diction and built a major bulwark of the Bhakti cult, based on Aryan mythology.

Ayyippilla Asan's Ramakatha Pattu of the same age is also an eloquent example of the adoration of Rama. This long narrative poem was often set to music in temple premises.

The later Champu literature of the 15th century is not, strictly speaking, devotional but the prabandha system (telling stories of the Ramayana in the temples to inclucate bhakti in the public) spread simultanously with the champus.

The contributions of the trio-Melpattur Narayana Bhattatiri, Tunchat Ramanujan Ezhuttacchan and Puntanam Nambutiri came as a follow-up to Krishnagatha and as a reaction against the moral degradation. While Melpathur's writings are in Sanskrit, the other two poets stuck to Malayalam. Ramayanam Kilippattu, Bharatam Kilippattu and Bhagavatam Kilippattu are the major works of Ezhuttacchan, Chintaratnam, Harinamakirtanam and Irupattinaluvrttam are also ascribed to him. The religious or devotional literature starts with the contributions of Eluttachan who inaugurated a new path in poetic creation. His writings are a spontaneous overflow of his innermost bhakti which is the Sthayibhava throughout his poems. Without sacrificing aesthetic flavour Bhakti or devotion permeates everywhere.

Ezhuttacchan taught the common man what religious spirit was and what Vedanta meant. The famous Harinamakirtanam, Chintaratnam and others, also fulfil the religious cause for which Ezhuttacchan and his disciples stood. Puntanam Nambutiri, whose main works are Bhasakarnamritam, Jnanapana and Santanagopalam pana, is an immortal figure in the sphere of devotional literature. Jnanpana is a song of Divine Wisdom and transmit transcendental knowledge through recalling worldly experiences.

> The Lord makes a person within two or four days eligible to travel in a palanquin. The same Lord pulls him from the palace-tower, and makes him go begging with his bowl .

Puntanam being a devotee of Guruvayurappan, his entire devotion was towards Krishna and it is reflected in all his works notably except Ghanasanghom. He not only composed many devotional poems but also inspired many poets of his time as well as of the later period. As a result a large number of poems on Krishna were composed and many of them are very popular in domestiç cricles. Of them two anonymous couplets can be referred to here.

> 'Oh, Krishna, dark-complexioned Srihara,
> I worship you with folded hands
> Oh, Krishna, blissful Vasudeva,
> Kindly remove all sources from my life.

Jayadeva's Gitagovinda became popular in Kerala by the 16th century and in the temples the practice of singing the song in front of the shrine became almost a routine. Influenced by the Gitagovinda cult, Krishnattam was designed by the Zamorin of Calicut and this sophisticated art is still presented at Guruayur temple. The Krishnagiti is the text composed by the Zamorin. Slowly Kathakali originated in the 17th century. Attakathas are puranic in content and are sprinkled with devotional songs. Tullah was established by Kunchan Nambiar in the 18th century. Tullal poetry is also puranic in content and hence highly devotional. There are many padas of bhakti and musical pieces invoking Srikrishna, Shiva, goddesses etc. Both Attakatha and Tullal, as literary forms, could depict devotion in one way or another. Kunchan Nambiar's Sri Krishnacharitam Manipravalam, Bhagavaddut Patinnalvrittam and many other non-Tullan works are also important. Bhagavaddut is a remarkable exposition of deep devotion and compassion.

Ramapurattu Warrior (1703-1753), who composed a boat-song, Kuchelavrittam and also translated Gitagovinda, has left an indelible impression. The Kuchelavrittam is a unique work of poetic skill, high dramatic quality and deep devotional colour. He says Krishna's eyes filled with tears when the old and poor Brahmin friend Kuchela came to meet him, and this scene was very moving. After the contributions of Kunchan Nambiar and Ramapurattu Warrior, there are many minor things to be referred to. An abundant variety of poems like devotional hymns, folk songs, various types of poems written on local deities, songs used in Tiruvatirakali and other visual art forms can be cited here as the devotional wealth of the two centuries.

The contribution of the royal families in Kerala carry great importance in the context. Swati Tirunal Maharaja (1813-1847) of the erstwhile Travancore State, was a renowned musician and musicologist who composed more than 300 songs in various languages, in praise of Padmanabha, the deity of Trivandrum. His Kuchelopakhyanam and Ajamilopakhyanam are suitable for Harikatha performance. Bhaktimanjari is his longest devotional composition. Syanandurapuravarnana Prabandham also is a devotional work in Sanskrit while the Utsavavarnana Prabandham is written in Malayalam. Some of his Kirtans are also in Malayalam. Swati Tirunal easily finds a place alongside the great trio of Karnatic Music-Saint Tyagaraja, Muttuswami Dikshitar and Shyama Sastri. Though his major compositions are not in Malayalam, he made the music and poetry of Kerala more devotional than they were in any other period in history. The Maharaja's contemporary Irayimman Thampi and Thampi's daugther Kutti Kunnu Tankachi wrote many works, some of which are devotional. They are of high musical quality and moral value.

K.C. Kesava Pillai's Kesaviyam, a Mahakavya, is also important. This describes the Symataka episode. Ramachandra Vilasam by Padmanabha Kurup deals with the story of Rama. Kuttamatt Kunji Krishna Kurup is another poet who wrote many devotional poems such as Mukambika puranam Kilippattu, Sri Devi Saranamritam, and Mukambika Sodasi. The modern trio of Malayalam literature—Asan, Ullur and Vallathol—have contributed to the devotional compositions. They wrote either devotional poems which praise Shiva, Krishna, Saraswati etc., or, poems of piety. Changampula has translated Gita Govinda and Kumarasan Soundaryalahari. Modern poets like Itasseri Govindan Nair, K.K. Raja, V.K. Govindan Nair, P. Kunjiraman Nair, G. Sankara Kurup, Balamoni Amma, Sugata Kumari, have also written some charming poems of devotion. P. Kunjiraman Nair is often called Bhakta Kavi (devotional poet) for his spontaneous compositions with piety or religious fervour. Many Romantic poets have dealt with the theme of the god and his manifestations. They chose mythological themes as the basis but they exercised some poetic license in their compositions. With regard to contemporary devotional literature, one poet Ottur Unni Nambutirippad, is unique as far as his poems are concerned. His works are collected in books like Shyamasundaran, Mandakini, Ananda Murali. Nilachandrika, Yamuna Kunjam etc. This author worships Lord Krishna as the exceptional sringara nayaka of Radha, and her prema bhakti is discussed in detail in beautiful quatrains. The poems are sincere, melodic, meditative, sweet with deep love and devotion and perfect in poetic art. Ottur has also written some poems on Sri Ramakrishna and Sri Sarada Devi.

Vennikulam Gopalakurup, Nalankal Krishna Pillai, Pala Akkittam, Kakkad, P. Krishna Kumar, Narayanan Nair and many other poets who have dealt with mythological themes, and many contributors to 'stotra' literature are also important. Devotion to Shiva, to Sasta and to the Goddesses also has inspired many works. From Kunchan Nambiar's Kumarapureswaristavam and Shivaratri Mahatyam to Sùranat Kunjan Pillai's Attukal Devimantram, thousands of devotional poems have been composed during these years. Some of them are in Sanskrit metres, some others are in Dravidian metres and yet others are merely songs.

Besides the original poems and other works there are a good number of translations and annotations such as Srimad Bhagavata, Devi Bhagavata, Srimad Bhagavad gita, the Upanishads, Srimannarayaniva, Vivekachudamani. The religious books published under the auspicies of the Sri Ramakrishna Mission are important. The contribution of Sri Narayana Guru, (Sivashatakam, Daiva Dashaka, Devaram, Kundalinippattu) are also valuable devotional works. The devotional literature in Kerala, as far as Hinduism is concerned, is very rich and deep. It includes mainly works on Shaiva, Vaishnava and Sakta themes. Advaita philosophy has the greatest influence on the Hindu devotional literature in Kerala.

Regarding the Christian Devotional literature the Samksepa Vedartham of Clement Pianius is the first printed work in Malayalam. The reprint of the first edition came out in 1980. Many works on the Bible and books depicting Christian ideology have been produced. Viswadipam of Mattan Tarakan (1903), Sneha Gita of N.K. John are the two latest Bible translations. The award winning Mahakavya in Sanskrit Kristu Bhagavatam by P.C. Devassia (b. 1906) is also important. There are more than a thousand books on Christ, on Christian mythology books on Christ, on Christian mythology and Christian Doctrine like the biographical study Yesudevan by K.P. Kesava Menon (1886-1980), Christian songs like Satyavedа charitam by P. James, Christian songs published by Chraistava Sahitya Samiti, Tiruvalla etc.

The Koran has been published in the original with meaning in Malayalam, one by Sayyed Abul A Ala Maudi, T.K.A. Abdulla and Ishavali (1972) and another by C.N. Ahmed Maulani (1973). Many other books on Islamic faith also have been published. Among the poets and scholars T. Ubaid who composed a number of Oppana songs and Mappila songs contributed to the Muslim literature in Kerala. Many Mappila songs are printed in Urdu script and some in Malayalam script. Singing the Mappila songs is peculiarly stylised and this has been gaining popularity recently. Some titles of Moslem Songs are Ganavichi. Manamulla Malarukal, Madhura Ganangal.

The main characteristics of the devotional literature of Kerala are as follows. There has been a tendency of compose devotional poems from the dawn of literature to the present times, poems on almost all important deities of Kerala are available. The main output of the Hindu devotional literature deals with Lord Krishna. The devotional poems retain a classical touch; they have literary importance, devotional value, musical quality and a philosophical touch and without devotional literature the literature of Kerala is incomplete.

V.S.S.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Manipuri). The Manipuri Hindus being Vaishnavas, there is not much Shaiva or Shakta literature in the Manipuri language, though it is, for obvious reasons, very rich in vaishnava devotional literature. In the 8th century, there was worship of Shiva and Devi to a limited extent. The worship was on Tantric lines. The only remnant of this early form of devotion is a few paragraphs, in a copper plate inscription of the 8th century. Some, however, challenge the authenticity of the copper plate inscription. Even if the copper plate is in keeping with the spirit of the Manipuri society in the 8th century.

There is a book called Panthoibi Khongoon (In Quest of Panthoibi) describing the story of Panthoibi who may be affiliated to Devi. The book was meant for singing at temples of Panthoibi, much in the way the Chandi is recited at Shakta temples.

R.K.J.S.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Marathi). The bhakti movement and literature in Maharashtra was deeply influenced by the South, particularly Karnataka.

This is evident from the cult of Pandharpur which along with its deity, god Vitthala, is of Karnataka origin even according to the founder of the Bhakti literature in Marathi, namely Jnanadev. In a famous abhanga he says,

Kanada Vitthalu Karnataku, yene maja laviyala vedhú.

God Vitthala is called both 'kanada' and 'Karnataku'. Even the place - name Pandhari is a Marathi version of the original Kannada name Pandarage, and the name of its presiding deity, Vitthala, is also a typically Dravidian corruption of the Sanskrit name Vishnu which changes into Bittu in Kannada. Thus the Bhakti in Maharashtra is a gift of the South for which Marathi - speaking people are indebted to Karnataka and Tamilnadu. Once the sapling was planted it blossomed forth and bore such sweet and juicy fruits like Jnanadev, Tukaram, Ramdas and others that their devotional poetry has become a permanent solace to the struggling humanity, a sure guide to the spiritual aspirants and an endless treasure of literary beauty for the discerning.

Pandharpur soon came to be recognised as the centre of Bhakti movement and the meeting place of the North and the South. It is the place where all linguistic and cultural differences coalesce in the sentiment of devotion to god Vitthala. He is the supreme deity of the cult of Varakaris which is essentially a cult of Bhakti based on the traditional Bhagavata dharma. Though it originated in Karnataka, its home soon became Maharashtra and it continued to inspire and nourish the devotional poetry both in Marathi and Kannada. The word Varakari is composed of two constituents, vari, meaning the regular practice of going on a pilgrimage and kari, meaning one who practises it. The Varakari is thus a regular pilgrim to Pandharpur, the seat of god Vitthala, and the centre of the cult. He is supposed to be a strict vegetarian, wear round his neck a rosary of Tulasi beads which is symbolical of his being a devotee of Lord Krishna, the protoype of Vitthala, and devote his life to the singing of His name. He need not, however, sever his connections with his family or abandon professional life, but can carry on his spiritual pilgrimage while being engaged in his worldly occupation. As Deleury says, 'A Varakari is not a monk, but a tertiary'. The cult is open to all and has wide popular appeal. But the Varakari movement is not 'a church'. Again in the words of Deleury, 'there is no centralised organisation, no hierarchy, no general councils, no credo, no sacraments'. It is a spiritual movement, or rather a body of spiritual groups gathered round saints belonging to Pandharpur. It is supposed to be founded by Pundalika, the first devotee of god Vitthala. The glorifying cry 'Pundalikavarada Hari-Vitthala' of the Varakaris, meaning 'Oh Hari Vitthala, the giver of a boon to Pundalika', points to the origin of this cult. Devotional group-singing is a distinguishing mark of this cult probably borrowed from the South. This cult is yet another instance of democratised Bhakti. The temple of god Vitthala in Pandharpur was founded in the year 1189 and enlarged during the years 1273 and 1277 as can be seen from two inscriptions of the same years respectively. The first is inscribed on the foundation stone of the temple indicating that a small group of devotees of god Vitthala came together to erect a temple in his name, while the second gives a list of the donors from all over the South and belonging to different strata of the society who came forth with their donations for the extensions and the renovations of the temple. Jnanadev and Namadev, were the central figures round whom gathered a group of saints coming from different places and different vocations. The group included poet-saints like Changadev, the yogi turned a saint, Parisa Bhagavat, a Vaishnava Brahmin, Visoba, a staunch Shaivaite, Gora, the potter, Savata, the gardener, Narahari, the goldsmith, Sena, the barber, Joga, the oilman, Chokha Mela, the pariah, Jani, the maid —servant, Naga, the banker turned a beggar, and Kanhupatra, the daughter of a dancing girl. It was a kind of spiritual democracy working with Pandharpur as its centre. The practice of going on a vari to it was much older and these saints headed by Jnanadeva and Namadev added spiritual life to it. As Vaudeville observes, 'It is this conception of Pandharpur as the meeting place of all saints which gives to that holy city and to the great pilgrimage its unique character. The mass of the Varakaris who trudge the long road to Pandharpur, represents all the castes of Maharashtra, especially the low castes. Even if they were Shiva by birth or tradition, all have somehow become Vaishnavas in so far as they have recognised Vitthala, the beloved of all saints, as their 'maya-bapa', or father and mother (in one), and Pandharpur itself as their maher, the longed maternal house of the bride, the one and the only home of all saints.' It is here at Pandharpur that the seed of devotion germinated and developed at the hands of saints like Jnanadev and Namadev and Tukaram.

The abhangas of Jnanadev are equally rich in poetry and in spirituality. In one of his virahinis he speaks of soul pining to meet her lover, God: 'The cloud is sounding and the wind is ringing. The moon and the champak tree have lost their soothing power. The sandal - paste serves only to torment the body. The bed of flowers, they say, has a cooling effect, Yet it is burning me like cinders of fire. The kokilas are proverbially supposed to sing sweet tunes; But in my case, they are only augmenting the pangs of separation. And as I look in the mirror, I am unable to see my face. To such a plight has God reduced me.

Jnanadev's Haripatha contains in a nutshell the very core of his teaching and as such forms a part of the Varakari liturgy. 'Invoke the Name of Hari, the merit (so acquired) who can measure?' is the refrain of the Haripatha which succinctly brings out the value of the Divine Name, the singing and remembrance of which the Vaishnava saints preached. The foundation of the Bhakti cult was thus laid by Jnanadev on which was raised the superstructure by those who followed him. Namadev in particular, who was his contemporary, democratised Bhakti by means of performing Kirtanas and bringing round him a galaxy of saints from different levels of the society. His own abhangas contain his pining for God, his insistence on chanting the Divine Name, his reflections on matters social and religious and his spiritual experience. His popularity in the Varakari sect is next only to that of Tukaram. His famous Arati of god Panduranga (Vittala), 'Yuge atthavisa vitevari ubha', has become immortal and is sung in almost every house in Maharashtra. After the death of Jnanadev, Namadev, went and lived in Punjab for about twenty years spreading the cult of Bhakti and giving rise to the chain of north Indian poet-saints headed by Ramanand and Kabir. His songs composed in a dialect which is a mixture of Hindi and Punjabi were later incorporated in the Guru Grantha-Saheb. Among the saints who gathered round Namadeva special mention has to be made of Chokha Mela ever conscious of his traditional untouchability, but never allowed it to come in the way of his spiritual life. This is how he lays bare his heart before God: 'A sugarcane may be crooked, and yet its juice is not crooked. A bow may be curved, and yet the arrow is not. A river may have windings, and yet its water is even. So also, Chokha may be a pariah, but his heart is pure'. If Chokha was a mahar, Jani was a maid-servant in the family of Namadev. But she too was enraptured with the atmosphere of Bhakti that prevailed in Pandharpur. This is how she invokes god Vitthala calling him 'Mother'.

'Come, come, oh Vithabai, my mother of Pandhari. The rivers Bhima and Chandrabhaga are the very Ganges flowing at your feet. Come along with them and dance on my pedestal. Says Jani of Nami, my beatification is in you.'

With Namadev and his group we come to the end of the early Varakari poet-saints who together formed a spiritual democracy that recognised no distinctions of caste, creed or sex. W.B. Patwardhan says in his Wilson Philological Lectures, 'The gates of the Bhakti school were ever open. Whoever entered was hailed as a brother, nay more, was honoured as a saint. All were santas (saints) that gathered round and under the Garudataka, the flag with an eagle blazoned on it, with talas or cymbals in hand and the name of Vitthala on the tongue. The very atmosphere was sacred and holy. The breath of Heaven played freely and all were equal there. For five successive centuries Maharashtra was the abode of that noblest and truest of all democracies, the Democracy of the Bhakti school.'

Soon after the death of Jnanadev, Maharashtra went under the rule of the Muslim. The period that followed the age of Jnanadev is known as the era of darkness. It showed some signs of life till 1350, the year of Namadev's death, after which for many years no literary work worth the name comes to hand till we reach the age of Ekanath, which begins with Narasimha Sarasvati (c. 1378-1458), the founder of the cult of god Dattatreya. It is likely that this cult arose as a reaction against the activity of the Sufis who were systematically encroaching upon the traditional religion of Maharasthra. The cult of god Dattatreya shows a peculiar blend of Hinduism and Islam in its presentation of the life of Sripada Srivallabha (c. 1323-1353) who is at once its first historical figure and the first avatara of Dattatreya. His life-story is narrated in the Gurucharitra. The next incarnation of Dattatreya is Narasimha Sarasvati, the guru as he is called, who forms the central figure in the history of this cult. His life-mission was to awaken the people to the disastrous condition to which they were reduced under the Muslim rule and make them conscious of their duty towards the society. Narasimha Sarasvati was in a way the forerunner of Ramadas, the great active mystic of the next century. No writings of Narasimha Sarasvati are extent, but he became the central theme of the Gurucharitra, the basic religious book of his cult. Written in about 1538 by Sarasvati Gangadhara, it is a voluminous work devoted mainly to the miraculous life-account of Narasimha Sarasvati and forms a kind of sacred mantra which gives it a piety all its own. The Gurucharitra occupies an important place in the religious life of Maharasthra, even today, and is almost held in awe and read devoutly by the common man in the faith that it is a great healer of ailments, both physical and spiritual. It enjoys the same popularity with the theistic masses as a work like Jnaneshvari among the followers of the cult of Pandharpur. Though rather low in the scale of literary beauty, it established a foundation for abler writers like Ekanath to develop upon and enrich with their outstanding works.

Ekanath (1533-1599) owes much to his great grandfather, Bhanudas (1448-1513) and his guru, Janardan. The first is a prominent figure in the history of the cult of Pandharpur, for he is supposed to have brought back the idol of god Vitthala from Hampi where it was removed by Krishnaraya, then the ruling prince of Vijayanagar, who probably took it to protect it from the iconoclast Muslims. This event was of historic importance as with it begins the third epoch of the cult of Bhakti culminating in the poetico-mystical career of Ekanath. The second influence on him was that of his guru, Janardan who represents a typical combination of Hinduism and Sufism, being himself a devotee of god Dattatreya. Ekanath thus stands on the confluence of three different currents, namely those of Datta, Vitthala and the Sufis, all merging in his mystical writings. Ekanath was so devoted to his spiritual teacher that he entwined his own name with that of his guru and wrote always under the joint pen - name 'Eka - Janardana' meaning the Eka of Janardan. It was also at his guru's instance that he took to writing. His first work is the Chatushloki Bhagavata. It is based on the four verses from No. 32 onwards in the ninth chapter of the second skandha of the original Bhagavata in Sanskrit. It proved to be the nucleus of a major work which came to be known as the Ekanathi Bhagavata. It is his commentary in Marathi on the 11th skandha of the original and forms a part of the 'prasthanatrayi' of the Varakari cult, the other two being the Jnaneshvari and the Gatha of Tukaram. It was opposed to by the orthodoxy of Paithan, the then cultural centre of Maharashtra, because it was in Marathi, the language which was disqualified according to the pundits for any religious or philosophical subject. But Ekanath successfully met the challenge and produced a work which is next only to the great Jnaneshvari. He wrote also on the Ramayana looking at it from the socio-political view and symbolising Rama as the redeemer of the people from the tyranny of the foreign rule. But the fame of Ekanath as a poet-saint is due mainly to his 'Bharudas' which reflect both his social and religious consciousness. They are shorter poems, similar to folk-songs, with a double meaning, one secular and the other spiritual. Their themes vary from the snake to the ghost and from the mahar to the Turk, and every piece is at once realistic and romantic retaining everywhere its innate spirituality. They present a grotesque and queer world where the poet dramatises now a village astrologer, then a bard and yet again a watchman mahar who comes in the early hours of the morning calling aloud: Awake, ye men! How is it that you are still asleep? Awake, approach the Master, and free yourself from the cycle of births and deaths.'

Here is Ekanath's famous bharuda 'Rodaga', meaning the baked dough, which a married woman offers to the goddess Bhavani in order to get herself freed from her in - laws including her own husband so that she could live alone and devote herself entirely to God. 'Come to my help early and I will offer you a rodaga, oh mother Bhavani.

My father-in-law is away, so let him be finished there. My mother-in-law harasess me too much, so let her die early.

My sister-in-law takes me to task, so make her a widow. Her child grates annoyingly, so let it have itch all over. Then killing my husband I will make an offering of him to you. Says Eka - Janardana, let all these go and let me live alone.' Here the in-laws are the different passions, the husband is ignorance and living alone is the solitude necessary for devotion to God.

Ekanath handed over the torch to Tukaram. Tukaram rose to the new heights of spirituality through his olympian effort and the grace of God which he begged for from time to time. He received his spiritual initiation from one Babaji, who belonged to the Chaitanya tradition, in a dream and in the form of a meditational mantra, Rama - Krishna-Hari, which was after his heart's desire. The poetical initiation came from the poet-saint Namadev who appeared in his dream and asked him to write devotional poetry and, thus, bring his own work to completion. Tukaram accordingly started meditating both on God and on the Muse and produced poetry of such intrinsic value and such a literary and spiritual excellence that it has come to be the pride of the Marathi language. As in his worldy life, so also in his literary career Tukaram had to face petty jealousies and animosities. When he was being highly spoken of by the common people, he incurred the wrath of the more learned led by one Rameshvarabhata who conspired to ruin his literary reputation. They went to the length of throwing the manuscript of his poems into the river Indrayani from where he could rescue it only by the grace of God. The Gatha, or the collection of Tukaram's abhangas contains more than 4000 poems. They are the devotional outpourings of his heart, the history of his soul: how he commenced his spiritual life; what difficulties he met on the way; what heart-rendings he had to experience in his lone journey; and how ultimately his efforts were crowned with success in the form of God-realisation. Given below are three abhangas which can be said to be representative of the respectively three stages through which he had to pass before he could attain to Godhead.

The Resolve

The creeper of the Divine Name has spread far and wide, And has attained to flower and fruit.
Be a bird there, oh my mind, if you desire fulfilment.
For the seed has shown its sweetness and you have to reap the gain.
Time is running out every moment, Says Tuka,
And the juicy sweetness might be missed.

Pining

As a young girl going to her father-in-law's house
Wistfully casts her glance at her home,
So it is with me, pining to meet you, oh God.
As a child that has missed its mother,
Or as a fish that is out of water,
So is Tuka restlessly panting for Thee.

Negation

Verily God is dead to me.
Let him be for whomsoever he exists.
I have praised and censured him enough,
And vainly have I spent my life for him.
But now everything is over and Tuka is at rest.

The expression of fulfilment is equally graphic. It is blissful for him to be in the constant company of God who deprived him of his privacy.

From high to higher bliss do I go,
As a miser goes from high to higher riches.
All my emotions, says Tuka, have been united in God,
As the waves in the confluence of the Ganga and the ocean.

Granting the influences of Jnanadev, Namdev, Ekanth and Kabir on the poetry of Tukaram which he himself admits, his personality remains all his own. He is a typical illustration of personalistic mysticism. It is better to quote from Ranade for this element in Tukarama. 'Tukaram exhibits all the doubts and disbeliefs, the weaknesses and the sufferings, the anxieties and the uncertainties through which every aspiring soul must pass before he can come into the life of light, spirit and harmony. There is no other instance in the whole galaxy of the Maratha saints, barrig perhaps Namadev, which can be regarded as illustrative of this human element which we find in Tukaram. It is also borne out by the mystical teachings of Tukaram which are valuable because they have come from a full-fledged saint. He had achieved the end of his life and he now lived only for the benefaction of the world. 'To advance Dharma and to destory heresy is my sole business now' says he. Naturally, he has no room for pseudo-saints.

Pebbles will shine only so long as the diamond is not around Torches will blaze only so long as the sun has not risen.
Men will speak of saints only so long as they have not met Tuka.

With Tukarama and his disciple, Niloba ends the tradition of the Bhakti poets though Ramadas (1608-1681) whose way was different from Tukaram must be mentioned. Both were and remained to the end of their lives preeminently spiritual teachers. But while the first called back the attention of men from irreligion to religion, the other raised upon the foundation of religious faith an edifice of national greatness and integrity. The Dasabodha, the major work of Ramadas, compiled during the years 1659 and 1681, contains in a nutshell his worldly and spiritual teachings. It is true that some sections of the Dasabodha are devoted to social and even political thought, particularly those addressed to king Shivaji. But when all is said, the fact remains that the core of this and the other works of Ramadas is spiritual. The distinction between Shaiva and Vaishnava was never felt in Maharashtra as it was in the south, and all saints were for that purpose Vaishnavas, meaning poet-saints. Thus, Ramadas, though not belonging to the cult of Pandharpur, is still a poet of devotion and barring the one fact of his activistic philosophy he can certainly fit into the scheme of the Varakari saints. As he himself says, saints appear to be different from one another, but they are all one so far as their mystical experience is concerned. In the words of the Greek thinker, Heracleitos, 'those that are wakeful have one common world", and Ramadas is no exception.

An account of the Bhakti Movement must mention in the end Mahipati (1715-1790), the most prominent and the most profuse biographer of the poet-saints of Maharashtra. Hagiography was almost his profession and his four works, Bhaktivijaya (1762), and Santalilamrita (1767), Bhaktalilamrita (1774) and Santavijaya (left incomplete when he died in 1790) contain in all about a hundred biographies of saints. Mahipati was not a saint, but saintly he certainly was and did his best to understand the lives of his saints. At the same time, he was a simple, believing soul not prone to questioning and criticism. Naturally, he could not reach the mark of a true biographer, namely the capacity to discover and present the whole truth and nothing but the truth. But as a hagiographer Mahipati's merit lies elsewhere. It is not for history or scholarship that one reads Mahipati. He is read, and read still, to feel the pulse of his times, to know the religious atmosphere that prevailed then and to underspand the spirit of divinity in the lives of saints. Of course his works have preserved valuable information. But it is not for that that we turn to him. According to his own appraisal, he had become simply the voice of the legend, the flute under the fingures of God. What he gives us is not the lifeless framework of biography but the very core of the lives of saints. Mahipati can thus be called a fitting epilogue to the saga of the Maratha saint-poets.

*BIBLIOGRAPHY:*G.A. Deleury, The Cult of Vithoba, Poona, 1960., G.B. Sardar, The Saint-poets of Maharasthtra, Bombay, 1969., M.G. Ranade, Rise of the Maratha Power, (Ch. VIII), Delhi 1974., R.D. Ranade, Mysticism in Maharashtra, Poona, 1933.. W. Deming, Ramdas and Ramdasis, Calcutta, 1928.

S.G.T.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Nepali) The tradition of Nepali devotional poetry can be conveniently studied under three sub-genres, namely the Krishna devotional tradition, the Ram devotional tradition and the Nirgun devotional tradition.

Indiras has been regarded as the precursor of the Nepali devotional literature. His Gopikastuti (1827) was based on the tenth chapter (skandha) of the Shrimadbhagavata. In essence it is an eulogy of Krishna as the preserver of the world and protector of the distressed. The sentiment of devotion (bhakti) is unfolded in association with the sentiment of love. The composition exudes sweetness of sentiment and musical melodiousness. Indiras's Gopiraksha has recently come to light which contains Gopikastuti and several more verses and it appears to be the original complete work.

Vidyaranyakeshari Aryal (1806-1845) who received his education in Varanasi wrote Yugalgit based on a skandha of the Shrimadbhagavata and his Draupadistuti was based on the Sabhaparva of the Mahabharata, on the episode of the disrobing or Draupadi, to be exact. He is said to have written Benugit too but the work is untraceable. His originality is much in evidence in the writing of Draupadistuti. Vidyaranyakeshari's poems, as also of Indiras's and Vidyapati's fall in the category of Krishna devotional poems spiced with eroticism.

Vidyapati (b. 1792?) wrote Gitvani (1831) which was based on Jayadeva's Gitagovinda. The story parts have been given in prose and the emotional and descriptive part in verse. Yogi Ambargir, a contemporary of Vidyapati, had also made a prose translation of the twelfth canto of the Gitagovinda. Vidyapati who called himself 'Hinavyakarani' regarded Radha as devotion incarnate or devotion itself and Krishna as the divine and necessary object of devotion.

Vasant Sharma (1803-1890) wrote Krishnacharitra (1827) and Samudralahari (1844) which are his original devotional works. Vasant who was the forerunner of Bhanubhakta, was more gifted with poetic talent than Indiras, Vidyaranyakeshari or Vidyapati. He is credited with having made efforts that were largely successful to put a stop to the insertion of eroticism in Nepali devotional poems. And whereas all other Nepali poets composed their devotional poems in Sanskritic metres, Vasant made use of the folk metre Sawai in his Samudralahari which exhorts the reader to shun this transient world and embrace Narayana.

Virshali Pant (b. 1803) was imbued with Vaishnavism, having stayed for some time at Mathura and Vrindavan. Some believe that really he lived the life of a Vaishnav mendicant at Mathura and was called Mahatma. His Krishnacharitra is untraceable. His Vimalbodhanubhav is a comprehensive hymn in praise of Vishnu who is Krishna in another form. Virshali's Saras premavali consisting of seven hundred and forty-two stanzas depicts the sports and childhood of Krishna.

Yadunath Pokhryal (b.1808 ?) wrote Krishnacharitra, a work very remarkable for its poetic excellence.

Patanjali Gajuryal (1823-1887) wrote Balgopalvani, Haribhaktamala and Jaimini-Bharat. He also wrote Tirthavali, Matsyendranathko Katha and Adhyatma Ramayanko Balun. He falls in the Vaishnav category of Nepali devotional poets. He worships the lord generally as Vishnu and specifically as Krishna. The forms his devotion assumes are varied and multifarious. His entreaties are expressive of his irrepressible and intense desire to see the Lord. At times he haughtily demands justice, turns sulky and threatening, and at other times criticises the Lord's contradictory ways and actions.

Compared to Krishna devotional tradition the number of prominent mediaeval Nepali poets devoting themselves to propagating Ram devotional literature was indeed few. Yet the influence they exercised on Nepali literature is immense. So much so that the writting of Ram literature has vigorously continued upto the present times.

Raghunath Pokhryal (1811-1861) is believed to have translated in verse the Ayodhyakanda, Balkanda and Sundarkanda of the Adhyatma Ramayana but only the last one is extant. After the death of his wife in 1858, he went to Varanasi where he translated the Sundarkand and where he breathed his last. The translation, not deviating in the least from the original, and though rugged in form, nevertheless has a strange beauty and sweetness of its own.

Bhanubhakta Acharya (1814-1869) wrote his Ramayana based on the Adhyatma Ramayana. Prashnottar which was a translation of Shankaracharya's catechistic Maniratnamala, and Bhaktamala,is an original work and a jewel of devotional poetry. Bhanubhakta's Ram is Hari, the lord of the three worlds, yet very human in his earthly incarnation. His Prashnottar inculcates renunciation and religious wisdom. His Bhaktamala strings in unison the feelings of repentance and devotion of a mortal soul.

The Josmani religious sect inducted the Nirguna (attributeless God) concept in Nepali devotional poetry. From Dhirjaydil Das to Gyandil Das a succession of some nineteen Josmani santas (saints) have composed a vast corpus of bhajas (devotionel poems), but the bulk of them is in Sadhukkadi language. Sant Gyandie Das (1821-1883) stands out prominently among them. His Udaylahari (1934) in Nepali passes on the worship of nirguna Brahma. He sees human life as principally leavened with nothing but the water (nirgun) of Brahma'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Baburam Acharya, Purana Kavi Ra Kavita, 1946. Dayaram Shrestha Sambhav, Prarambhik Kalko Nepali Sahitya: Itihas Ra Parampara, 1981., Keshav Prasad Upadhyay, Prathamik Kalin Kavi Ra Kavyapravritti, 1975., Kumar Pradhan, A History of Nepali Literature, 1984.

B.R.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Oriya). Dividing line between the Bhakti and the Devotional literature is very thin indeed. Both are encompassed within the category of religious literature. While in the Bhakti literature the inner experience of the poet is subjective and aims at establishing an intimate relationship with a personal God, the devotional literature is aimed at diffusing the cult of a certain sect or denomination. They are more in the nature of liturgics and are apocryphal. Bhajana is an important genre of the medieval Oriya devotional literature, most of which have elements of lyricism. Reciting these Bhajans was an important aspect of the religious practice. Almost all the saint-poets had composed countless Bhajanas in paeons of praise of their adored deities.

Even the tribals like the Mundas, the Santals and the Kolhas have composed Bhajanas in their respective dialects which are sung in their communities on religious and other occasions. A Munda poet sings, "Oh, God! lift me to Thy presence/I am a prisoner in the chains of illusion/Rest my soul at Thy lotus-feet redeeming me from the bondage". In the Santali dialect these songs are named Nahanar. One such Nahanar is remarkable for its catholicity, and pours out the soul's agonies, "Oh, God ! I have prayed you in many names—the Allah, the Jesus, the Rama, the Krishna, the Jagannatha. But Thou art deaf to my woes". A Santali Bhajan is devoted to the Mother Goddess Jaher-era. The Kolhas, on the occasion of their tribal festival of the 'Makar-Mela' sing the praise of Dharma Devata in a Bhajana.The Hos also sing in praise of Marang-Bura, the great God.

Among the tribal poets the name of Bhima Bhoi who belonged to the later part of the 19th century stands out in undiminished brilliance. He was an apostle of the Mahima-Dharma, which has elements of early Buddhism. He was born in Rairakhole, in Sambalpur District, in western Orissa in a Kandha family. Relying on the poet's reference regarding himself, in the poem 'Stuti-Chintamoni', some are led to believe that he was blind since his birth. He composed countless Bhajanas in Oriya, some of which had high literary merit. His devotional poems celebrated the supremacy of no particular deity but the praise of Alekh, the Great Void, or the Niranjan, one without shape.

The beginning of devotional literature in Oriya may be traced as far back as the sacred literature of the Buddhist mendicants of the Sahajayana-Buddhism, commonly known as the Charyapadas. These compositions were lyrical in style and were meant for recital by the Sahajiya mendicants. The dates of composition of the Charyapadas have been placed between the 8th and the 12th Centuries A.D. and it is reckoned that about seventy-six Sidhacharyas or apostles composed these Charyapadas. Some of these, according to scholars, like Haraprasad Sastri, Binoytosh Bhattacharya and Nagendranath Basu, belonged to Orissa and their compositions bear distinct resemblances to proto-Oriya. They mainly lay down the philosophical and practical system of the esoteric cult of the Sahajiya Buddhists.

Another cult-growth, the Natha-Sidhas of the Natha-cult, founded by Gorakhanath, were not as prolific as the Buddhist Sahajiyas in their literary output. Only six Bhajanas ascribed to Gorakhanath, have so far been discovered by scholars in Oriya. These Bhajanas expound the theory of Pinda-Brahmandabad, microcosm in the macrocosm, and practice of Yoga. But the authorship of these Bhajanas by Gorakhanath is also in doubt.

Sarala Das, the great epic poet of the 15th century hailed as the ealiest Oriya poet (the Adikavi), composed massive epics, like the Mahabharata, the Bichitra-Ramayana and the Chandi-Purana. Short pieces of Bhajanas can be found inserted in these epics. These were principally devoted to Jagannath and Goddess Sarala, whose devotee the poet was, and they exhibit devotional emotions in popular, colloquial language.

The post-Sarala sainit-poets, such as, Achyutananda, Balarama, Jagannatha, Ananta and Yasovanta, popularly known as the 'Panch-Sakhas' (Five Friends) were prolific poets. They were Sunyavadis or the Voidists. According to them, the Supreme God is Nirakar or the Void, who can be realised through austere Yogic practices based on knowledge. The Bhajanas composed by Achyutananda expounded the Yogic practices, which were obviously not meant for the lay public. The Bhajanas of Achyutananda and the other poets of the 'Pancha Sakha' group employed esoteric images, which could only be understood by the initiates. In the Bhajanas or the devotional songs composed by them, the imagery of a broken boat was employed to suggest the human body. Similarly milching cow, unbaked earthen pot and the talking bird were other images that were employed for the mind. Guruvada or the cult of the Mentor was another aspect of the devotional songs composed by these poets. Without the guidance of the Guru or the Mentor there can be neither salvation nor success in the Sadhana, the acolytes were constantly reminded in these songs. Hadu Dasa is another poet of this School, whose devotional songs celebrated the Void or the Nirakar. He belonged to the late 19th century.

The last eighteen years of Sri Chaitanya were spent at Puri, in Orissa. His long sojourn gave a new orientation to the prevalent religious cult, philosophy and practice of the Pancha Sakhas.Though the Pancha Sakhas put emphasis on pure devotion, the real basis of their secret cult was Yoga and Mantra. Various symbolic images of Yoga and the Mantra can be noticed even in their devotional songs. But Sri Chaitanya, though in the beginning he was rejected by the savants and scholars of Orissa, ultimately conquered them and preached the doctrine of pure devotion or Prema Bhakti. The eternal dalliance of Radha and Krishna was the theme of the devotional songs or Bhajans, composed by the poets of the Prema Bhakti School. From aesthetic and literary points of view, the Bhajans composed by the poets professing Prema Bhakti, were generally superior to the Bhajans composed by the Nirgunavadis or by the poets influenced by the Pancha Sakhas. Even the Pancha Sakha poets themselves had composed Bhajanas addressed to Sri Krishna. Among these poets, Balarama Das, Jagannatha Das as well as King Prataprudra deserve mention. Among the Prema Bhakti poets one may mention Sadananda Kavisurya Brahma, Kavisurya Baladeva, Banamali Das, Raghu Arakhita, Gopalkrishna, Gourcharana and Bhakta charana, etc., who generally enriched this genre of medieval Oriya devotional literature.

Bhajanas were also composed for sectarian deities like Shiva, Sarada, Durga, Danteswari, Chamunda, and Bhubaneshwari etc. But the largest number of Bhajanas were addressed to Jagannatha. Such Bhajanas of Banama-li (18th century), and the Muslim saint-poet Salabeg (17th century), are hailed as classics in Oriya literature. It would be no exaggeration to say that but for Lord Jagannatha, the devotional and spiritual literature in Oriya would not have been as rich as it is today. Jagannath has inspired and put his mark on the spiritual and devotional literature in Orissa, through the centuries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Binoytosh Bhattacharya (Ed.), Hara Prasad Sastri, Baudha-Dharma. Sadhana Mala. Surendra Mohanty, Oriya Sahityar Adiparva.

Sur.M

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Punjabi). Bhakti poetry abounds in Punjabi Literature. It was not only produced in abundance during the Bhakti movement, but also in the later periods. For ages, Punjab had been the gateway to India. The invaders entered the Indian territory from north-west and with every new incoming horde, the holocaust was first experienced in the Punjab territory. The people had to bear the brunt for the first time with every conquest. They had always to remain alert and ready for any sacrifice. Whereas the ministrels sang of the war feats of the Punjabis, the all-round destruction and violence at brief intervels made them seek the refuge of the Almighty Lord. The impact of the Muslim conquest and Bhakti movement were felt throughout India. Many saints appeared on the scene, who voiced their sentiments in their respective languages and dialects.

Since Punjab has remained a battle-field for the incoming new foreign hordes, the earliest experiments in Punjabi mystic verse could not be saved. There has, of course, been a literary tradition among the Yogis. Guru Gorakhnath, Charpatnath and others had composed their devotional hymns earlier in the language of the transitional period, bordering on western Apabhramsa and also the newly-evolved vocabulary of their respective areas. Baba Farid (1173-1266) can be said to be the first poet of Punjabi in the newly evolved vernacular and also the first litterateur composing devotional poems and couplets. There must have been more attempts at devotional poetry after Baba Farid, in the 14th and 15th centuries, but because of the peculiar geographical situation in the Punjab nothing has come down to us.

The Bhakti movement in the Punjab was essentially the Sikh movement, which began with Guru Nanak (1469-1539) and its culmination reached with Guru Gobind Singh (1966-1708), the tenth and the last Sikh Guru. The Bhakti poetry was composed by the seven Sikh Gurus, i.e., the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, ninth and tenth Gurus. Whereas the poetry of the six Gurus (from the first to the ninth) is found in the Adi Granth, the poetry of the tenth Guru was compiled in the Dasam Granth. The tenth Guru mainly composed his poems in Braj Bhasha. The poetry of the ninth Guru is written mainly in western Hindi. The first five Gurus composed their poems and hymns mainly in Punjabi. A few poems of the first and the fifth Guru are in Western Hindi, whereas the Adi Granth is a "treasury of old Hindi dialects". It is a vast ocean of Bhakti poetry compiled and edited by Guru Arjan Dev, the fifth Sikh Guru in 1604. The hymns of the ninth Guru were added later on by the tenth Guru. In the Adi Granth besides the poetry of the Sikh Gurus, the verses of Jayadeva (12th century) of Bengal, Shiekh Farid (13th century) of the Punjab, Namdev and Trilochan (14th century) of Maharashtra, Ramanand, Kabir, Ravidas, Sain and Pips (15th century) of U.P., along with those of a few other saints and devotees (Dhanna, Sadhna, Bhikhan, Surdas, Sundar) and some bards are included.

The Gurus and saints adopted the folk metres and folk tunes for their compositions. The imagery in their poetry is derived from both indoor and outdoor life. There is depiction of the social and religious degeneration. There is also the mention of religious rituals and practices, which were prevalent in the country. The Sikh Gurus and saints sing in the same strain. The ethical greatness is considered the basis for the spiritual greatness. There is a great emphasis on practising godly attributes in life. In order to develop character, there is necessity of a living teacher or a Guru, who can serve as a model for moral and spiritual development. It is only through him that a seeker following the path of Bhakti attains salvation and ultimately merges in the Lord.

Besides the Punjabi poets in the Adi Granth, an important Bhakti poet of the period, is Bhai Gurdas, who in his 'Vars' has given the crux of the philosophy and religion of the Sikh Gurus, richly embellished with diverse imagery. Another poet of note was Jalhan, who has used the rural idiom in his verses. The impact of the Bhakti poetry of the Sikh Gurus continued till the end of the 18th century. The Sufi poet Shah Husain was the contemporary of Guru Arjan Dev. Another prominent Sufi poet was Bhule Shah who wrote his Kafis in the first half of the 18th century. The poetry of these Sufi poets may also be regarded as Bhakti poetry. They wrote their Bhakti songs in chaste Punjabi with imagery adopted from the Punjabi life.

Immediately after the passing away of Guru Nanak, the 'Janamsakhi' tradition began in Punjabi prose. Various versions of Janamaskhis appeared in the course of time. Puratan janamsakhi, Janamsakhi, Bhai Bala, Sachkhand Pothi of Meharvan Gyan Ratnavali (said to be written by Bhai Mani Singh) are some of the important contributions in this respect. In the field of prose, besides Janamsakhis we have 'Sakhis', Goshtas', 'Tikas', 'Parmarths', 'Sukhan', 'Bachan', 'Masle', 'Saar' the different genres of devotional Punjabi prose. The scribes prepared numerous copies of each of these genres and were read by the faithful with love and devotion. The Punjabi translations of Hindu devotional writings were prepared in poetry as well as prose. They included Upanishads, Yoga-vashishta, Bhagavad gita, Bhagavata purana, etc., Some Mahatmyas on the Gita were also written. Whereas the Sikh tradition provides us with Nirguna School of Punjabi poetry, the Hindu tradition provided the inspiration for the Saguna School of Punjabi poetry. The specimens are available in Ram Kavya and Krishna Kavya. Various hermitages of Sufis, saints and ascetics of different faiths are responsible for the creation of devotional literature in Punjabi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gopal Singh, Guru Granth Sahib di Sahitak Visheshta, Delhi, 1948., Mohan Singh Diwana, A History of Punjabi Literature,Amritsar, 1956., S.S. Kohli, (Ed.), Punjab University Punjabi Sahit de Itihas, Vol. I, Chandigarh, 1973., Taran Singh, Sri Guru Granth Sahib Ji da Sahitak Itihas, Amritsar, 1963.

S.S.K.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Rajasthani). The devotional literature of Rajasthan is voluminous and full of variety. It is mainly the creation of saint-poets falling under various categories: poets writing in the Charan style, founders of various religious sects and other poets in their tradition, poet not belonging to particular sects, the Jains, and several known-unknown poets popular in folk tradition.

Almost all the poets writing in the Charan style have written works devoted to the concrete (Sagun) as well as the formless (Nirgun) divinity. This feature is common to almost all of them. According to them, the abstract or formless Brahma (divinity) assumes form and becomes concrete for a variety of reasons and also that there is no essential difference between the two. In such of the devotional works compositions devoted to Rama and Krishna constitute the largest group. In the concerned narratives prominence has been given to two aspects of these Avatars—one that of a hero and the other of a rascuer of devotees. It is to be noted that the narrative poems relating to Krishna, do not deal with the Radha-Krishna or the Gopi-Krishna theme, but describe the Rukmini-Krishna episode or those of the child Krishna subduing the Kaliya Nag, the object of the poet being to depict him as a hero and a rescuer of devotees. Next to these, we can, place those narratives which describe the event of Bhakta Prahlada and 'Gaja-graha' (capture of an elephant by a crocodile). Compositions relating to lord Shiva are comparatively small in number and they mainly deal with his marriages with Sati and Parvati.

Another class worth mentioning under this category consists of works where the absolute divinity has been described in adulatory verses. Isardas Barhat's Hariras stands out as the most prominent work, widely talked about and influential of this category. This is evident from the fact that many later poets, deeply impressed by the book, have composed their works on the same pattern. A number of such adultory compositions have come to light.

The devotees and saints who have written in this style have given prominence to 'Dashavtara' (The ten incarnations) comprising the matsya, Kurma, Varaha, Narsinha, Parashuram, Rama, Krishna, Buddha and Kalki. The Buddha mentioned in this context is not the one who founded Buddhism but the other Buddha who killed the demon 'Gayasura' in the 'Dwapar' era. Story verses written in praise of 'Dashavatara' are numerous. Among the narratives Kalyandas Rav's Gunagovinda (1643.) is an excellent composition.

The Charanas are mainly worshippers of 'Shakti' and they treat themselves as born of her. They also believe that eighty four specific incarnations of the goddess—'Shakti or Devi' have taken place in their community. Avadji, Mahmayji, Chaleraiji, Karniji etc. are some of the prominent names. Because of this belief, almost every charan poet has instinctively tried his/her hand be it even a small devotional prayer on any aspect of the many incarnations of the goddess. The Durga-saptashati appearing in the Markandeya-Purana generally forms the basis-narratives relating to 'Shakti. Some of the leading works dealing with the 'Dashavatara' theme in its variety also include the narrative poems concerned with specific subjects. Narrative poems dealing with the life of Rama are: Karman Mahtri's Sitaharan (1469.); Mehoji's (1483-1544) Ramayana; Sanya Jhula's (1523-1623) Angad Vishti; Madhodas Dadhvadia's (1553-1621) Ramarasoan; Parshuram Devacharya's (1557-1657) Raghunath Charit; Surjanji Puniya's (1583-1691) Rama Rasaw; Mahesdas Rav's (1644-1698) Raghunath Charit Navras Veli (incomplete); Muhta Raghunath's Raghu Rasaw (1668). Kaviya Karnidan's (1750-1840) Ramcharitra or Ramayana appearing in his work Surajprakash; Barhath; Narharidas Sanvlot's Gunaram Var Nisani; Sindhyach Budhasingh's (1829-1901) Ramcharit forming part of his poem Devicharit written in Pingal.

Besides these, the prosodical works have also adopted the story of Rama for the purpose of illustrating the metres. Prominent among such works are: Pingal Shiromani (compiled during the later half of the 17th century) which is believed to have been authored by Hararaj, the then heir apparent of Jaisalmer. Scholars offering different opinions on the subject, however, treat Kushalabh, the tutor of the prince in the art of poetry as its real author.

Raghunath Rupak Giantro by Manchha Kavi (1770-1833) and Raghuvar Jas Prakash (1824.) by Radha Krishna (second) deal with the marriage of Shiva with Sati in the form of prayers. Narrative poetry dealing with the marriage of Krishna with Rukmini are Rukmani Mangal alias Harjiro Vyavalo (1493-1500.) by Padam Bhagat; Veli Krishan Rukmani ri by Rathod Prithviraj (1549-1600.) It is an erotic poem culminating in devotion; Other such poems are: Rukmani Haran by Sanyashata, Rukmani Haran (1643-1670 approx) by Vithaldas: Gun Vijai Vysh (1718) by Barthath Muraridan; Kisan Vyanvalo by Rustamji (d.1718.) Rukmani Mangal by Ramlala (1718-1793).

Works relating to the marriage of Lord Shiva with 'Sati' and 'Parvati' including those in the form of prayers are Kisno's (16th century, later half) Mahadev Parvati ri Beli; Kesodas Gadan's Chhand Mahadevji ro; Adidan Gaden's (17th century, later half) Shri Bhavani Shankar ro gun Shivopuran (incomplete); Gordbanji Sinawa's (18th century) Gaur-Vyanvalo.

Narrative works about Bhakta Prahalad and Nisinhavtar are Kesauji Godara's (1573-1679) Prahalad Charit: Dudoji's (d. 1673) Prahalad Puranga; Harchand ji Dhukia's (1718-1803) Laghu Hari Prahlad Charit: Udoji Ading's (1761-1876) Prahaladcharit; Jangopal Rahori's Prahalad Charitra.

Poems composed in the praise of the merits and exploits of 'Hari (God), and describing the 'Dasavatar: are Barhath Isardas's (1538-1618) Hari Rasa; Jayasinh's (16th century) Hari Rasu; Surjanji Puniya's Katha Hariguna Kalyandas Rav's Gunagovind (1643); Pirdan Lala's (18th century, later half) Narayan Noh Parmeshwar Puran, Udoji Ading's Vishnu Charit and so on.

Poems relating to the incident of Gajagraha (capture of an elephant by a crocodile) are-Madjaudas Dadhvadia's Nisani Gajayokh; Surjani Puniya Katha Gajamokh; Maharaja Ajit Sinh's (1678-1724) Gajauddhhar Granth.

Poems about 'Shakti' (Durga) include Shridhar Vyas's Saptashati ra Chhand (1400 A D. approx). Kushal labh's (1523-1600) Durga Sattasi: Isardas Barhath's Guna Deviyana: Pirdan Lala's Hinglej Rasau; Maharaja Ajitsinh's (1678-1724) Durga Saptashati, Jati Jaichand's Mataji ri vachanika (1719 A.D.) Barhath Kriparam's (1743-1833) Kavitt Chaleyrai, Chalaknechi; Sindhayach Budhsingh's Devi Charit, Sankardan Samaur's (1824-1878) Sagatisujas; Hinuglajdan Kaviya's (1861-1948) Durgabahattari and Mehai Mahima (relating to Rav Jaitsa and Bhagvati Karniji) and numerous other works. Works dealing with 'Nirgunabhakti' (devotion to the formless divinity) are Barahath Asoji's (1493-1593) Guna Niranjan Pran; Kesodas Gadan's (1553-1653) *Nisani Vivek Var,*Pirdan Lala's Alakh Aradh, Ajapajap, etc.

Some of the saint poets who were the authors of miscellaneous works relating to spirituality and devotion, and knowledge etc are Tejoji Charan (1423-1518), Kanhoji Barhath (1443-1523); Udoji Naina (1448-1536) Alluji Kaviya (1463-1563) Chundoji Dadhavadia (period of literary work (1563-1568) Prithviraj Rathod, Kesarisingh Jaitavat (1650-1750) Opo Adho (1752-1843) and numerous others.

A number of sects were founded by the saints in Rajasthan during the period from 15th to 17th century. beginning with Jambhoji (1451-1536) and ending with Latgiri (approx, 1810 to 1870/1875). There has been almost a tradition in Hindi literature to describe the 'Nirgun' devotees as saints and their literature 'Sant Sahitya'. But, most of the saints who have written in Rajasthani, while treating the formless as the supreme object of devotion express faith in the Avatars, especially the 'Dashavatar' (ten Avatars), simultaneously rejecting the idea of idol-worship. Haridas Niranjani (1455-1543) of course is an exception; though he does not believe in Avatars,, he does not condemn the temples of worship. In fact, Dadu Dayal (1543-1603) has desired devotion in place of liberation as the ultimate end to be attained. The saints have full faith in the sacred texts also. Thus, there is a strange harmony in the theories of abstract power and the devotional aspect of the concrete form. It may thus be called Sagunonumkh-Nirgun Bhakti Kavya, that is, devotional literature of the abstract divinity heading towards the concrete one. Thus as laid down in the 'Bhagavat' faith, the theories of the concrete and the abstract forms are not contradictory to each other; it is worth mentioning that the poetry of the later saints of different sects is profoundly resonant with notes of devotion to the concrete. Because of their faith in the Avatars, the poets of the saint tradition, besides expressing their self experience, found another wide field for the description of the various manifestations of the supreme god and their merits and deeds, in the 'lilagan'. Nevertheless, the literary creation of each saint poet has its own distinctive importance, based on the individual's levels of 'Sadhana' -religious practice, emotions, ideals and faith. It may thus be concluded that the devotional literature takes within its sweep all the sayings of both the devotees of the Form as well as of the saints singing of the Formless.

It is worth mentioning that almost all the saints make statements implying yoga. Their faith in Yoga, respect for the Naths such as Gorakhnath, Jalandharnath and others, and use of the technical terminology of 'Yoga' may be easily judged from their writings. Laladas (1540-1648) is an exception to this in the sense that he describes Yoga as an evil and has expressed his deep faith in devotion and knowledge. Despite their faith in Yoga the keynote of their creation is devotion. Devotion is a matter of emotion, while yoga is that of spiritual endeavour. The saints attach greater importance to emotions than to spiritual endeavours, and the former consists in remembering God, which is easy to practice for everybody at every place and, all times.

The Rasik sect of the devotees of Rama: Ramanandji (1299-1410) was the first preceptor of Ramabhakti (devotion to Rama) in Northern India. His disciple was Anant Das and one of the latter's disciples, named Krishnadas Payhari, established a seat of the Ramanandi sect at Galta near Jaipur. Krishnadas had two principal disciples Kilhadas and Agradas. Kilhadas succeeded Krishnadas as the head of the Galta seat and his branch came to be known as the 'Tapasa branch'. The literature of this branch is mostly to be found in Brajabhasha. Agradas, the other disciple of Krishnadas, established his seat at Revasa, near Sikar and introduced the lyrical element and the aesthetic sense of emotion in Ramabhakti. His sect came to be known as the Rasika sect and, in course of time, spread widely over Ayodhya, Janakpur and Chitrakut, the places associated with Sita and Rama, the divine couple. This section could not enjoy any particularly large following in Rajasthan because of the fact that the people of Rajasthan believed more in the heroic, idealistic and rescuer aspects of Rama. Names of Kriparam (18th century), Rupadevi (work-Ramaras, 1864), etc. deserve mention in this tradition. In this context, the name of Anantdas (disciple of Ramanand) is worth mentioning for one more reason. To his line of disciples belonged the Acharya (preceptors) who founded the Gudad sect and the four 'Ramasnehi' sects (Raina, Shahpura, Sinhathal or Sinthal, and Khedapa) that emerged in Rajasthan in the 18th century.

The number of saints not belonging to any particular sect is also very large. Popaji (1383-1453) is said to be a direct disciple of Ramanandji, but his literature handed down to us gives no such indication. In various manuscript copies, about 25 of his padas and 13 of 'Sakhis (Dohas-stanzas of two lines), are available. The themes of his compositions are-Ramabhakti (devotion to Rama) in the tradition of worship of the Formless, and the glory of Lord Vishnu. The compositions are marked with spontaneity and simplicity of expression. The compositions of Kazi Mahmood (15th century) containing devotional emotions and spiritual warnings, are extremely popular and have become famous. About 45 such 'Padas' are available. It is difficult to find elsewhere the sweetness of diction, the purity of emotions, the concentration of feelings and the simplicity that one finds in the compositions. Mirabai (1498-1597) is a household name in India. Several collections of the songs that go under her name have been published. The number of such songs has reached the figure of about 2,000, but all of these are not her creation. Out of these, about 250 or 300 songs should be hers. There is no composition of Mira, other than these. As these songs have become popular and have been mostly transmitted orally, the language of the original compositions and at palaces even the substance of the sentiments expressed therein have undergone changes. Miran has given expression to the deepest emotions of her heart, in a form that is most natural and in a manner that exhibits the utmost simplicity and spontaneity. Here is the poetry of self surrender. That, in fact, is the most distinctive characteristic. She is a poetess belonging to the tradition of devotees of Krishna. The poetic compositions of the saint Mavji (1714-1744), are famous under the title of 'Chaupada' which deal with the themes of devotion, knowledge, ethics, didactic teaching, etc. Din Darvesh (1753-1833), besides writing miscellaneous compositions and songs, is famous for the works-Dinparkash, Granth Adalanand, Paramarth Prasang, Chitavansar, Isar Astut, Raj Chetavani, Bharamtod, Kakka Battisi, Gaggad Nisani, etc. We find in these works an impressive treatment, in simple language, of themes such as spirituality, devotion, knowledge, non attachment, futility of caste distinctions, and self-realisation. Gavari (1758-1808) is treated as Miran, reborn. About 600 'Padas' are stated to have been composed by her, containing themes of the glory of the lord (Vishnu), knowledge, devotion, non-attachment. Besides these Saints Gyaniji (15th century) Gadder (16th century), Namdev Shri Krishnadas (19th century), etc. are some other poets who have enriched the literary heritage of the saints.

Jain devotional literature is important from both the points of view of quantity and quality. In its essentials, this poetry is of a category different from the 'Vaishnava' devotional poetry. The devotional poetry of Jains is found in four main forms-1. Biographical or narrative poetry 2. The poetry of festivals, 3. Didactic poetry, and 4. Poetry in praise of God. Its heterogeneous character can also be seen in a number of narrative poems. The objective of this poetry is religious and spiritual, the dominant sentiment there being that of the 'Shanta' (the sentiment of repose and quiet). The stories narrated are taken from various Jain Puranas. It is worth mentioning that the Jain poet never digresses from the mainstream of the story. Directly or indirectly or by implication, the Jain compositions express the message that life should be lived in conformily with the principles expounded in the Jain religion. There has been hardly any Jain poet who has not written devotional poetry in some form or the other.

A great deal of literature of the saints and devotees is available in the oral folk tradition, under the name of several poets, known as well as unknown. These compositions are sung in popular tunes at 'Jagarans (festivals preceded or accompanied by night-long singing of devotional songs) and on many other occasions. Of these, the devotional songs for the formless are known as 'Sabad', while those for the concrete are called 'Bhajan' or 'Harjas'. Several of the compositions are of the mixed variety. This literature has played a significant part in strengthening the feelings of ethical living, self liberation and welfare of the people through sublimation of the mind, and refinement of feelings. It has spread far and wide on account of its truthfulness of the spiritual endeavour, its practicality, simplicity and pleasantness. The thematic scope is also very wide, such as-God, the Being, Maya (the theory that the world is an illusion), the perishability of wordly life, the uselessness of wordly pursuits, non-discrimination, the futility of caste distinctions, Yoga, the life-style of a Sadhu, caution (administered to worldly minded folk), didactic preachings, the company of good men, the virtues of Hari (Lord Vishnu) and songs praising his achievements, the importance of guru, (the preceptor), call for awakening of the soul, saint's teachings, principles of morality, etc. 'Sabads' are prevalent under the names of numerous exponents, e.g. Machhandarnath, Gorakhnath, Bharthari Adi Nath, Sadan Kasai, Ramdevji, Roopande, Dharu Meghval, Samrath, Ogad, Ghatamdas Mina, Raghuvardas, Bhainunji Bhati, Ruji Jat, Pragnath, Hariram, Gopisar, Tirlokji Mahajannnn, LLaladas, Dugarpuri Dipuri, Binjdas, Bihari Licchhman Jati, Dhendas, and others. Thus, the 'Bhajans' or 'Harjas' are famous through their exponents like Miranbai, Chandrasakhi, Bakhtavar, Rasikbihari, Surdas, Tulsidas and others.

Besides the above, there are also current among the common people compositions full of devotion, relating to Gogoji, Pabuji, Ramdevji and other deities constituting the 'Panch Pirs' and folk-deities such as Tejoji and others. The main note found in these compositions is the fulfilment of the worldly desires and the satisfaction of mundane longings.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Balaramadas Shastri, Shri Ramasnehi Anubhav Alok, Charandasji, Bhaktisagar, (Jaipur); Hiralal Maheshwari, Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya, (Calcutta), Jambhoji Vishnoi Sampradaya aur Sahitya (two parts, Calcutta); Malchandra Chaukasramji Sharma, Anubhavgira Udyot, (Bikaner); Mangaldas Swami, Dadu Sampradaya Ka Sankshipta Parichaya, (Jaipur), Shri Maharaj Haridasji Ki Vani, (Jaipur); Motilal Meneria, Rajasthan Ka Pingal Sahitya, (Udaipur); Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya, (Prayag); Radhikaprasad Tripathi, Ramasnehi Sampradaya, (Faizabad); Suryashankar Parik, Siddhhacharitra, (Ratnagarh).

Hi.M.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Sanskrit). Devotional lyrics form a major part of Sanskrit literature. The intimate devotion of the poet to his favourite deity, comes out in an emotional outburst and takes different forms praising the beauty and the magnanimous qualities of the deity, expressing the devotee's selfless and complete surrender to him and often requesting him to shower his favour on him, etc. Though Bharata does not include bhakti as an independent rasa, later critics like Vopadeva and Madhusudana Sarasvati have established bhakti as an independent rasa, others consider it as a bhava, where rati (love) is directed towards the deity.

Some of the Rigvedic hymns can be considered as early specimens of bhakti, the epics and mahakavyas contain devotional hymns. The Bhagavata has bhakti towards Vishnu as the main rasa.

The devotional stotra literature itself is very large. This may be classified under different heads: 1) Pure stotras on deities: The various works ascribed to Shankaracharya like the Saundaryalahari, Shivanandalahari, Vishnubhujangastotra, Swabhujangastotra, Subrahmanyabhujangastotra (in Bhujangaprayata metre). Mahimnahstava by Puspadanta on the greatness of Shiva. Shyamaladandaka popularly misascribed to Kalidasa, Suryashataka in Sragdhara metre on the sun god by Mayura who was a contemporary of Bana, Chandishataka by Bana, Stotraratna on Vishnu by Yamunacharya, Mukundamala by Kulashekhara, Krishnakarnamrita by Lilashuka, and the Narayaniya by the scholar poet Narayanabhatta.

2) Namavali like the various Sahasranamastotras on Vishnu, Shiva, Lalita, Ganesha, etc., Astottarashatis (108 names) etc.
3) Stotras on certain aspects of the deity like the Bhikshatanakavya of Utpreksh vallabha, Shripadasaptati on the feet of the goddess by Narayanabhatta, the Panchashati on the glance (Kataksha), smile (mandasmita), the feet (Padaravinda), and the form of the goddess Kamakshi at Kanchi.
4) Gitaprabandhas (operatic compositions like Jayadeva's Gitagovinda, may also be included under devotional stotras): There are a large number of such prabandhas following the Jayadeva on the Lila themes involving Rama, Krishna, Shiva-Parvati and even Jaina-figures.

5) Jaina-stotras like Kalyanamandira, stotra by Siddhasena Divakara and Buddhist stotras like Ashvaghosha's Gandistotragatha Matricheta's Shatpanchashatikastotra and Lokeshvarashataka by Vajradatta (9th century) written in Sragdhara metre on Avalokiteshvara.

6) Devotional songs by great composers like Tyagaraja, Svati Tirunal and Purandaradas, and devotees like Sadashiva Brahmendeva.
7) Muktakas (stray verses) on deities, some of which are anonymous.

It may be noted that devotional literature is one of the living branches of Sanskrit literature, in which original poems of devotional fervour and literary merit are composed in a spontaneous manner and recited by the devotees.

K.K.R.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Sindhi). The Sindhi literature of early peroid (712-1520) mainly consists of ballads and legends depicting valour and romances of local chieftains and characters popular in Sindhi folk literature. It was preserved mostly by the bards and the minstrels through oral tradition and has been recorded only in the 18th century. However, there are some devotional legends and songs belonging to the early period which later on developed into the main-stream of devotional poetry in Sindhi. In the legends of early period there is only one legend pertaining to the thought-current of Hindu religion namely Amarlal (Immortal Hero) or Uderolal (The Exalted one), who is worshipped by Sindhi Hindus as an incarnation of God 'Varuna' (God of Waters). He was a historical personage born at Nasarpur in 950. Hymns and songs composed in honour of Uderolal are generally known as 'Panjira'. Although the oldest songs in praise of Uderolal represent the Sindhi of early period, yet the tradition of such songs certainly can be traced back to the early period, say, to the 11th century.

The land of Sindh is famous for its large number of saints and holy men. Poetic compositions of Sufi mystics form the major trend in medieval Sindhi literature. However, its seeds were sown in the early period. Sheikh Bahauddin Zakariya (1182-1262) of Multan, Sayid Jalal Surkh Bukhari of Uch Sharif, Sheikh Usman Qulandaer Shahbaz (d. 1272) and Sheikh Hasan Alias Pir Patho (d. 1248) are some of the famous Sufi saints of Sindh and Multan who are worshipped and held in reverence. There are written references to prove that during that period a good number of Sindhi singers used to sing devotional songs in assemblies of 'Sufis', and the Sufi saints themselves used to sing and dance in a state of ecstacy.

During the 14th and the 15th centuries, propagators of the Ismaili Khoja sect came from Iran and visited Multan, Sindh, Kutch and Gujarat regions, Pir Sadaruddin (1290-1409) and Pir Hasan Kabiruddin (1339-1449) composed devotional songs called 'Ginan' which are philosophical as well as didactic in nature. The thought content of these songs is based upon Sufi mysticism and vedanta philosophy. The language 'Ginanas' is a mixed form of Hindi, Multani, Sindhi, Kutchi, and Gujarati.

The medieval Sindhi poetry (1520-1843) is mostly devotional in nature. It shows three major trends (1) Sufi mysticism, (2) Nirguna Bhakti,devotion to Absolute and formless God, and (3) Devotion to Islam. The trend of Saguna Bhakti, devotion to personified God as seen in the worship of Rama or Krishna,is absolutely absent in the medieval Sindhi literature. The major poets of medieval Sindhi poetry representing the above trends are as follows:

(1) Sufi Mysticism: The earliest major sufi poet representing this trend was Qazi Qadan (1465-1551). Seven verses of this poet quoted in a Persian work Bayan-al-Arfin (written in 1628) are regarded by critics as seven gems of classical Sindhi poetry which have been proved a model for later Sufi poets. The Sindhi literary world was thrilled to find about one hundred more verses of Qazi Qadan which have been brought into light recently, However, their authenticity has been challenged by some of the knowledgeable scholars of the subject. Those who contributed significantly to the development of devotional poetry in Sindhi, were Shah Abdul Karim (1537-1622), Lutf Allah Adiri (1611-1679), Shah Inat Allah Rizvi (1625-1713), Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752) and Abdul Wahab alias Sachal Sarmast (1739-1826). Among Sufi mystic poets of Sindh, Shah Abdul Latif, has gained international fame and his selected verses have been translated into English, German, Hindi, Gujarati and Urdu. The poetry of Shah Abdul Latif is important not only due to its mystic thought, but also due to delineation of contemporary Sindhi culture and society.

(2) Nirguna Bhakti: The poets representing this trend are devoted to Absolute and Formless God. Their poetry, though influenced to some extent, by Sufi mysticism, is greatly inclined to Advaita-Vedanta and Yoga philosophy. Besides, their poetic compositions show clear impact of Natha and Siddha philosophy. The major saint poets belonging to this trend in Sindhi poetry of medieval period are Rohal (1734-1804), Murad (1743-1796), Sami (1743-1850) and Dalpat (1769-1849).

M.K.J.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Tamil). The culture of the Tamil people which was pre-Aryan has had religion as its core and this is commented upon even in the Sanskrit literature where the Bhagavatapurana (eleventh skanda) says that "only those could have great bhakti who had drunk deep of the waters of the Kaveri of Tamraparni and Kritamala (Vaihai)". Early bhakti literature in the Tamil language has drawn forth this encomium from Sanskrit purana writers.

We may trace the evolution of Tamil devotional literature from Tolkappiyam (300 B.C.) and through the first epic Silappadhikaram (2-3 centuries A.D.). Of the bhakti writing in these books, three aspects are significant, songs on Vishnu, on Muruga and on Shakti. Siva's form is described in the Sangam poems vividly and in the epic as one whose body is never born, but His name is not mentioned. However, after the subjugation of the Pandiya dynasty at Madurai by the alien Kalabhras in the third century A.D. and the short spell of suppression of the Vedic religion it seems there was a spontaneous and glorious resurrection of the Vedic society, giving rise to a large number of Saints and divine singers known as Nayannar in Saivism and as Alvar in Vaishnavism from about the fifth century. From this period, a large volume of bhakti literature had evolved in the language, resulting in a great awakening among the people causing some thousands of massive stone temples to Siva and Vishnu to be built, large volumes of bhakti poems to be sung in the shrines and the evolution of the temple music and temple festivals, all of which had directed the Tamil people along a path to godliness. The songs in particular sung by the saints, display a great wealth of devotion and surrender in the language.

The age of this Bhakti literature is chiefly the period between the 7th and 9th centuries, both in Saivism and in Vaishnavism, but the two earlier centuries, the 5th and the 6th, were in the vanguard of this bhakti movement.

Early Shaiva bhakti literature had been grouped into twelve books, known as the Tirumurai. Two figures stand out prominently in the evolution of the early bhakti literature. Tirmular and the lady Karaikkal Ammai. Tirumular, a realized siddha (5th century) who caused his soul to enter the body of a cowherd who had died, stayed in yoga on the banks of the sacred river Kaveri and sang 3000 short verses, which contain the earliest volume of bhakti poetry in the language. His songs, known significantly as Tiru-Mantiram (sacred mystic utterances) express early popular philosophic concepts and at the same time pour forth profound devotion to Siva as the Supreme Godhead. A simple verse expresses his religion of bhakti and his concern for society "Offer a bit of a leaf (as flower) to God; a handful of grass to a cow; a morsel of food to the hungry when you partake of your food; and utter a kind word to every one". His book is an encyclopaedia of his own mystic experiences clothed in simple words which only occasionally have an obscure terminology. Two of his utterances were most significant not only in his day but for all time; "Mankind is one and God is one," "Love is God".

Karaikkal Ammai, born as Punitavati at Karaikkal shows how, her supreme surrender to God works miracles for her which make her husband leave her out of great respect, for she was a celestial being. Discarding the human form, she goes to Kailas in the form of a ghost and is there addressed as 'Mother' by Siva himself. Finally she comes to rest at the shrine of Tiru Alankadu to worship the Dance of Nataraja there. She has sung 143 verses in four poems of fine lyrical form. They express the innocent joy and wonder of a little child on seeing the form of Siva, decked with the serpents, the crescent moon and the Ganga. "It is He that perceives, that makes me perceive, is the instrument of perception and is also the object perceived". There have been many women saints in the period, but she is the only poet among them.

Along with Appar (590-671 A.D.) his senior contemporary, Sambandar (635-651 A.D.) spearheaded a revolution in Tamil poetry and introduced the element of bhakti and religion into it, a feature which has continued to the present day. He had a visitation of the grace of Siva at the age of three and from then on he made an unceasing tour of Tamilnadu from Kalahasti in the north to Rameśvaram in the extreme south, singing the praises of God in the most beautiful lyrical poetry.

Early Tamil poetry had three divisions: poetry, music and drama but music and drama had become defunct in his day after the seizure of power in Madurai by the alien Kalabhras. He resurrected Tamil music and placed it on the high pedestal due to it. He has sung all his songs and has composed songs in 23 different tunes. He was accompanied in his tours of the shrines by Tiru Nilakantha Yalppanar and his wife who played his songs on their yal (a vina like musical instrument). His variety of musical and poetical compositions has not been equalled by any other in the Tamil language. He was an inventor of difficult forms in prosody and metre and on all these counts he holds a unique place among the Saiva hymn-writers.

Sambandar had worked many miracles in his life to help the meek and the distressed. A large troupe followed him in his tours and both the songs and their sweet music helped to popularize his songs in society at all levels. His hymns had been sung in the congregational temple worship and they had been able to infuse through the ages faith and courage, peace and hope among all the people. The ways of God are unfathomable and those who desire to get over the ills of life should have faith in him and should make an absolute surrender to him.

Sambandar, along with Appar has sung a number of fine lyrical songs on the aham model (love poems on God), placing himself in the position of a love-sick maiden pining for the love of the Lord. What has since come to be known as bridal mysticism originates from him.

Appar lived up to the ripe old age of 81. Born a Saiva, his inquiry into religious faiths took him to Janism but at the intervention of his pious sister, he was brought back into the Saiva fold. He survived the persecution of the Jains and by his godliness and devotion was able to win over even his persecutor, the Pallava Emperor Mahendra Varma (590-630) back to Saivism. He met and befriended Sambandar, his junior in age, and the two visited many shrines together.

He toured the entire Tamil country not only singing songs there but doing manual service, by clearing the temple premises of weeds and rubbish. By his songs and his very life a new dimension was added to bhakti, namely that work is worship and that there was a dignity in physical work. "The Lord of Kadambur will naturally sustain me when he sustains all; but my duty is only to serve without caring for any reward."

He was given the title 'Prince of Words' (Tirunavukkarasu) by the Lord Siva himself for his sweet songs. When the minions of the king summoned him, he answered them with a challenge, "Servants to none are we. We are servants at the feet of Siva and recognize none else. Who are you and who is your king?" These words have become proverbial in the Tamil language.

This Vcelalar saint was hailed as Father by the Brahmin saint Sambandar and the name has stuck since then. The songs of Appar are always simple, direct and easily understandable, without any artistic or laboured flourishes. The feeling of devotion and surrender expressed in his songs come from the deepest recesses of the heart and no other devotional poet has endeared himself to the masses of worshippers as much as he, except perhaps Manikkavachakar. He is said to be a master of tandakam, a form of eight foot verse which in his hands expresses mellowed thoughts in a moving language.

The most colourful figure in all the Saiva canon is Saint Sundarar (700 A.D.). His legendary story begins even from the heavenly Kailas. A marriage arranged for him in the ordinary way is stopped by Siva himself appearing there as an elderly brahmin and claiming him as his slave. After considerable protests, Sundarar had to follow the old man, whom he realized was none other than Siva himself. However through Siva's help he marries two wives. He had promised his second wife never to leave her, but when he actually goes out of the place, induced by a recollection of the festival at the place of his first wife he, loses his eyesight. He realises that this is a punishment. But his prayers to the Lord are of no immediate avail; he has to suffer; his eyesight is restored to him only after some time. Sundarar is called the comrade of Siva, but that has not helped him to take liberties in the matter of worldly ethics. Siva plays the role of a messenger of love to Sundara in attempting to win over his first wife. Two other canonized devotees Kalikkama and Seraman Perumal became his friends; the latter himself was a poet who had sung three poems of Siva, collected in the 11th Book of the Saiva Canon.

Sundarar's greatest contribution is to the Saiva hagiology where, in a sweet little poem, he says that he is the servant of the servants of God and enumerates a list of sixty such men and women of God, and nine groups of his devotees. This song of his was the inspiration, four centuries later, to Sekkilar in his writing of the Periyapuranam. Sundarar frequently refers to Appar and Sambandhar in his songs; he mentions in particular that Sambandhar caused an understanding of God and Tamil through his music. Following that tradition, his own songs, all set to music, are equally simple and sweet. Some of his most moving songs are those sung when he lost his eyesight.

The songs of these three devotees are called the Devaram and they form the first seven books of the Saiva canon.

Saint Manikkavachakar (9th century) by his profound learning secured recognition by being appointed minister to the king. While on the way to the sea coast to purchase horses for the king, he met the divine Guru at Perunturai and from that moment, having had supreme spritual englightenment in his presence, he became his slave and forgot his duty to the king, his master. For this neglect of duty, he had to undergo punishment at the hands of the king. He supplicates to his master; many miracles happen; the king realises the state of mind of Manikkavachakar and releases him from his service. The saint thereupon goes to Chidambaram visiting several shrines on the way, dictates all his songs to the Lord himself, who acts as his scribe there, and attains mukti. He is the well known author of Tiruvachakam, a collection of 656 devotional verses. This book, like Kural, is familiar in translation to discerning people in English and many other languages. The whole of Tiruvachakam is poetry of a very high order. It contains 51 separate poems, of which 13 represent folk song motifs. The story says that he went about mixing with the common people and children and absorbed the games of the girls into his poems to express his feelings of surrender and devotion to God. Many of these motifs had never before been put to this kind of poetic use.

His songs are just the offerings of his own soul at the feet of his master and guru, Lord Siva. In all his poems, he praises the glory of Siva, who had deigned to bestow His infinite grace on him, humble and undeserving though he was. This element is present in all his songs.

He had a full realization of God and an ecstatic spiritual joy; it passed off and a period of unhappiness and despair set in; he cried to God and cried out in agony, and again he had a vision and an experience. This process seemed to go on alternately until he got the final realisation in Chidambaram. All these changes in experience are clearly echoed in the songs which bring in a personal touch. Along with the joy of servitude and supplication, there is also in Tiruvachakam a strain of strong conviction that could not be shaken off. In such places, the poems portray the complete trust and assurance of a little child in his mother.

Words have no use for him. He first sings as the experience gushes forth, vocally. He does not very much think of music or of imagery. He also employs the love theme or aham, but even here, that note is subordinated to that of praise of the Lord.

These four, Sambandhar, Appar, Sundarar and Manikkavachakar, are known as the Saiva acharyas (spiritual-preceptors) and their songs form the first eight books of the Saiva canon. The pathways to God are traditionally held to be four in Saivism—charya or the path of the servant, kriya, the path of the son, yoga, the path of the comrade and Jnana, the path of the disciple. These four acharyas illustrate the four paths by their lives and songs.

During the period of the bhakti movement, worship of Ganesha, Subrahmanya and Shakti was prevalent in Tamilnadu but these acharyas, though they occasionally refer to them, have not sung any songs on them. Their songs are only on the Supreme Siva.

Tiru Isaippa is a collection of 29 decades of which 16 are on Lord Nataraja at Chidambaram, sung by nine poets. One of the poems is a pallandu, or benediction on the Lord Himself for his long period of glory. Coming immediately after the four, these songs are also bhakti poetry, highly lyrical in nature.

The culmination of all this bhakti poetry is in Sekkilar (1145) whose Periya Puranam, the lives of the men of God, was grouped as the 12th Book of the Saiva Canon.

This work holds a unique position in the language in that it is a work of epic proportions (4286 quatrains) on the glory of the servants of God. The language is always easy, graceful, fluent and charged with emotion. The one keynote of this work is bhakti, the devotion to God, and viewed from that stand point, it is a marvellous achievement.

The work is in a sense a national epic of the Tamil people, because it treats of the lives of the saints who lived in all the different parts of Tamilnadu, and belonged to all the classes of society, men and women, high and low, educated and unlettered. We have among the saints princes from all the ruling dynasties of the land, as well as men from the Harijan classes; but they are all equal in the devotion and service to God. Sekkilar transcends the limits of time and space and includes within the fold of his spiritual democracy even people who lived earlier and who will be living later, in all the distant climes. Most of the saints have to pass through an ordeal where their devotion is put to the severest test, but everyone of them emerges out of it victorious. Nothing is impossible for the devotee; he sacrifices his wife, his child, himself; his eyes he plucks out; fights with his own kith and kin; he does not hestiate to punish the king's wife when she smells the flowers intended for God. Devotion to God's emblems is so intense that when he sees the sacred ash on his adversary in combat, he allows himself to be slain rather than fight with a devotee; when a Chola prince found the matted-head (the emblem of Siva) of a soldier on the battle field, he gave up his own life for the sin of having caused the death of such a bhakta. Ordinary persons become great heroes by their sacrifices; women also share such sacrifices as equal partners. In addition to the three Devaram singers, the Puranam mentions the lives of seven poets who are also servants of God.

A deep and fervent humanism pervades all the songs of the saints and is also very well brought out in the lives of the saints sung by Sekkilar. Here we may say that the saints also care for humanity at large and strive to ameliorate the suffering. The saints saw God in all creation and they seem to have considered service to all creatures as service to God.

Any account of the bhakti literature in the Tamil language will not be complete without a detailed reference to Tiruppuhal of Arunagirinathar (14-15th centuries), a votary of Muruga. He has sung more than 1360 verses known as Tiruppuhal (the Lord's praise) besides a few other poems. Tiruppuhal has such a variety of rhythmic patterns that it is unequalled and very vast. Arunaginathar's religious zeal and supplication to God, and the joy and peace emanating from the songs are infectious. To him Muruga is the Supreme God who dwells in all the temples and who gives succour of his devotee at all times.

His Kandar Alankaram (in 106 verses) is a much simpler poem, breathing courage and hope to all mortals. The faith in God voiced here will make even the most despondent to go through life bravely and confidently meet any challenge in life. There is no poem in the language which will infuse faith and courage in young children as firmly as Kandar Alankaram. It is mostly in very simple language and many of its verses laugh at Death.

The authors of the Vaishnava canon are called Alvar, that is those who are deeply immersed in the grace and glory of Vishnu (and who will also help to immerse us in that ocean of grace). The Alvars are twelve and their period ranges from the 6th century to the 9th. Their songs are collected together and counted as a total of four thousand, and they are known by the name Nalayira Divya Prabandham (the four thousand sacred songs).

The first Alvars (Mudal-Alvar) were three, Polhai Alvar, Bhuttamalvar and Periyalvar, hailing from the Pallava country. Their origin is not known: they were foundlings. A beautiful legend says how they saw a vision of Tirumal (Vishnu) there and began to sing His praises. As there was not enough space for the three of them, they were standing when Vishnu entered amidst them, and they felt squeezed. Polhai used the earth as a lamp and Bhuttam used devotion as a lamp to find out the cause of squeezing. Periyalvar saw the Lord there amidst them and began to describe Vishnu whom they saw. They have each sung an antadi of 100 venbas, known as the first, second and third antadis.

These are the early poems on Vaishnavism and they show a considerable degree of simplicity and religious tolerance, and a wonder and joy, born out of a full and limitless experience of divine grace.

Tirup-Panalvar, a bard of the lowest caste in society, was an ardent devotee of Vishnu at Srirangam. He used to play his yal instrument on the southern bank of the Kaveri, in praise of the Lord as a kind of service to him. The Lord made known the devotion of the low caste Pana by ordering the high caste priest to carry him into the temple on his shoulders. The Pana sang a short poem of ten verses in praise of the various organs of the physical form of the Lord of Srirangam and was merged in Him. Mentioning each feature, he pours forth his longing for Him in the manner of a girl yearning for her lover. This one song has earned for him the status of an alvar.

Tirumalisai Alvar, of the place of that name on the other hand, is a high caste brahmin and a bigot. He was always intolerant of other religions. He has written two poems, one of which is set in a rigid rhythmic pattern. His works are philosophical in content but the lyrical quality is mostly absent. Some of his verses contain great truths spoken in a very simple, lucid language and in an arresting manner; but the general speed of jingle and its mechanical rhythm tends to dilute the effect of poetry from the songs;

An example: "The tides build up even out of the snow-white wide sea; they roll back and merge with the same sea; in like manner; all that are born and that die that walk and live, out of you, finally are merged in you; such is your nature".

Tonder-Adippodi Alvar (the dust of the feet of God's devotees) has sung two poems, Tiruppalli-Elucci and the other Tiru Malai. The first consists of ten verses, intended to rouse the Lord from His sleep in the early morning and obtain His grace. Tiru Malai means the Holy Garland. The verses show a high degree of violent bigotry and intolerance, and at the same time, of intense devotion too. According to his biography, his life consisted of extremes and these are reflected in his songs. He completely surrenders himself to Gods. To him, the Kaveri is more holy than the Ganges because Srirangam is on the Kaveri. The appeal of the two poems to the Vaishnavas is so great that they are required to recite them daily in their prayers. "My Lord of Srirangam, I have no place and no land; no kith nor kin. I hold fast unto thy feet, Thou that art Supreme, of azure hue. I cry out to Thee, O Krishna. Who is my support, other than Thee?"

Kulasekarar was a prince of the west coast called Kulasekhara Perumal and so his songs are Perumal Tirumoli. He has ten poems, with 105 verses; he was most attracted by the Ramavtara and most of his poems are a passionate adoration of this aspect of Vishnu. Like Periyalyar, he is fond of celebrating the childhood of Rama and Krishna and to him goes the credit of singing the first lullaby song in Tamil.

The first three poems are in praise of Srirangam. Two poems are on the boyhood of Krishna. In the first, the girls in the Ayarpadi chide him for being unfaithful to each in turn. The second is the very moving lament of Devaki, the real mother of Krishna, who bemoans her own fate in not being able to rejoice in the boyish pranks and feats of the boy, while it was given to his foster mother Yasoda to witness and rejoice in them. There is also another moving poem from the lips of Dasaratha, the father of Rama, who mourns his ill luck in sending Rama away to the forest. The poet in the role of Rama's father is unparalleled. The next poem in praise of Tillai Tiruchitrakutam, is a continuous narration of the entire story of the Ramayana in ten verses.

All the poems of this Alvar prince are supremely lyrical in quality and his songs on Tiruvenkatam and Vittuvakkodu may be said to be unsurpassed in emotional fervour and the spirit of supplication. He desires to be born as a bird, a fish, a cup, a tree, a rock, a stream, a step, in fact anything on his Tiruvenkatam hill. The Vittuvakkodu song contains a proverb in each verse. For descriptive poetry in the most picturesque and lyrical language Kulasekharar is a master in the Vaishnava canon.

Periyalvar was a brahmin from Sri Villiputtur, named Vishnuchittan. He was a spiritual preceptor to the Pandiya ruler. According to tradition, he established in the king's court that Vishnu was the Supreme Lord and got the prize of a purse of gold. When Vishnu was taken in procession along the streets, he had a darshan of the deity and fearing that some one might cast an evil eye on him, he sang a pallandu poem, meaning 'May you live long in all this glory.' Usually it is the mother who does a ritual to remove the evil eye. Because he did this and because he sang almost all his songs on Krishna, placing himself in the position of his mother Yashoda, he has been hailed by the grateful Vaishnava community as the Periya Alvar (the Elder Alvar). As also the foster-father of Andal in real life, who gave her away in marriage to Lord Ranganatha (Vishnu) this title is appropriate to him.

Most of his songs are devoted to the Krishnavatara; there are also a few addressed to Rama. His poems give us the most delightful picture of the childhood of Lord Krishna in the Tamil language. Among all divine children, the child Krishna has a very large number of lovely stories woven around him. This child and his pranks are the greatest favourites with this Alvar. The Alvar was a bachelor; it is astonishing how he has been able to enter into the mind of Yashoda and relive the childhood days of Krishna in Gokulam. The birth of the child, the beauty of his form, the child in the cradle, the address to the moon, the lisping of words, the clapping of hands, the lullaby song and many other little acts relating to the child are the subject matter of his poetry. All devotional literature teems with instances of the poet becoming mentally the lady-love and pining for the love of the Lord. But Periyalvar, becoming the mother, is the most unique feature in all literature.

His songs are some of the finest examples of good poetry, not only in the Vaishnava Canon, in bhakti poetry, but in all literature. As contributions to Tamil literature, his songs are the first to have broken new ground. Examples of pallandu, talattu and pillait-Tamil motifs have given rise to a vast wealth of such literature in the next thousand years.

Andal, the only woman poet among the alvars, is the adopted daughter of Periyalvar. Alvar found her as a baby in his garden, and the man who was a confirmed bachelor brought up this girl, as a mother would have. When she came of age, she refused to think of a mortal for a bridegroom. She decked herself as Krishna's bride. She even put on the garlands intended for Him, to see if they were handsome enough to be worn by Him! This irked Alvar not a little, but Vishnu Himself approved of it. She chose Sri Ranganatha for her bridegroom and her life ends with the marriage and her blissful union with her Lord at Srirangam.

Her songs numbering in all 173 verses form Tiruppavai and Nachiyar Tirumoli. Tiruppavai seems to have been taken from a popular theme of the period where girls go in groups to a river or tank for a bath and pray for the blessings from their patron deity. Here Andal calls upon her companions to wake up and go with her, singing the praise of the Lord Krishna and seeking His grace on themselves in order to get good food, good cows and milk, good dress and good husbands, and ultimately asking Him to take all of them of the Ayar clan as his servants for ever and ever. Tiruppavai is a household word in the Vaishnava community, recited by them daily, particularly in the month of Marhali (December-January), Pavaip-pattu seems to have enjoyed immense popularity not only in Tamilnadu but in overseas territories also; it is said to be the occasion for a national festival in distant (Siam) Thailand where it had travelled during the days of the Chola conquests and got absorbed in popular lore.

The narration of her dream-wedding with her Lord is the most important and the most lyrical of all her poems. The poem has got absorbed into the ritual of all the Vaishnava communities; and is sung even today at their wedding ceremonies. It is a beautiful lyric, narrating the details of the marriage ceremony. We can go to other such poems which contain her address to the conch, to the clouds, flowers and birds, all soaked in a profound bhakti to Krishna.

Tiru Mangai Alvar is one of the two Alvars who have sung a large number of verses and on a large number of Vishnu shrines. The Periya Tirumoli, the Second Thousand, is composed entirely of his songs. Generally a picturesque and dramatic setting is given to the lives of the Alvar and the story of Tirumangai is certainly the most picturesque of them all. He was a Kallar chief of Mangai in Tiruvalinadu, near modern Sirkali in Tanjauvar district. He married Kumudavalli and at her instance began feeding thousands of bhagavatas (devotees of Vishnu) daily. When he was short of funds, he took to highway robbery. To test him, Vishnu with his consort appeared on the road as a newly wedded bridegroom and bride. Tirumangai seized all the jewels worn by the bridegroom, but unable to remove the rings on his toes, he applied his teeth to them. When even this failed, he asked the bridegroom, "Have you cast a spell (mantra) over these?" He said yes, and whispered into Tirumangai's ear the eight mystic syllables (astaksara). Immediately the erstwhile robber came under the influence of the Lord and straight way burst into a song. The first song which describes the learning of the Lord's name is very famous.

His Periya Tirumoli contains besides Tirumoli, two beautiful poems, 'Tiruk-Kuruntandakam' and 'Tiru-Neduntandakam'. The opeing song of Tirumoli is the one he sang when he came directly under the influence of his master, Vishnu. It is an outburst of ecstatic delight on being taught the Lord's name. The same delight in the name is expressed by him elsewhere. One poem on Tiruvenkatam prays to the Lord fervently to accept him inspite of his many imperfections (beginning Taye tandai enrum) and is a very moving and haunting one. Like all the saintly singers everywhere, he says here that he has committed all sins; he cries that he is now surrendering himself to the feet of Venkatesa and prays to him to receive him and bestow His grace.

Another poem enumerates the occasions when He gave refuge to humble folk like Guha and prays that he also be accepted. Speaking of the Tiru Nariyur shrine, he says that this temple on a raised base was built by Kochchengat Chola, who had already built seventy similar temples for Siva. One poem here on sappani (asking the infant child to clap his hands) is on the pillai-Tamil pattern of Periyalvar. Another poem of short lines is in the form of an entreaty by a love sick maiden to the birds and other animals to call on the Lord to go to her; it is on the model of Appar's Tiru Angamalai in metre and tune and is a delight to children; this is a poem on the love theme, most sensitive and poignant. He sings many poems on girls' games. The appeal of childhood seems to be a favourite theme with all the Vaishnava poets, because of the immense scope in the portrayal of the Lord as the lovely child Krishna; our Alvar is no exception.

Nammalvar was the son of Kari of Tirukkuruhur in the extreme south of Tamilnadu. Though he was born through the special grace of Vishnu, he kept dumb. His parents placed him under the puli tree (tamarind, the sthala vriksha of the temple at Tirukkuruhur). The child would not see anyone except Him, and would not speak to anyone. Sixteen years passed. Madhura kavi came there directed by a divine light, and to him the Alvar opened his eyes and began to speak.

He has sung four poems, Tiru Viruttam, Tiru Asiriyam, Periya Tiru Antadi and Tiru Vaymoli; they are considered to be the substance of the four vedas, Rig, Yajur, Atharva and Sama respectively. His poems are known among the Vaishnavas as the fifth Veda. His very name Nammalvar shows the endearmant he had among them (Nam-alvar: our alvar). But his reputation rests on the last, Titu Vaymoli (Sacred-Utterances) which runs in-to 1102 verses. All the verses are in one antadi arrangement; the legend that all the forms of Vishnu in the various temples appeared before him to receive a song from him is understandable, in the light of this antadi.

His Tiru Viruttam deals with love themes on the model of the earlier Sangam 'aham' poetry on the religious plane. It sings of the soul's determination to break the fetters which bind it to gross matter, and expresses its yearning for union with God.

This Alvar's poetry enshrines the highest spiritual wisdom of the Vaishnava cult and in this respect he occupies the same exalted position that Manikkavachakar occupies in Saivism. As poetry, the Tiru Vaymoli is considered to be heart-melting poetry, giving us the quintessence of divine experience. His is not mere wisdom; it is a blend of wisdom, emotion, surrender and realisation. He has the vision of god in an extraordinary measure. All his senses perceive only God; it is always a direct realisation through absolute surrender. He addresses the world and gives out his message of love and hope, of surrender and joy in service. Attunement to the divine will liberates one even here, in this birth.

Many of his songs on the love theme are supremely poetic. It is indeed an inspired writing and his brilliant flashes when he lays bare from the inmost recesses of the heart, pining for the love of the Lord. "Art thou not mine own, little myna? I had prayed to thee to convey my all-consuming love to God, but thou didst not. I have now become weak and helpless through pining. Thou mayst go even now, and find some one who can feed thee as lovingly as I had done."

Madhura Kavi, the last of the Alvar, is remembered as the devotee who discovered Nammalvar. It is remarkable that he was raised to the status of an Alvar, though he has not sung a single line on Vishnu; his ten verses are on his master Nammalvar; he even says that he knows no other god than Nammalvar.

Amutanar, in the days of Ramanuja sang an antandi poem of 108 verses in his praise. Its poetic and philosophic content was of such a high quality, that the acharya included it, at the request of the Vaishnavas, in the Vaishnava canon. The antadi contains a number of verses of good lyrical quality.

The lives of these Alvars and the lives of the Vaishnava acharyar or pontifical heads are recorded in books known as Guruparampara in a peculiar kind of prose which is a mixture of Sanskrit words and Tamil; the style is called Manipravala. Although it cannot be easily grasped by the ordinary Tamil reader, it is also a part of the Vaishnava bhakti literature which has kept alive the tradition of the Alvar through the lives of the later men of God known as acharyar.

Later devotional literature does not show that bhakti was a flame newly kindled or that it had died out. The tradition of glorifying the deity in the temple and directing people to worship, which we find in the Saiva Nayannar and the Vaishnaya Alvar, later took the form of what are called Puranas, particularly Sthala Puranas which record local legends on the grace of God and induce people to surrender themselves to Him. The number of such Puranas is very vast and the total number of verses there may go to several hundreds of thousands. All of them preach bhakti and self-effacement and some of them are excellent poetry which live in the minds and lips of many people in the modern day. Kanda puranam (14th century) on Muruga and Tiruvilyadal puranam (early 18th century) on Siva at Madurai are some of these poetic works.

Bhakti poetry on the footsteps of the Nayannar and the Alvar flows through to the modern day. Tayumanavar (early 18th century) and Ramalingar (middle of the 19th century) and even the modern national poet Subrahmanya Bharati belong to that great tradition. The writing of these poets is very fine lyrical poetry, limpid and moving, written in a chaste, simple language which easily reaches the masses. Many of the lines are household words today.

Occasionally however we have Muruga glorified as the Supreme in Arunagirinathar's Tiruppuhal, There have been other eminent poets of the Muruga bhakti school and several poets who have sung very fine hymns on the Shakti cult.

One noteworthy feature in Bhakti poetry has grown after the Saiva Nayannar, in the songs of Arunagirinathar (Tiruppuhal), Tayumanavar and Ramalingar. Such growth after the Alvar is absent in Vaishnavism. Secondly Sthalapuranas are almost absent in Vaishnavism.

This rapid survey does not cover the elegant and wonderful musical pieces in Tamil written by gifted musical composers of the 16th to the 19th centuries.

In a land where temples were many and temple ritualistic worship had been long formalised, these Saints brought in congregational worship and involved the masses also in the temple rituals. We do not know if the temple pujas were familiar to the people but the Saints brought all sections of people to the very doors of the deity and made them feel that the temple was theirs. The Lord was there to hear their prayers and give them succour. With them, the abstract godhead took on an intimate and colourful personality and awakened an interest in the people, offering them peace and solace.

The musical element was the most important factor in popularising the concept of a benevolent god who would hear their prayers and give them comfort and strength to bear the ills of life resolutely and calmly without giving way to despair. Music made the songs the people's own.

Many saints have decried casteism and to that extent they not only helped to integrate the people but also extended the hand of forgiveness and hope and redemption to the lowest sinner. A large section of the songs are a passionate prayer for the strength to conquer the senses in order that the average man might come to love the form of the deity.

Lastly the songs taught the people affirmaion of god as against the doctrine of negation propagated both by Jainism and by Buddhism. Life is sweet, joyful and worth living. Bhoga or enjoyment of the good things of life does not negate moksha or liberation. Such new doctrines went a long way towards establishing an inner peace in the individual and gradually towards making him fit for the higher purposes of religion. These are some of the most visible and at the same time deep and lasting, influences of the bhakti literature on society.

M.Ar.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Telugu). The classical writing in Telugu started at a time when the advaita philosophy of Adi Shankara had succedded in offering peaceful, but powerful resistance to the non-vedic religions like Jainism and Buddhism. The atmosphere was therefore congenial for the revival of faith in vedic thought and practices. It was against this background that Nannaya, and his patron Raja Raja Narendra took up the task of rendering the Mahabharata into Telugu. The Mahabharata broadly underlines the vedic philosophy together with its ritualistic aspect and Nannaya took advantage of this in his literary presentation of the vedic philosophy through the traslation of the Mahabharata.

But Nannaya could not bring in the element of devotion in his compostion even though Krishna, the cynosure of devotion, is the main character guiding the entire course of events in the story of the Mahabharata. Even Tikkana who continued to work a century or two later concentrated more on ethics and metaphysics based on vedic thought rather than on the devotional aspect. Thus the composition of the Mahabharata in Telugu could present only the intellectual aspect of devotion and not the emotional or aesthetic aspect of it. The reason perhaps was the close association of these poets with the royal court. That is why we find the Mahabharata's Krishna more involved in the administration of justice rather than being an object of devotion.

But devotion is the life of all philosophy and no philosophy can survive unless it appeals to the hearts of common men and women and enables them to visualise the universal self within themselves through some symbol or idol of worship. This was done by the Vira Shaiva poets of the twelfth century who drew inspiration from Basava, the founder of the Virashaiva cult that originated from Karanataka. The followers of this cult strongly advocated undiverted worship of Shiva and Shiva alone.

The first among the Shaiva poets was Nannechoda, the author of Telugu version of Kumara Sambhava. Though this work was based on Kalidasa's Kumara Sambhava. Nannechoda added much from his side to make it a source of inspiration for the devotees of Shiva. The praise of Lord Shiva by Daksha in reverberating metres of Layagrahi and Layaharini are immortal pieces of literary composition which will continue to produce vibrations in the heart of the devotees of Shiva as long as Telugu literature survives.

Three important poets contributed substantially to the promotion of Vira Shaiva literature in Telugu. These are Sripati, Mallikarjuna and Manchana. All the three are called Pandits. Sripati Pandit wrote a commentary on the Brahma-Sutras from the point of view of Shaivism and named it Shrikarap Bhashyam. This is also known as Shiva-Bhakti Dipika. Malikarjuna Pandit (1120-1180) wrote hundred verses in praise of Shiva and named it Shiva-Tattva-Saram, Lingodbhava-Godyam, Rudra-Mahima, Ganga Sahasra-Mala and Amareshwarashata-kam are some of his other works. The main contribution of Mallikarjuna was to incorporate vedic philosophy and rituals in Shaivism while at the same time advocating equality of all people without any discrimination of caste. This encouraged some of the upper classes also to take to Shaivism. Manchana did not write much on Shaivism though his Keyura-Bahu-Charitra (14th century) contains stories of ethical significance.

The maximum contribution to Vira-Shaiva literature in Telugu came from Palkuriki Somana, an eminent scholar of Sanskrit, Kannada and Telugu of the later half of the thirteenth century. He wrote in all the three languages. In Telugu, Basavapuranam, Panditaradhya Charitram, Somanathastavam, Anubhava-Saram, Vurs-gadguoa Shatakam and Basavodaharanam are some of his major works. Literature and philosophy were equally enriched by him as he was a pioneer in various forms of literary composition and had a clear vision of Shaivism. He was original to his core in his ideas, ideals and expression.

A common feature among all the Shaiva poets, except perhaps the first one Nannechoda, was that they adopted a style and employed a language easily accessible to the masses and at the same time acceptable to the scholars. In the social front, it became immensely popular because of the liberalisation of the caste system. Vira Shaiva became a caste in itself. Brahmins who joined the cult were however called Aradhyas. The overwhelming popularity of Vira-Shaiva cult and their literature continued for nearly four centuries during which period people were not prepared to listen to anyone who did not sing the glory of Lord Shiva.

But Tikkana (1200-1280) managed to get his audience, though limited, by evolving a faith of the middle path called the worship of Harihara. He designed an idol-worship in which Hari (Vishnu) and Hara (Shiva) are equally represented. In his preamble to the translation of the Mahabharata, he invokes the blessings of Lakshmi and Gouri alike and poses a humble question to his Lord Harihara whether he liked to be fed by Yashoda's milk or to swallow the all-absorbing poison that came out of the ocean of milk. He tried to convince the common man that Shiva and Keshava were two phases of the same divinity. These efforts of Tikkana were supported by another poet of his own time—Gona Buddha Reddy, the author of Ranganatha-Ramayana. Like Tikkana, Buddha Reddy tried to depict Rama not only as an incarnation of Vishnu but also as another form of Shiva. These writings succeeded in subduing the agressive voice of Vira-Shaiva poets. The result was that by the end of the fourteenth century Telugu literature could present a pleasant harmony among poets of various faiths.

The most illustrious example of this synthesis was Bammera Potana (1400-1450) who was born in a Shaiva family, but developed deep devotion to Rama and ultimately glorified Krishna in his immortal work Andhra Mahashagavatam. Similarly a Vaishnavite poet Chakrapani Ranganna of the same period took to Shaivism and wrote Shiva-Bhakti Dipika. He was also known as Ranganatha. Some people believe that this Ranganatha was the author of Ranganatha-Ramayana. This may not be true, but what is definitely true is the fact that, from fifteenth century onwards religious fanaticism almost disappeared from the literary scene and what came out was pure devotion without unhealthy emotions.

The first poet who succeeded in establishing this type of devotion was Potana. Apart from the intrinsic worth of his writings, his personal life was so free of earthly desires that he was completely dedicated to the Lord of his heart. People for the first time knew, understood and experinced the virtues of devotion whether it was directed towards Rama, Krishna or Shiva.

Potana's close associate Shrinatha was also a great devotee of Shiva. He wrote mostly on Shiva, but later came under the influence of Ramanuja and respected Vaishnavism too. His Haravilasam describes the various sportive deeds of Lord Shiva. His Kashi Khandam and Bhima-Khandam are based on Skanda-Purana. He was a gifted poet. Shrinatha and Potana were born more or less at the same time and perhaps in the same family, but one chose to dedicate his writings to Lord Shiva and the other to Vishnu. Shrinatha was perhaps the last poet devoted to the cause of Shaivism as a faith and Potana was the first one to establish an all-absorbing spirit of devotion mainly directed towards Krishna. It may be significant to note that Potana was a pioneer in the field of Krishna-Bhakti in Telugu literature.

Potana was first a Bhakta and then a poet. He undertook the task of bringing the Bhagavatam into Telugu. In places where devotional ecstasy is involved, Potana identifies himself with the devotee concerned and words flow from his pen without any effort. Even after a lapse of five hundred years, Potana's verses still resound in the ears of an average Telugu person. The episodes of Prahlada, Ambarisha, Vamana and Gajendra are the most popular ones. The tenth part or skandha of the Bhagavata also receives an excellent treatment in the hands of Potana. The birth of Krishna, his childhood, his supernatural powers and actions, his love for Gopis, his marriage with Rukmini and his emergence as the mysterious master of the universe were all described by Potana in a highly devotional tone.

The foundations laid by Potana in the field of devotional literature in Telugu influenced the later poets and lyricists for a long time. Tyagaraja (1757-1847) a saint poet and musician of repute drew inspiration from Potana. Like Potana, Tyagraja was a selfless devotee who dedicated his entire life to two things—music, his favourite art, and his favourite deity, Rama. If Potana laid the foundation for devotional poetry, Tyagaraja acted as a pioneer in the field of devotional music. In him we find a rare combination of music, philosophy and poetry.

Prior to Tyagaraja, there was another saint-singer, Annamacharya by name, who devoted his entire life in singing the glory of Lord Venkateshwara, the presiding deity of Tirupati, a place of pilgrimage in the south. It is said that he composed 32000 songs in praise of Lord Venkateshwara. Some of his songs depict the sports of Lord Krishna who appears before the saint almost as another form of Lord Venkateshwara. Annamacharaya is acclaimed as 'Pada-Kavita-Pitamaha' (the originator of devotional compositions). He wrote in Sanskrit too. His entire family joined him in his devotional pursuit with the result that we have a school of Tallapaka poets who contributed substantially to devotional poetry.

Kancherla Gopanna, a famous devotee of Rama who built a temple for his deity in Bhadrachalam, a hillock situated on the banks of the Godavari in Andhra Pradesh, is another personality held in great esteem by the devotional world. He served the Nawabs of Golconda. He was accused of misappropriating public funds to build the temple. As a punishment for this misconduct, he was imprisoned. It seems that Rama and Lakshmana appeared before the Nawab in his dream, paid him the amount in cash and urged him to release his devotee. Gopanna, who was popularly known as Ramadas, composed a number of songs when he was in prison, appealing to his Lord to be merciful and come to his rescue as he was in distress. These songs are sung in every house in Telugu land even today. Ramadas also composed a hundred verses glorifying Rama and named it Dasarathi-Shatakam. These verses are memorised and recited by school children as a part of their curriculam.

Rama, Krishna and Shiva are worshipped with equal reverence by a majority of Telugu people. This is because of an outlook of synthesis which was developed and demonstrated by the saint poets and singers in their compositions. Tyagaraja for instance, no doubt sang in praise of Rama in most of his songs, but never underestimated the importance of Shiva and Krishna. For him, Shiva was a symbol of the primal sound that dominates the universe. Similarly, Krishna Deva Rayalu advocated Vaishnavism in his famous work Amukta-Malyada, but never condemned other faiths. Tenali Rama Linga Kavi of the fifteenth or the sixteenth century wrote Panduranga-Mahatmyam in praise of Vaishnavism and Udbhataradhya-Charitram to support Shaivism. In fact he had two pseudonyms—Rama Krishna Kavi and Rama Linga Kavi; he used to write on Vishnu under the first name and on Shiva under the second one.

While discussing devotional writings or Bhakti movement in Telugu literature, we cannot ignore Kshetrayya who composed several songs in praise of Muvva Gopala, his favourite deity. There is an element of Shringara (erotic sentiment) in his devotional songs. This sort of blending of the two sentiments is found even in the songs of Annamacharya. Some of the songs composed by Rama Das also present a combination of devotion and love. In fact, devotion cannot be detached from love because devotion is love in its purest form. But there is always the danger of devotional love resulting in love that is devoid of devotion. This is exactly what happened in Tanjore during the reign of Nayaka kings.

Devotion degenerated into secular love when polluted by passion in the hands of patrons and poets of easy virtue. Patrons like Raghunatha Nayaka and Vijaya Radhava Nayaka of seventeenth century encouraged in good faith all literary compositions advocating devotional love. But in practice Radha and Krishna were reduced to passionate lovers enjoying a good time in the royal courts.

But this trend was not allowed to continue for a long time. Very soon a saint like Swami Narayana Tirtha stepped in and saved the devotional literature from degeneration. His Krishna-Lila-Tarangini (17th century) is an excellent piece of lyrical composition glorifying the qualities and actions of Lord Krishna. The songs in this composition are called 'Tarangas' (meaning waves). In fact every song is a wave rising from the heart of the saint at the mere thought of his lord. The composition concludes with the marriage of Rukmini and the Lord. The language of Krishna-Lila Tarangini is simple Sanskrit which Telugu people can almost take for their native language. The tarangas are so simple, soft and melodious that words sing for themselves and create an atmosphere of devotion. It is not always necessary that a devotee should worship his deity in some form or other like Rama, Krishna or Shiva. The object of worship can be a formless god. This type of Nirguna form of worship was also advocated by poets like Vemana. In Vemana, we find a reformistic attitude towards religion, philosophy and worship. Like Kabir, he condemns all that is artificial, outdated and meaningless. Realisation of self through purification of mind is what these saints advocate. Vemana was a pioneer in this field. He was a real seer who could visualise things in their true colour and present them as such.

Another saint Patuluri Virabrahman became very popular in the beginning of this century through his prophetic vision incorporated in his songs which are collectively known as Kalajnanam. He could predict the change that was going to take place in our social, cultural and religious life. He advocated enquiry into self and condemned all meaningless rituals.

Thus almost all forms of Bhakti movement are found in Telugu literature ranging from the Advaita philosophy of Adi Shankara to the prophetic vision of Virabrahman.

I.P.R.

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE (Urdu). Etymologically the word 'Bhakti' is derived from 'bhaja', meaning to love, worship and adore. As a movement laying stress on personal worship, faith and religious devotion as a way of salvation it is traceable to earlier than the 7th century. The sects of the Bhagvatas, worshippers of Vasudeva, identified with Krishna and Vishnu were active even a century before Christ. Towards the middle ages Krishna, Vishnu and Pasupati (Shiva) and a host of other deities came to be worshipped all over the country. After the Urdu language came to have literary characteristics and Urdu poetry witnessed the dawn, Hindu scriptures dealing with Rama, Krishna and Shiva began to be rendered into Urdu. It may be recalled that during the Mughal period, especially from the reign of Akbar onwards, a good many Hindu religious books had been rendered into Persian. Many original books were also written in Persian giving an 'expose or resume' of religious topics. The number of religious books written since the later part of the nineteenth century had been legion; but, by and large, the books except those published after India's independence are no where available. For example, the first Urdu translation of Tulsidas Ramcharitmanas by Munshi Jagannath Khushtar was published by Nawal Kishore Press, Lucknow about 98 years ago. Nothing can be ascertained about the life-account of Khushtar; his translation is versified and evidences his high calibre as a poet. There are many other books. None of these books, however, contain details about the writers. Some notworthy works of this genre are: Bhagwati Itihas, Urdu translation of Devi Bhagvata, by Pt. Pyarelal, 12th Skanda of Srimadbhagvata by Rai Makkhanlal, Bhagvata Manzoom by Munshi Jagan Nath 'Khushtar', Khulasa-e-Bhagvadgita by Munshi Sukhlal, Guldasta-e-Haqqiqat by Munshi Singh Ahqar (versified translation of the Gita), Gita Mahatma va Ganesh by Ram Sahai 'Tamanna', Valmiki Ramayana (Satwan Skand) translated by Parmeshwar Dayal Mukhtar, Bajrang Satthika by Ram Sahai Tamanna, Ramayana-e-Farhat by Shankar Dayal 'Farhat', Janki-Vijay (versified) by Shankar Dayal 'Farhat', Prem Sagar by Shankardayal Farhat, Prem Sagar (in prose) by Lala.

Besides, Munshi Dwarika Prasad 'Ufaq' (1864-1913) resident of Lucknow and father of reputed Urdu poet Bisheshwardayal Munawwar, wrote a number of Ramayanas in verse as well as in prose. Ufuq was a prolific poet.

Munshi Banwarilal Shula (1847-1903), born at Saharanpur into a Bhatnagar family, shifted to Aligarh and set up as a pleader. He was a poet of acknowledged merit and fame. His Diwan is now no where available. He composed a Ramayana basing the episodes on the Ramcharitmanas of Tulsidas; melodious and melifluent, a few of its episodes especially the one referring to Rama's chasing of the golden deer are quite captivating. He was a devotee of Sri Bhagvan Krishna and he composed a number of poems dealing with the Lord. His poems like Brindavan, Janaki and Murli Manohar won acclaim.

Brijnarain 'Chakbast' (1882-1926) whose poetic renown remains unbedimmed by the passage of time could compose only one poem on Lord Rama, entitled Ramayana ka ek Scene dealing with Rama's paying homage to his parents on the eve of his departure on banishment.

Durga Sahai 'Suroor' Jahanbadi (1873-1910), resident of the Jahanabad near Pilibhit (Bareilly, U.P.), was a renowned poet whose poetry spanned a number of topics including devotion and religiosity. His poems Tarana-e-Vahdat, 'Zamzama-e-Tohid', and 'Prayag ka Sangam'are saturated with deep Vaishnava thoughts.

Munshi Bisheshwarprasad Munawwar, son of Ufuq of Lucknow, was an eminent poet, and he belonged to a family of poets spread over five generations. Until his death in 1968 poetry cascaded from his pen. His translation of Bhagavatgita from the original Sanskrit text and other translations including those by Persian poet Faizi and Munshi Lakshman Prasad 'Sadr' (father-in-law of Munawwar) were widely acclaimed. Late Asif Ali, Tej Bahadur Sapru, Sachchidanaand Sinha, Sarojini Naidu and many other topmost persons paid homage to the poet.

Editor,Shan-e-Hind, has published this year another translation of the Gita entitled Sirr-e-Maghfarat Ratan by Pandorvi.

It may be added that even though the Vaishnava movement in Urdu literature has had no sustained note, many poets felt drawn to some of the Hindu scriptures irrespective of religions professed by them. A good many poems on Islamic topics were and are also being written by Hindu poets like Kalidass Gupta 'Riza'. Muslim poets such as Iqbal, Harsat Mohani and some others have reciprocated like-wise.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jigar Brelvi, Yadgar-Raftagan (Allahabad, 1943)., Jigar Brelvi, Urdu aur Hunood(Allahabad,)., Rafiq Marharvi, Hinduon mein Urdu (Budaun).

T.R.

END OF VOLUME ONE

W8-AMU-223